Mr. DAWSON of Georgia said that the measure now under consideration was very important to a large portion of the free, but unrepresented, people of the United States; and it became gentlemen to act in this matter with the respect due to themselves and to a mass of the community whose interests were confided to their care. Mr. D. went on to observe that he considered the present question, when viewed in all its aspects, as the most important one which had occurred during the present session of Congress; it was nothing less than the grand "hard money scheme" of the Administration carried out in its first application. Gentlemen might cover it up as they pleased, but it came to that; it was the question whether, in a district over which Congress exercised undisputed sway, they should at once abolish all banks and credit, and rely on a hard money circulation? That was the question. A portion of this House (said Mr. D.) have declared that all banks in this District are to come to an end, and then all bank currency must cease with them. Another portion of the party say they are for banks with certain limitations; but they are to be of a temporary character, and all looking to a winding up of bank concerns; and this final winding up must be accomplished within two years. Let me refer to the language employed by a gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL,] who is considered as one of the leaders of the Administration party in this House. He told us that we ought now so to develope the principles of the Sub-Treasury bill that the States might carry out the system, and reduce the country to a hard money currency. We are to set an example, he says, in this District, for the States to follow.

[Mr. VANDERPOEL here interposed, and was very anxious to explain. Mr. DAWSON for some time refused to yield the floor, wishing the explanation to be deferred until the gentleman should make his reply; at length, however, he yielded, when Mr. VANDERPOEL explained that what he had said, or meant to say, was this: that banks, under a state of suspension, exerted a demoralizing influence; that they exhibited a demoralizing aptitude to rush into a state of suspension whenever it did not suit their convenience to pay their debts; and that Congress was bound to set an example in opposition to this spirit.]

Mr. DAWSON resumed. It was then the moral tendencies of the conduct of the banks that induced the very honorable and conscientious gentleman to oppose them. [A laugh.] Well, sir, the gentleman votes to wind up the affairs of all the District banks, because their suspension had an immoral tendency. Has the Patriotic Bank suspended. Does it not now redeem its bills on presentation? And? does not the bill before you put this bank on the same footing with all the rest? Is it the immorality of paying its notes for which this bank is to be destroyed? No, sir; no.

This was not the gentleman's ground. He was for having us set an example here by winding up all banks, and leaving the people of the District to a hard money circulation. It is due to the country —due to candor and magnanimity, to develope the true issue, and not by unworthy subterfuges to attempt to conceal it. I have said this is an important, an all-important question; and "now is the time, and now is the hour" to discuss and settle it; to form the great issue before the country; and to let the people of this land know that there is a party in Congress who are determined to roll the wheel of ruthless extermination over all State banks, and thus to prostrate with them the rights of the States. Gentlemen may think to deceive the people; but let me tell them the people are wide awake, notwithstanding all the poppies that have been flung over their eyes. I am ready now to meet the question. I stand on the old Conservative ground; I go for preserving the institutions of the country, and the rights of the individuals connected with them. I am against destroying the relations of creditor and debtor. I will not vote to depreciate the value of property—to raise the value of money, and thereby to empower the creditor to bring all the property of the debtor under the hammer. That will be the operation of the bill. That is the question on one or the other side of which we are now to range ourselves. Will you, by voting for this bill, appreciate money one hundred per cent. and depreciate all property fifty per cent.? Will you throw the property of this District into the hands of the moneyed men, and thus make the rich richer, and the poor poorer? You know well that I am not one of those who love to dwell on the invidious distinction between rich and poor; and though I make no hypocritical pretensions of sympathy, when it thus comes to action, I am not willing to destroy that kind of indulgence extended by the banks to the people in this District, and thereby force their property into market. For who, I ask, are to be the beneficiaries from this splendid act of reform? I answer, the stockholders of these banks and public officers. The banks of this District have two millions and a half of dollars due to them from the citizens, whose notes they have discounted; the amount of their paper circulation is about $650,000; the specie capital in their vaults is about $420,000; now taking these $420,000 from the $650,000, and it leaves about $200,000 to pay, while they have two millions and a half to receive. Under these circumstances, what do you do? You, friends of the people—you, who are no more Democrats at heart than I am, yet tell the dear people so much more about your Democracy—what, I ask, do you do?

At one blow you cut off the five heads of these District banks, and throw them bleeding into this ten miles square; and you tell them, now die, close up your earthly concerns, for you may live no longer. Well, what is the result? They must sue their debtors, and bring their property to the hammer. And who will buy it? The office holders first, and then the stockholders; and where is the poor debtor? Borne down—crushed—brought with his family to ruin and desolation; and brought by whom? By this House—by you, who call yourselves the people's friends. For the sake of your political experiment of bringing a "hard money currency" into this devoted District, you stand by with stony hearts, and look upon the ruin of these defenceless people as if it were a spectacle exhibited at a theatre. You throw all the property of the poorer and middling class of people into the hands of rich landlords and money holders. Houses, the fruit of hard earnings and long saving—houses that cost the owner $10,000, will go, before his eyes, under the hammer of the auctioneer, for $1,500 or $1,000; all to carry out your beautiful scheme of "reform" and a "hard money currency!" You talk about "indulgence" to the banks. Is it not amazing that gentlemen will talk about bank directors as proud aristocrats, rag barons, rolling in splendor and luxury, when it is a well known fact that the banks have never averaged a profit over seven per cent.? Why the "great monster" itself never realized to the stockholders over six per cent. on their money. Yet with language like this in their mouths, gentlemen will pass this bill, driving every money borrower to the usurer or shaving shop, to save him from a jail. There is the sheriff levying on all he has in the world, and there stands his poor wife wringing her hands and clasping her weeping babes to her bosom, while her husband in an agony is offering twenty-five per cent. for money to the usurer or shaver to postpone the hour of their final ruin. How are these money lenders to be benefited? Not by granting the banks a charter: no: if you want to encourage and fatten usurers and shavers, and make bank directors, already rich, still richer, cut off all banks at a blow, annul their charters, and compel them to enforce their demands on the community. While millions are due the banks, they have only to take off enough to redeem their circulation, and they pocket the balance. This is set us as an example; and I say, if you can only carry out your plan—if you can but go through the States and induce their Legislatures to do as you are doing, I say that, barring "stop laws" and "relief laws," no property in the whole country will be equal to bank stock, and no people be made so rich as usurers and shavers. The effect of your reform is to depreciate all property, to make the stockholder plaintiff, and the borrower defendant.

I have a letter from my own State, from which I learn that, when a certain plaintiff who had recovered a judgment ordered the sheriff to levy on the defendant's property and compel him to pay in specie, the indignation of the neighborhood was aroused to such a degree that they went to the sheriff and asked him to stop sale, and then to the plaintiff in a state of such excitement that they could scarce be restrained from violence, remonstrating against such oppression and revolting cruelty. Yet we are now called upon to do this very thing, and to do it in the name of the General Government, that it may be held up as an example to the State Governments. Well, sir, let the example be carried out; let those who are for compelling the defenceless people of this District to use nothing but hard money, go into their own States and get their State Legislatures to collect the taxes in hard coin, and to pay for all their works of internal improvement in the same hard currency. Try it there, and how long do you think your Government will exist? Will you not have a revolution as surely as you make the trial? Then I say that we have been here fighting these two days past in ambuscade; neither side has come up boldly to the issue. I call upon you to come from the bushes and show your faces. Do to the people of this District as you are willing to do to the people of your own State. I call upon you Virginians, and you Representatives from Maryland, to treat the people of the District of Columbia as you are prepared to treat the citizens of Virginia and Maryland. Then your people will know what it is you mean, and what they have to expect. Yet, while you are voting here to destroy these banks because they have suspended specie payment, (though one of them has not,) you will vote, at home, to recharter your own suspended banks and to legalize their suspension. Is this giving to the people of the District equal rights? Your conscience says, No! These people consider themselves, and justly so consider themselves, as trampled on. Ought we not to do something to alleviate their distresses? All they ask of you is to do to them as the State Legislatures do to the people of the States. All they demand is, that you will treat them as American citizens. Do this, and it is all we ask.

The proposition of the honorable gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] with the amendment of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] will do this. Indulge them at least for two years. Who, I ask, should best understand the affairs of this District and the necessities and wishes of its inhabitants? Is it not the gentlemen whose local situation brings them nearest to the District? And who are these? Are they not the gentlemen from Maryland? And now what do we see? Who feels the most anxiety for their relief? The two gentlemen from Maryland, [Messrs. JOHNSON and JENIFER.] These gentleman are not willing that Congress shall set its heel upon this District and grind its citizens to powder. They are not willing that you should treat them as rats in a receiver—mere subjects of experiment. This District, ceded to your Government, and confided to its parental care, is not a garden plat in which to try new-fangled experiments. Its inhabitants are Americans—American citizens; and they are not to be practised on in this way. If you want to try your new schemes, take a wider field. Let the zealous gentleman gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] go to the great Empire State, and there let him proclaim his hard-money doctrines. If, indeed, I have mistaken his real views—if he is not in favor of prostrating banks and introducing a metallic currency—I shall rejoice from the bottom of my heart. It will cause me the liveliest joy to hail him as a conservative, and join him in an effort to save the country.

I now move you that this whole subject be referred to a select committee, with instructions to report a bill to this House to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] had, unintentionally, no doubt, made a false issue. He could not conceive how he could have so far misunderstood the observations he (Mr. V.) made yesterday. He knew that the gentleman would not designedly misrepresent him. He would not, and could not, imagine that he had imputed to him (Mr. V.) sentiments which he never uttered, to furnish himself with a pretext for exhibiting himself to us in that irredeemable character in which he had just presented himself. Mr. V. could reciprocate the expressions of surprise in which the gentleman had indulged, and say that he was astonished, yes, astounded, at the fact that he would become the advocate of institutions whose motto seemed to be, "IRREDEEMABLE, IRREDEEMABLE TO THE LAST." And in support of what he (Mr. V.) did say, he was willing to accept the challenge of the gentleman, and go with him before the people of the "Empire State," and there plead before the laboring men and farmers of that great Commonwealth. He would there argue with him the bold and naked question, whether it was right, whether it was moral, to recharter a number of banks who refused to pay their debts; who were constantly issuing irredeemable paper, with a full knowledge that the laboring man and the market woman who happened to come possessed of it, must, in order to raise actual money upon it, be subjected to a loss of from five to ten per cent. He knew the moral sense, the sense of right, of the proud and prosperous people of that great State. They would never again, for a moment, tolerate in their banks this irredeemable, this profligate position, in which the institutions of this District now presented themselves. The prevailing ethics of New York would save her people from the loss—her character from the degradation inseparable from a gross and daring violation of law and duty on the part of all her moneyed institutions, and it was this fact, this conviction, that the Legislature would never again wink at such demoralizing delinquency, that had, perhaps, as much as any other cause, induced the banks of New York to hold on to their duty, and to exhibit to the world the comparatively proud spectacle they now presented. No, sir, no. Public opinion there would not tolerate another suspension. The bank, then, that shall dare to suspend again, will, at once, be consigned, by public opinion, to where such an act will prove her legitimately to belong. I mean, to the vortex of irretrievable bankruptcy. They never did do—the Legislature of New York would never dare to do, what the Bank Whigs here were so ready to do—recharter a whole batch of banks while in a state of suspension. The most it did when the banks of New York suspended specie payments in 1837, was, for the term of one year only, to save them from proceedings of the Attorney General to enforce a forfeiture of their charters, at the expiration of which they were obliged to resume. They did not ask for further grace; nor would it have been granted, had it been asked for. This the banks knew full well. No man who then lived in New York could have mistaken the public pulse upon this subject. It was on the side of duty—on the side of morality—on the side of fidelity to moral and solemn engagements; not on the side where we have found the IRREDEEMABLE Whigs of this House. He hoped ever to see in his native State too high a tone of morals, to regard with an indulgent eye that position of delinquency—of open violation, on the part of the banks, of the very laws that created them—which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] seemed to regard as quite venial, if not praiseworthy. If the time should ever come when such indulgence shall be too easily cherished, and too freely accorded, then he would be prepared to believe that the days of her honor, her good faith, and, with it, her boasted prosperity, had departed.

But the gentleman insists, that in the remarks he (Mr. V.) made yesterday, he made a decided demonstation in favor of an exclusive hard money currency, by way of carrying out the Sub-Treasury plan. Sir, either his (Mr. V's) mode of expressing himself must be very unfortunate and confused, or the gentleman's powers of comprehension are very much at fault; for he surely meant to make no demonstration in favor of an exclusive hard money currency. What he said was, that the banks had made a solemn compact with the Government, and, through it, with the people, that, in consideration of special and very valuable powers granted them, they had had solemnly agreed to redeem all their liabilities in gold and silver; that this was one of the very conditions of their charters, the violation of which rendered their charters void; that while in a state of open and unblushing violation of this vital condition of the law of their creation, they came to us and asked us for an extension of their corporate existence, without our even hinting at the delinquent and unjust position they occupied; and that there was found in this House a stong party, ready and willing to regard this non-payment of their liabilities a mere peccadillo, that did not merit our censure, or even our attention, when they called upon us to grant them an additional boon! This is the length and breadth of what he said, and meant to say, on that occasion. Yes, he freely accepted the challenge of the gentleman from Georgia, and would tell him that he was willing to go before the hard-handed and true-hearted laborers of his native State, and say to them, "These are the banks that we refuse to recharter, without, at least, inserting in the act to recharter them, some provision that shall drive them back to their duty. We cannot, as your faithful representatives, pass, in approving silence, over such delinquency. We cannot see their poor bill holders constantly shaved from five to ten per cent. without marking with our disapprobation the state of things which conduces to such losses." This, sir, would be the tone and language he would assume before the high minded people of New York; and he was very sure he would receive from them an approving response. They would not, for such sentiments, be quite as ready, as is the gentleman from Georgia, for uttering such sentiments and assuming such a position, to suspect him of too strong hard money predilections.

But he would go a step further towards showing that he had not assumed a cruel and unfeeling position towards these banks, by refusing to grant them an unqualified recharter while in a state of suspension. Not only had they been fortunate enough to cease, but they had been impudent—yes, impudent enough to declare dividends of profits while in a state of suspension! This surely deserved the reprobation of every just and high minded man. Dividends of profits made when every one of their bill holders was losing from five to ten per cent! How much more noble, how much more laudable to have foregone a little profit, and thereby enabled themselves to adhere to their duty—to the redemption of their paper. But no, it had come to this, at least, in a large section of our country: if there was smooth sailing—if it was perfectly convenient for the banks to adhere to specie payments—they would redeem their bills; but if it became necessary to submit to a little loss, or forego a considerable amount of profit, to enable them to continue in the line of their duty, why, then, they very quietly and unceremoniously glided into the smooth and placid waters of suspension; and we, sir, were called "Destructives and vile Locofocos," because we dared to raise the voice of remonstrance against this course—because we would not consent to recharter these banks, without, at least, administering a little spur—a little hint, by way of reminding them of their duty—without some provision for their emerging from this irredeemable position in which they approached us. Go on, gentlemen Whigs, (said Mr. V.) and reap all the glory of your unrighteous forbearance. Grant to delinquent institutions acts of amnesty and pardon; nay, approbation, as often as you please. I envy not the glory you are to derive from such charity and such indulgence. In this career of charity to the privileged few, and cruelty to the many, you are only acting out a law of your nature. If we look to the rights and interests of the whole community, who are bled almost to fainting, all around you, by the agency of suspended banks, you are true to your principles and to yourselves, by forgetting the suffering of the many in the intensity of your regard for the interests of the few. It is strange, "passing strange," that you do not begin to repent—to change your policy when you reflect upon your past folly, in regard to that mammoth institution, which was the first to lead off in this leap to suspension. She is the author and finisher of the present mischief, which the country is suffering. She was your pet, your darling, your all in all; your ATLAS, which was to stand firm when all the smaller horde should be swept away, and "leave not a wreck behind." Where, now, is your "great regulator," without which you have so often told us that all your moneyed institutions would explode? There she lies, bankrupt, if not rotten. She is yours, with all her abominations, all her putrescence about her. You are wedded to her by too many acts of past affection, to be able now to shake her off. She is one of the many millstones about your neck, which are soon, very soon, to sink you, to settle your doom as a party.

[Mr. DAWSON here asked Mr. V. if he did not state on yestesday that we had nothing to expect from the States and as that was the cause, it was the duty of Congress to set an example from this District.]

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he did say, and he would again say, that as the proposition to recharter these banks was forced upon us, and was not one of our own seeking, it was our duty here to set an example to the irredeemable portion of this confederacy. This was what he said, and if the gentleman would look at the whole context, he would no longer be in error as to the import of what he said. What further did he say? Did he not say that he was willing to go for these banks, if the bill contained a provision that they should resume specie payments within sixty days, and they should, in the mean time, be prohibited from issuing irredeemable paper? Did this look like a disposition, on his part, to persecute the banks, to drive the people at once into an exclusively hard money currency? If the States, where the banks had suspended, were too lax in their notions of what was due to the community from the banks, or too much in their power to drive them back to their duty, was it true that we, too, were thus trammelled? Was this Congress so entirely under the control of the banks of this District, that it dare not refuse to renew their charters while in a state of suspension; dare not even utter a sentiment of rebuke against them; but act as if it were actually bound to endorse and legalize it? No, he trusted that we would set a better example to the States south of the "great regulator," whose moneyed institutions were now exhibiting a spectacle that was a reproach to our whole country, that disparaged us as a nation in the eyes of foreign nations. He had seen this, he had felt it, when journeying among foreigners and strangers. Talk to them about our glorious institutions—the rapid advances we are making in all that seems to elevate the great masses, and render them happy, and the response you will invariably get is, "yes; but look at your repeated moneyed crises, the frequent suspensions of your banks, the fluctuations in your currency, and the instability of prices, consequent upon these things." These they would attribute to our political institutions. These would they say are some of the dear penalties you have to pay for your Democratic liberty. And did it not behoove us, when a fair call, a proper occasion presented itself to us, as far as in us lay, to vindicate our country and our institutions from such reproach? If we did not show to the world that we felt a high moral duty resting upon us in reference to corporations in such a predicament, what could we expect from the States, embarrassed, trammelled, and connected, as too many of them were, with these institutions? The course he, and those with whom he acted, pursued, did not imply a disposition to war against all banks, and drive the country into the use of an exclusive metallic currency. It was dictated by considerations of honor, by a regard for the obligations of morality and positive duty, by a regard for the honor of the country.

But the gentleman from Georgia has drawn a sad picture of distress, which he imagines will result to the banks, if we drive them back to specie payments. They will be obliged to press their debtors, if we compel them to resume specie payments, or refuse to recharter them, and, therefore, we must extend their existence, and permit them to go on in their career of suspension until they shall graciously please to resume. Sir, where is this argument to end? If inconvenient to return to their duty now, if they cannot do it now, without grievously oppressing their debtors, may they not, under this argument, enjoy a perpetual suspension? If there was any thing in this argument now, the longer the banks remained out of the line of their duty, the stronger would it grow. This argument rather proceeded on the assumption that the banks themselves would not make very formidable sacrifices to enable them to resume; that their debtors must pay the whole of the requisite penalty. If this were so, he deplored it, but he could not help it. The debtors of the banks were few, compared to the entire community within the range of their circulation, the whole of which was subjected to daily losses from the present condition of things. If the suffering of the few, who had voluntarily connected themselves with these institutions were necessary to bring them back to their duty, and save this whole community from daily losses, much as he might commiserate such suffering, it did not furnish with him a motive strong enough to induce him to tell these banks to go on in their unlawful and immoral career, and terminate it only when it suited their convenience.

But was it true that the friends of the Administration had wholly refused to recharter these banks? On the contrary, most of them had voted for the bill as amended, and, as he thought, improved, by the amendments offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PETRIKIN] and the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. COOPER.] Those provisions were simple, but salutary. They embraced the principle of immediate resumption, and liability of the president and directors of the banks for engagements entered into during their administration of its affairs. With these improving and reforming principles, he, (Mr. V.) and most of those with whom he acted, voted for the bill to extend the charters for two years. A majority of you, gentlemen Federal Whigs, voted against the bill, because it contained provisions, looking to the safety of the community. You were true to yourselves—to your principles—for you would not vote for any bill that contained a spur to prick on the banks to their duty; for any bill, that contained provisions unpalatable to the banks, and calculated to secure the public against their frauds and their suspensions. Go with us, then, before the tribunal of the American people, and let them determine whose course upon this subject has been most consistent with good faith, morality, and patriotism.

The debate was further continued till the adjournment by Messrs. JOHNSON of Maryland, HOLLEMAN, and HOPKINS.

FRIDAY, July 3d.

The same subject being up for consideration, Mr. WELLER remarked as follows:

"I regret, Mr. Speaker, that it has become necessary for me again to obtrude myself upon the House, in order to correct some of the misrepresentations of gentlemen who have preceded me. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] has, with a vast deal of warmth, announced to the House that the issue now presented is, whether or not we shall have an exclusive metallic currency; or, in other words, he charges the friends of the friends of the Administration with an effort to break down all the banking institutions of the country. The gentleman cannot, by declaiming against an exclusive hard money currency, change the issue, or divert the attention of the House from it. Whenever an effort is made to expose the iniquities of the banks, and show to the people the frauds which have been practised upon them, we are charged with hostility to all banks, and enemies to the credit system! Sir, I will tell the gentleman from Georgia what the issues are which have been presented since this subject has been under discussion. One issue is, shall we incorporate for two years banks which are in a state of suspension, standing out in open violation of the law, or shall we compel them to wind up? Upon that issue, sir, which was involved in the original bill, as it came to this House, the Whigs, as a party, supported the bill, and the Democrats opposed it.

The next issue presented, was in an amendment to the original bill, in these words:"

"Provided, That said banks shall not issue notes of a less denomination than ten dollars."

Upon this question, the vote stood—ayes 96, noes 76. Not a single Whig voted in the affirmative, and but one Democrat in the negative.

Another issue was presented in the following amendment:

"And be it enacted, That in case said banks, or either of them, shall refuse or fail to pay their notes in specie, on demand of any person, such person shall and may have remedy by judgment and execution at law, at a notice of ten days, before any justice of the peace of said District."

In the affirmative there are eighty-six Democrats and two Whigs. In the negative, sixty-four Whigs and six Democrats.

A vote was then taken on the following amendment:

"Provided, also, That the president and directors of each of said banks shall be jointly and severally, in their individual capacity, liable for all notes issued or debts contracted by said banks, respectively, from and after the day this act goes into effect, to be recovered as other debts of a like amount may at the time be by law recoverable."

On this question, there were ninety Democrats and two Whigs for the proposition. Against it, seventy-seven Whigs and thirteen Democrats.

The following amendment was then proposed:

"And be it further enacted, That in case the said banks, or either of them, shall refuse or fail to pay their notes in specie, on demand of any person, such person shall and may have remedy by judgment and execution at law, at a notice of ten days, before any justice of the peace of said District."

Upon this question, there were ninety-six Democrats and one Whig in the affirmative. In the negative, seventy Whigs and six Democrats.

Another issue was presented in these words:

"Provided, That their notes, at all times, shall be redeemable by specie, or, on failure thereof, their charters shall be forfeited."

The vote stood, on this amendment, as follows: For it, ninety-nine Democrats and two Whigs; against it, seventy Whigs and three Democrats.

Upon the question prohibiting the banks, after a certain day, from issuing bills of a less denomination than twenty dollars, the vote was: For the proposition, Democrats, eighty-three; Whigs, none. Against it, Whigs, eighty-eight, Democrats, ten.

Now, sir, these are some of the issues which have been presented, and I rejoice that we have had an opportunity of testing the sense of the two parties on these questions. I desire that my countrymen should particularly remember that the Whigs in Congress, as a party, voted for extending the charters of suspended banks—banks which have suffered their paper to depreciate in this city from six to twelve per cent.—that they voted against prohibiting them from issuing notes of a less denomination than ten dollars—that they voted against compelling them to redeem their notes in specie, or forfeit their charters—that they voted against making the officers individually liable for the issues. If an individual gives his note to his neighbor for ten dollars, you compel him to pay it; and if he has a dollar's worth of property, you sacrifice it for the benefit of the creditor. But a bank may issue it paper, suspend payment, violate its contracts; and all this, in the estimation of Whig orators, is a fair, honest business transaction! If a private citizen swindles another out of five dollars, he is sent to the penitentiary, and confined for a series of years in a loathsome dungeon; but a bank may swindle the holder of its bills with perfect impunity, and the officer whose pecuniary interest is thus advanced struts your streets with the pomposity of a hereditary lord! Why this distinction? Is not the moral sense of the community debased where such things are tolerated? And am I to record my vote in favor of such a demoralizing system? Why, sir, I should be ashamed to look my honest constituents in the face.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] says that these banks have loaned out, in the District, two and a half millions of dollars; and that, if they are compelled to wind up, distress will fall upon the mechanic, the laboring man, and the widows and orphans, of this ten miles square! Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt a very large proportion of the paper of these banks has been loaned out to the officers themselves. The report made to this House, in 1836, shows that at that time the presidents, cashiers, and directors, of these six banks, were indebted to them in the sum of $319 598 78. In this, you will remember that the indebtedness of the stockholders is not included. I have no doubt they had their share of the discounts. The whole amount loaned out to private citizens in the District was $312,415 70, being $7,183 08 less than the amount loaned to the officers.

I am asked whether the Patriotic Bank does not redeem its notes in specie. I answer, that I am informed it does. The report which I now hold in my hand shows that this bank had in circulation, due on the 1st January last, only nine thousand three hundred and forty dollars and eighty-five cents. Its specie and specie funds then on hand was $19,589 16. At the same time, its bills and notes discounted amounted to $263,007 75. So you will see that there was no difficulty in its continuing specie payments, as its discounts had been made with the paper of other banks. But, sir, the sympathies of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] have been excited in favor of these banks! Let that gentleman look at the frauds which these institutions have practised upon the people; let him look at the widows and orphans who have been reduced from a state of affluence to penury and want, by the failure of these very banks; and if he has tears to shed, let him shed them over them. He need not go a mile from this Capitol to find honest, industrious men, who have been robbed of their property, and thrown penniless upon the world, by the fall of stocks and the depreciation of the paper of these institutions. Let him follow the mechanic or the laboring man, who has just received a five dollar bill, as the reward of a week's toil and labor; accompany him to the broker's office, and see him shaved at the rate of twelve per cent. before he can go to market to lay in provisions for his family. Sir, I commend this side of the picture to the gentleman from Georgia.

I have before remarked, that the influence of these institutions was seen and felt in our national councils. To prove this, I need but refer to the fact that members of Congress not unfrequently find it convenient to obtain accommodations at these very banks. The report before me shows, that on the 1st March, 1836, the members of Congress were indebted to these banks in the sum of $87,600 78. Now I do not know whether any of the members of the present Congress are indebted to these institutions or not; but, judging from the past, such is probably the fact. If so, they are peculiarly well qualified for sitting as the grand inquest of the nation, to decide upon the expediency of extending their charters! An extension of the charters would secure a renewal of their notes; and consequently there can be no question about the expediency of the measure!

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] charged me, on yesterday, with having declared, that so unfriendly did I feel towards the people of this District, that I would kick them as they passed. The gentleman surely misunderstood me, for I used no such language. I did say, that I could not consent to see the bill then under consideration pass, without giving it an "especial kick." Now, Mr. Speaker, I pity the gentleman if he cannot discriminate between the banks and the people. Shall I be told, when I am exposing the corruptions of the banking system, and holding up their improprieties to the public eye, that I am abusing the PEOPLE? It is true, sir, they have trampled upon the conditions of the act of 1838, set at defiance the will of the people, as expressed through the laws enacted by their Representatives; but, sir, they are not yet the people. No, sir, my countrymen are not yet ready to wear the yoke of bank bondage, and acknowledge the omnipotency of these soulless corporations.

Mr. Speaker, I entertain no feelings of hostility to the people of this District. My relations with them have been of the most friendly character, since I have been a resident of this city; and there are many here for whom I shall always cherish the warmest feelings of friendship and respect. But, sir, my regard for them will not deter me from exposing the vile practices of the banks which have been fastened upon them. I owe a duty to my constituents, which no personal considerations shall prevent me from discharging; and I assure gentlemen that no earthly power could induce me to vote for renewing the charters of these suspended banks.

I do not believe that sound policy would require the incorporation of banks in this District. You have here six banks, with a capital of about three millions, in a District containing a population of some forty-five thousand. The General Government annually pays out four or five times as much specie here as is necessary for the wants or commerce of the people; but you give to a few favorite individuals the power to stamp pictures on small bits of paper, call it money, and send them into circulation, to the exclusion of the precious metals—the gold and silver is driven out of the District, and carried to New York or Philadelphia, for exportation. The Bank of the United States, according to a report now before me, exported to England, two and a half millions of specie, from the 1st August, 1839, to the 1st January, 1840. I believe that bank has, during the last fourteen months, exported about eight millions of specie, whilst during a portion of that time it has been refusing to redeem its bills at home. This state of things will always exist, so long as the legislation of the country sanctions a suspension of specie payments, and authorizes the issue of irredeemable paper.

But we are told that the banks in this District will resume when the banks in Virginia and Maryland do, and the banks in those States tell us they will resume when the banks in Pennsylvania resume. They are all too modest to commence; and the consequence is, the work is not begun. The friends of this bill say, impose restrictions upon them, and compel them to resume. Sir, I have no confidence in these restrictions. You might as well attempt to fasten a giant with a rope of sand, as to limit the powers of these incorporations. Legislative restrictions may answer for the people, but the banks will, as they have already done, laugh at your credulity. You may impose as many restrictions as you please, but they will treat your law with the contempt they did the act of 1838. Congress then required them to redeem their notes in specie; they violated that condition. Congress required them to issue no notes of a less denomination than five dollars; they evaded that restriction, by issuing six, seven, eight, and nine dollar bills—thus making mere sport of your legislation. It is high time that the people of this country were fully apprized of the unlimited power claimed and exercised by these incorporations. If they would perpetuate their liberties, they must take care that they create no institutions superior to the laws.

We have been informed that, when we come to legislate for the District of Columbia, we ought not to look beyond the limits of the District! Sir, the paper which you authorize these banks to issue is not confined in its circulation to this District. It makes its way into the different States, particularly Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Maryland; and we certainly owe it to the people of those States not to authorize a currency to be issued which will be irredeemable in their hands. Besides, the discounts of these banks are by no means confined to this District. On the 1st March, 1836, the amount loaned by these banks to non-residents was $543,270 08, being $230,854 38 more than the amount loaned to private citizens in the District. Thus you will see they extend their operations into the adjacent States. In addition to this, we are now standing before the whole nation; and our action on this question, if in accordance with what I conceive to be right and justice, may exercise a beneficial influence over the State Governments, many of which have run wild in these paper schemes. We can at least say to them, that we will not establish the precedent of renewing the charters of suspended banks, and enable them to flood the country with more paper, when they are refusing to redeem what they have already thrown into circulation.

The bill now before the House, with the amendment, places it in such a shape that I cannot vote for it, although I do not feel disposed to complain of those who do; for it differs in many essential particulars from the one defeated on yesterday. I cannot, however, see how any man, who is sincerely desirous of effecting a reformation in the banking system, could support the bill as it originally came to this House; for that bill did not attempt to enforce a resumption. Honest differences of opinion will exist, upon questions of this sort, among men of the same political party, and I certainly have no disposition to prescribe a course for others to pursue. My only object has been, to place myself right before the people, and discharge what I conceive to be my duty. Having done that, I return my thanks to the House for their attention.

Several gentlemen having followed in favor of the bill,

Mr. DUNCAN obtained the floor and spoke as follows:

He was highly pleased that this measure had come before Congress, for two reasons. The first was, that it gave the friends of the Administration an opportunity of exposing to the world the true position which they occupy in relation to banks and the banking policy. The second was, that the votes taken, and about to be taken, exposed to the world the extent to which the British Bank Whig party would go in fastening upon this country and this people the banking system, and an irredeemable shinplaster currency.

Yes, sir, I am happy that this opportunity has been offered, to show them, in black and white, by recorded votes, who are the shinplaster-rag-baron party. I am happy the Democracy have had this opportunity to expose, through the medium of the National Legislature, records of the true principles which govern them in relation to the general system and policy of banking. It has been charged upon the Administration and the Democratic party that one of their leading and favorite measures is to prostrate the banks, and entirely destroy the credit system and paper currency, and to establish a purely metallic currency for all purposes, private and public, domestic and commercial. That charge I pronounce here, in my place, a wilful falsehood, and a base slander upon the Administration and its supporters.

I assert, that in relation to banks and a paper currency, the Democratic party and the Administration, who are nothing more nor less than their representatives, have no intention beyond a reformation in both; and the votes given on the bill to continue in force the charters incorporating the banks in the District of Columbia, will prove what I assert. It is not my purpose now to go into a definition of banks, or to illustrate the principles of banking, paper currency and the credit system. I rise more for the purpose of repelling some charges made against Congress, and more particularly against the Democratic party of this Congress, in relation to the course of legislation for the District of Columbia.

But, to return to the bill to continue the bank charters, &c. The following bill from the Senate, was reported to the House:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the charters of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, the Bank of the Metropolis, Patriotic Bank of Washington, and Bank of Washington, in the city of Washington, and the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, and Bank of Potomac, in the town of Alexandria, be, and the same are hereby extended to the 4th day of July, 1842, unless Congress shall, in the mean time, otherwise order and direct, upon condition that neither of said banks shall issue and pay out the notes of any other bank, banker, or banking institution or corporation, which is in a state of suspension or non payment of its liabilities in specie; and upon the further condition that the said banks, nor either of them, shall take a stay of execution on any judgment recovered against them in any case whatever, nor appeal from such judgment, nor take a certiorari thereon, except on an affidavit of merit."

To this bill several amendments were offered. I shall only notice three or four of them, and the character of the votes given. The first amendment was to prohibit the banks from issuing notes of a less denomination than ten dollars. The vote on that amendment was yeas 110, nays 94; the almost entire Democracy voting in the affirmative, and, I believe, the entire Opposition voting in the negative.

The next amendment which I deem necessary to notice, was a proviso that the notes of the said banks should, at all times, be redeemable in specie, or that, on failure thereof, the charters should be forfeited; and the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 76; the Democracy voting in the affirmative; and the Opposition in the negative. The next important amendment in order was—

And be further enacted, That in case the said banks, or either of them, shall refuse or fail to pay their notes in specie on demand of any person, such person shall and may have remedy by judgment and execution at law, at a notice of ten days, before any justice of the peace of said District."

The question was taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 76; the Democracy voting in the affirmative, and the Opposition in the negative. Next amendment:

"Provided, also, That the president and directors of each of said banks shall be jointly and severally, in their individual capacity, liable for all notes issued, or debts contracted, by said banks respectively, from and after the day this act goes into effect, to be recovered as other debts of like amount may at the time be by law recoverable."

And resulted in the affirmative—yeas 92, nays 90; the Democracy voting in the affirmative, and the Opposition in the negative. Next amendment:

"And be it further provided, That said banks shall not make any dividends during the time the said banks shall refuse to pay all their liabilities in specie on demand."

And it was passed in the affirmative—yeas 145, nays 25. On this amendment the Opposition were divided—a part of them voting with the Democracy, who all voted for it, and a part of them against it. The question then turned on the following amendments, viz:

"And the president and directors of any of said banks, who shall make any such division of profits, or declare any such dividends, or consent to or vote for the same, shall be liable to pay double the amount of the sum so divided or declared, to be recovered of them in their individual capacity, by any person suing for the same, as debts of like amount are recoverable; one half of said forfeiture to go to the person suing, and the other half to the corporation where the said bank is located.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That justices of the peace within the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction in all actions of debt against any of the banks whose charters are hereby extended, for sums not exceeding one hundred dollars; and no appeal, certiorari, or injunction, shall be allowed, granted, issued, or directed, by any court within said District, unless an affidavit be first made and filed in said court by the president, or one or more of the directors of the banks so sued, that such an appeal, certiorari, or injunction, is not asked for the purpose of delay, but because he or they believe there is a just defence on the merits, and that injustice is likely to be done, if said appeal, certiorari, or injunction, should not be granted."

The question was taken on the above branch, and it was agreed to by—yeas 94, nays 78; the Democracy voting in the affirmative, and the Opposition in the negative.

The question was then taken on the final passage of the bill as amended, and was decided in the negative as follows, viz: yeas 69, nays 90. This was a mixed vote; but the failure of the bill must be attributed to the bank Whig party—had they all voted for the bill, it would have been passed by a large majority. They refused to vote for the bill, because of the amendments. I regret that the bill did not pass with the amendments and restrictions which were made to it; it would have served to show that it is the object of the Democracy to reform the banks and the paper currency, and not their object to prostrate one or destroy the other. As it is, it serves to show that, while it is the object of the Democratic party to place the banking institutions in the same situation in which other institutions and private individuals are placed as to public and legal responsibility, by which the individual community and every other interest of the country may be secured from frauds and oppression, it also shows that it is the policy and principles of the Bank Whig party to overspread the country with bank corporations, and bestow upon them such privileges and powers as enable them to set the laws at defiance, rob the people, and laugh to scorn their indignation at violated justice. I ask the honest, the candid, and the patriotic man to examine the amendments which were adopted by a majority of this House. Is there one of them the security of the public does not demand? Is there one that past experience does not require? Or is there one that an honest banking institution, that intended to conduct its business in a faithful, honorable, and upright manner, would, for a moment, repudiate? None, sir.

Sir, I hope no man now living may ever see the day when a bank shall be incoporated in this country without all the restrictions which were adopted as amendments to the bill in question, and one more in addition; that is, that no stockholder shall be permitted to borrow from a bank in which he holds stock. There is something superlatively inconsistent, dangerous, and ridiculous, in incorporating an association of individuals as money lenders, and permitting them to be the greatest borrowers themselves of the currency of their own creation. Such an institution and such a privilege are doubly dangerous and doubly fatal to all civil rights, and every principle of equality. In the first place, such an association has the power of making currency, and in the second place, the individuals of the association have the power to monopolize the loans of that currency, and the consequent power to monopolize all the trade within their reach. But, sir, I must not get into a discussion of the principles of banking and its evil consequences. Such was not my object, when I rose.

The member from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] stated that those who introduced the amendments, and those who sustained them, acted without responsibility—no member here dare take such a course in his State Legislature in relation to the banks in his State, &c. Sir, I (said Mr. D.) dare take such a course in my State were I a member of her Legislature; and I undertake to say, that no member of my State, in a representative capacity, dare take any other course, or dare give any other vote than has been given on this bill by the Democratic party. Such is the public feeling, and such the public determination in Ohio, in favor of the reform of bank abuses. If I mistake not, the last day of bank monopoly and exclusive privileges is near at hand. The people of this country have waked up to a sense of their danger. They now see their liberties undermining their free institutions shaken to the centre, and their life blood lapped by more than nine hundred worthless, swindling, rotten, irresponsible bank corporations, as by so many hungry hyenas, who prey upon the liberties of this country, and fatten on the spoils of honest labor. But, sir, we are yet free; and it will be found in the coming contest that there is yet intelligence and patriotism enough, blended with an unpurchaseable spirit of Democracy, to repel the corrupt and insidious invaders from our soil. I do not wish to be understood in this denunciation as embracing any bank or banks which have honestly and faithfully managed the trust reposed in them.

Sir, the American Democracy will never sacrifice their blood-purchased liberties at the shrine of bank cupidity. They will laugh to scorn, derision and contempt, your pitiful howl and your demagogical cry of panic and distress.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] tells us, in substance, that desolation, ruin, and blight, rest upon the people of this District; poverty, extreme poverty, rests upon them; and biting hunger and squalid wretchedness stare them in the face; and the only relief to which they look is in the recharter of their banks; and that the whole mass of the people of the District are now appealing in frantic despair to us to recharter their banks. And he asks, in a sympathetic tone, will we, can we, deny them? Now, sir, the gentleman's allegations contain two assertions. I deny both of them. I deny that poverty and desolation rest upon the people of the District of Columbia; I deny that biting hunger and squalid wretchedness stare them in the face. I believe that the people in this District are about as well off and as comfortable in their circumstances as the people of this country generally are. And if they are the spirited, high minded people I take them to be, they will repudiate the man who attempts to hold them up to public gaze as subjects of poverty and pity. If I were a member of this society and a citizen of this District, I would publicly denounce the man as a calumniator and a slanderer, who would give the people of the District such a character as the gentleman from Georgia has done, I care not what might be his motives. But, for the sake of argument, we will suppose for a moment that the degraded account that gentleman has given of the people and the District is true. Could the most fruitful and ingenious mind imagine or invent a stronger argument against continuing the District banks? If it is true that poverty and squalid wretchedness have made their abode in this District, may it not be fairly be attributed to the influence of the banks? and, if so, why should the gentleman desire to continue such institutions and such a policy, which have brought such blight and ruin upon this people, which he sings in such melancholy melodies?

Sir, let us bring up and present to public gaze, and, I think, astonishment, the history of banks and banking in this District; and, though the history may astonish, the fact that the people are left as sound and solvent as they are, will be equally astonishing to at least those who understand and have witnessed the blighting effects of unrestrained banking.

With the assistance of an able statistical financial officer of the Treasury Department, I have been able to cull the following synopsis from the history of banking in the District of Columbia.

Acts for incorporating the six banks that recently applied for an extension of their charters, were first passed at the following dates: Bank of Washington, February 15, 1811; Bank of Potomac, Alexandria, February 16, 1811; Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, February 16, 1811; Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, March 3, 1817; Bank of the Metropolis, Washington, March 3, 1817; Patriotic Bank, Washington, March 3, 1817.

On the 4th of May, 1820, an act was passed extending to the 1st of June, 1821, the charters of the several incorporated banks in the District of Columbia, then paying specie. It is believed that all the above mentioned banks were included in the provisions of that law.

On the 21 of March, 1821, an act was passed extending the charters of all these banks to the 3d of March, 1836.

February 9, 1836, an act was passed to extend their charters to the 1st of October, 1836.

July 2, 1836, an act was passed to extend their charters until the 4th of July, 1838.

May 31, 1838, an act was passed to extend their charters to the 4th of July, 1840.

It thus appears that the charters of all these banks have been extended five several times.

Several of these banks commenced operations before charters were granted to them. Blodget, in his Economica, speaks of the Bank of Potomac as instituted in 1804. The stockholders of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown associated in the year 1814; those of the Bank of the Metropolis and of the Patriotic Bank, in 1814 or 1815. The act of incorporation recognises them as already in existence.

In August, 1814, the Bank of Washington, the Bank of Potomac, and the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, suspended specie payments. The Bank of the Metropolis, the Patriotic Bank, and the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, cannot be said to have suspended, because they, if I am correctly informed, commenced operations by paying inconvertible paper.

In 1834, the Bank of Washington, the Patriotic Bank, and the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, suspended specie payments, and resumed again in the same year.

In May, 1837, all the six banks suspended specie payments, except the Bank of Washington, which, having but few notes out, continued to pay specie for them.

In October, 1839, they again all suspended specie payments, except the Patriotic Bank, which, having but few notes out, continued to pay specie for them.

The exceptions in 1837 and 1839 were rather nominal than real, as these two banks received deposites of inconvertible paper, and traded on the same.

It thus appears that all these banks have been three times, and some of them four times, in a state in which they did not pay their circulation and deposites in specie.

The capitals of these banks, according to the reports made by them on or near January 1, 1840, were as follows:

Banks.	Capital paid in.	Held by the bank.	Nett capital.
Bank of the Metropolis - -	$500,000	$16,845	$483,155
Patriotic Bank - -	250,000	78,255	171,745
Bank of Washington - -	359,840	77,206	182,634
Farmers' and Mechanics Bank -	485,900	148,545	337,355
Bank of Potomac - -	353,900	–	353,900
Farmers' Bank of Alexandria -	310,000	183,900	126,100
Total - -	2,259,640	504,751	1,654,889

Besides these banks, there have existed in the District of Columbia the following institutions: Bank of Alexandria, incorporated in 1792; Bank of Columbia, Georgetown, incorporated in 1793; Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria and Union Bank of Georgetown, incorporated in 1811; Central Bank of Washington, incorporated in 1817; Real Estate Bank of Washington, incorporated in 1817; Union Bank of Alexandria, incorporated in 1817; Franklin Bank of Alexandria, incorporated in 1817; Merchants' Bank of Alexandria.

The last does not appear to have been incorporated. The Union Bank of Alexandria was, about the year 1822, consolidated with the Bank of Potomac. The Union Bank of Georgetown is now winding up its affairs. All the others in this list appear to have failed; and by the failure of some of them, Government and individuals sustained great losses.

Some very interesting particulars respecting the present banks will be found in a report made to the House of Representatives by the Hon. F. Thomas, of Maryland. That report is contained in House doc. No. 800, 24th Congress, 1st session, made June 20, 1836. The able and clear expose of bank frauds, depravity, and corruption, does honor to the head and the heart of the author of the report; but its disclosures fix eternal infamy upon some of the banks, and those who conducted them. I am sorry my time will not permit me to make an expose of some of their frauds a part of my remarks. I wish the whole American people could see and read that document—I think the deathknell of banking on the present system would be sounded.

I will leave the above history for the comment of those who may read me. But I have heard, since the above was prepared, that all the banks now in this District were at liberty to increase their capital to five hundred thousand dollars each. If such is the fact, the aggregate amount of bank capital is three millions of dollars. A pretty round sum for a small District of ten miles square, with a population of not more than forty thousand, men, women, and children, black and white, all told; and a District, too, that exports little or nothing, comparatively; and imports little or nothing, but what is consumed within its limits.

Now, sir, it is fair to presume that the stock has been honestly and fairly paid in, and that the banks have discounted, as they are at liberty to do, on the whole amount of stock: perhaps, if not on their capital, they have discounted upon deposites to the amount of their capital, which is the same for all purposes to those who have been accommodated, and for the purpose of the calculation I am about to make. I suppose, also, in common with other banks, they have the right to discount three dollars in rag promises to every dollar they have in capital paid in. Taking these suppositions as a basis, what amount of bank capital, paper issues, and profits on bank stock, will the people of the District have enjoyed per annum, for good or for evil?

Bank capital - - -	$3,000,000
Issues on capital, three to one -	9,000,000
Profits per annum, at six per cent.	540,000

To what a noble extent the people of this District have enjoyed the privileges of banking, and what heaps of money they have made by that glorious British system! and yet, like the people from whom we have borrowed it, (according to the gentleman from Georgia,) they are writhing in the agonies of poverty; and when, by the history I have exhibited, they have had the full and unrestrained benefits of banks, paper currency, and credit system for more than a quarter of a century, why is it that this people are now reduced to this deplorable condition of poverty, panic, and ruin, in which the Georgia gentleman describes them? And that, too, by the very system and policy which the gentleman and his party are endeavoring again to fasten upon them. For I challenge any other cause to be successfully assigned than that of the banking policy, and the evils and calamities in which it will drag any people, where it has its unrestrained sway. Why, then, shall a system be urged upon a people, with renewed force, now withering and languishing under its curse?

I have a curiosity to know how many banks, how much bank capital, and how much rag currency, the Bank Whigs would be willing to spread over this country, if they could have their way; and which, I presume, they would do, if they had the control of this Government.

Let us take their representative action here to guide us (and I presume there will be nothing unfair in it,) and let us illustrate by the quantity of territory in this District, and the amount of bank capital and paper currency which they are now endeavoring to establish.

This District is ten miles square, and contains one hundred square miles. There is one million of square miles inhabited in the United States. This can be illustrated by the Single Rule of Three:

If one hundred square miles requires six banks, what will one million square miles require?

I think the answer will be 60,000.

Yes, sir; the Whigs would establish 60,000 banks in this country.

How much bank capital? That can be tried by the same rule.

If forty thousand people (the population of the District of Columbia) require three millions of bank capital (the amount in the District of Columbia,) what amount of bank capital will fifteen millions of people (the amount of population of the United States) require?

The answer will be $1,125,000,000.

Yes, sir; by the Whig policy we would have eleven hundred and twenty-five millions of bank capital in this country. But how much paper currency would we have? Why, of course three times the amount of bank capital: that would be $3,375,000,000. Yes, sir, the amount of rag currency we would have in the United States and the Territories thereof would be three billions three hundred and seventy-five millions. What a happy people we would be under Whig bank reign! How rich, too, we would be!

Let us see what our annual income would be at six per cent. on the whole amount of currency. The answer is, $202,500,000.

Yes, sir, our annual income would be two hundred and two millions five hundred thousand dollars. What a rich people we would be! Who would be such a fool or an ass as to work or toil in this country? What glorious times we will have when this thick-headed, stupid Administration is put down, and Whig Bank Federalism comes into power! And strange as it may appear, we would accumulate this vast wealth off of each other. I once heard of a celebrated gambler who taught his four sons the art of gambling so adroitly that they could each make off of each other ten dollars every night. I thought that was a strange kind of legerdemain. That man and his sons were fools, when compared with the Bank Whigs of this day: our gamblers could give them six in the game, and beat them in "seven up."

The Carthagenians were a trading people. They lived by trading. They became a wealthy nation and a rich people; but it was not by trading and speculating off of each other. Their wealth was acquired by commercial trade. By their superiority in commerce, the wealth of all nations flowed into their coffers. But the policy of our bank Whigs has the superiority of dispensing wealth and affluence among those from whom it is collected.

I deny the second proposition of the gentleman from Georgia, viz: "The whole population of the District of Columbia are praying for a renewal of the bank charters," &c. What evidence have we that the people want the banks continued at all? A petition has been paraded here with two hundred and forty-four names, all told, who ask for a continuation of the bank charters. We have a right to presume that all the rest of the citizens are either indifferent or are opposed to the recharter.

We have been told, if we don't recharter the District banks, we will destroy the people of the adjoining counties in Virginia and Maryland. That is no argument at all. We have nothing to do with the people or their circumstances of Virginia and Maryland when we are legislating for the District of Columbia. The people of Virginia and Maryland have Legislatures of their own perfectly competent to legislate for them. And besides, we have no power to establish banks in the District of Columbia for the people of Virginia or Maryland, or of any other State. Our powers of incorporation are limited to this District, and for the benefit of the people of the District; and even that power is seriously disputed by many eminent and talented statesmen.

It has been said, in opposition to the amendment to require the banks to resume specie payment, that they ought not to be compelled to resume until the banks of Virginia and Maryland resume. If that argument is good, the banks in this country never will resume.

When the banks of Virginia and Maryland apply for recharter when under suspension of specie payment, it will be urged that the resumption of payment ought not to be made a condition of their recharter, because the banks of the District of Columbia are not paying specie. So with the banks of Pennsylvania; when they apply for recharter, resumption with them ought not to be a condition, because the banks of Virginia and Maryland are under suspension; and so it will go throughout the twenty-six States, and the Territories will also catch the miserable excuse to perpetuate their miserable frauds. Such an argument is "felo de se;" it destroys itself. Such an argument is worthy of the corrupt and fraudulent institutions which it is used to support. They and the argument are alike rotten—both will tumble together.

The member from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] denounces the ungenerous course pursued toward the unfortunate people of the District, who have no Representative on this floor. The fact that they have no immediate Representative here, is a strong argument in favor of a liberal course on the part of Congress toward them. Now, sir, let us examine the records, and see what Congress has done for "this poor, neglected, and unfortunate people!" In order to measure my duty toward the District of Columbia, and to be able to judge more correctly how far I might be at liberty to appropriate the proceeds of my constituents' toil and sweat to the people of this District, on whom Congress is bound to bestow nothing more than upon any other district, county, or State in the Union, nor are they at liberty to do so; I say, in order to measure my duty, I gave my attention to the collection of some figures and facts. I like figures and facts; they look a man in the face; but, what is better, the people understand them; schoolboys can read them to their parents on a rainy day, or in a long night, by the light of the shellbark. So, sir, I found the following:

1800.	Flag footways from Georgetown to the Capitol		$10,000 00
1802.	Jail in Washington		8,000 00

Yes, sir, three millions two hundred and three thousand and sixty-one dollars and thirty-nine cents has been drawn from the public crib, and been given to the "poor, abused, and neglected people" of the District of Columbia, over whose misfortunes we have heard such piteous howling; and be it remembered, too, that the above appropriations have been made for the benefit of the District and its citizens—for the improvement of their property and advancement of its value, every dollar of which has been spent among them, and every dollar of which they have received, over and above the many millions which have been expended within the District for public improvements and public buildings. Sir, I have no hesitation in saying that the above appropriations were made, if not in direct violation of the Constitution, by usurpation unwarranted by the Constitution, in violation of the people's rights, and contrary to every principle of common justice that should secure to them the proceeds of their industry and toil. Congress is as much at liberty and as much bound to appropriate the same proportion of money to every other inhabited district of ten miles square within the the United States, or to appropriate in proportion to every other population of forty thousand.

Let us see what the amount of appropriations would be if Congress mete out the same liberality to the American people generally which has been fraudulently donated to the "poor people of the District of Columbia"—fraudulent I say, for every dollar which Congress appropriates to be expended in the District of Columbia not necessary for public and Government improvements, is fraudulently taken from the people; it is swindling them, and a robbery of their Treasury. But now for the calculation. The District of Columbia contains one hundred square miles; the inhabited part of the United States and Territories contain, in round numbers, one million square miles. If the District of Columbia, which contains one hundred square miles, has received three millions of dollars in gratuitous donations out of the public Treasury, what should the Territory of the United States receive, which contains one million square miles. The answer is the number of territories would be, when divided, ten thousand, and ten thousand territories multiplied by three millions (the amount given to the District of Columbia) will show the enormous sum of $30,000,000,000.

Yes, sir, if Congress had extended their appropriations to every inhabited territory of one hundred square miles in the United States and Territories that are equally entitled, the amount would be thirty billions of dollars. Or if you prefer a pro rata appropriation by population, I will give you that. I have stated the population of the District to be forty thousand. I believe the population of the United States and Territories to be fifteen millions. The question will then be, if forty thousand people in this District have received three millions of dollars of the public money by gratuitous appropriations, what should fifteen millions of people receive, who are equally entitled? The answer is, $11,250,000,000. The pro rata appropriation, if justice were done to the people, would be eleven billions two hundred and fifty millions of dollars. I hear the answer: A gentleman says there are no funds. Then, I say, cease to plunder the public Treasury of the proceeds of honest labor. Cease to swindle the community by appropriating millions of their money to those who have no claims upon either them or you. I have presented this calculation by round numbers. I have made it on three millions of dollars. The actual amount appropriated to the people of this District exceeds that sum by two hundred and three thousand and sixty-one dollars. This I have done to prevent cavilling about any portions of the appropriations which it might be said were made for public purposes.

Mr. Speaker, I have not made this expose for the mere purpose of meeting the charge of ungenerous and contracted legislation toward the District of Columbia. I have made it for the public eye, and the public use. I have made it with a hope that the people will hereafter call their representatives to account, when, in violation of their rights, their money is drawn annually by hundreds of thousands in the face of justice, and bestowed upon those who have no claims upon them.

Sir, I assert that there is no other territory of ten miles square in this Union, that is inhabited, that does not require as much bank capital as this District. The limited commerce of the District, and the vast appropriations which are expended in it, will sustain me in that assertion.

I will present the expenditures of one year. I will present the expenditures of 1834; a year not extraordinary for expenditures. I believe that the expenditures of 1834 will be found to be about the average annual expenditure of this District for the last ten or twelve years. The expenditures which I now display are made in this District. The money is paid out, and four-fifths of it laid out here; and every man, woman, and child, receives his, her, or its proportion, according to the usual rules of currency distribution.

Here, sir, is an extract exhibiting the expenditures of money in the District of Columbia for 1834. (House Doc. No. 27, 2d session, 23d Congress, page 58; also House Doc. No. 39, 1st session, 24th Congress.) But here is the paper. Look at it. It is covered with thousands, hundreds of thousands, and millions. It would seem as if the lavish distribution of millions of money is calculated to make a people happy and prosperous. "The poor and distressed people of the District of Columbia" are that people. But now for the paper and the figures:

Expenditures in the District of Columbia for the year 1834.

On account of special and civil appropriations - - -	$2,013,000
Pensions paid out in District of Columbia - - -	11,000
Navy, paid out in district of Columbia	400,000
Army and Indian Department, paid out in District of Columbia -	550,000
Debt for District of Columbia -	250,000
Miscellaneous - - -	500,000
Foreign intercourse, paid out in District of Columbia - -	100,000

In order to show the amount of money which is actually distributed among the people of this District in one year, and which constitutes a part of their circulating medium, I will do as the Secretary of the Treasury has done—I will deduct one-fifth, or twenty per cent. as the sum which may be expended out of the District, and there will remain $3,059,200. Yes, sir, the circulating medium which the Government furnishes to this small District, and "this poor and distressed people," amounts to the sum of three millions fifty-nine thousand and two hundred dollars. What a flood of money for forty thousand people! and all that, too, in the rino dino, the silver grays, and the "Tom Benton yellow humbugs"—I mean the hard cash, or its equivalent. I believe I am safe in saying the whole amount of imports and exports of this District per annum will not exceed one-sixth part of the amount of the appropriations made and expended in it. What, then, I ask, makes it necessary to incorporate six banks, with three millions of capital, in the District of Columbia? What makes a bank necessary at all in the District of Columbia? Let us distribute, by calculation, a proportionate amount of circulating medium to the inhabited part of this country, and see what the amount of currency would be. We will again apply to the good old rule of three. The question presents itself thus: If one hundred square miles (the number of square miles in the District of Columbia) receive three millions fifty-nine thousand two hundred dollars, for a circulating medium annually, what would one million of square miles receive, at the same proportion? Answer, $30,592,000,000. Yes, sir; if there were an equal distribution of circulating medium over the whole populated territory of this country, which the District of Columbia receives annually, we would have an annual flood of thirty billions five hundred and ninety-two millions of dollars. Who, with a sound head and an honest heart, would say we ought to have banks to triple that amount? So much for a territorial calculation. Now for a calculation by population. Let us again walk into the rule of three. If the population of the District of Columbia (40,000) receives annually three millions fifty-nine thousand two hundred dollars, for a circulating medium, what would the whole population (15,000,000) of this country receive, by the same proportion? Answer, $1,147,175,000.

So, sir, calculating by population, an equal supply of currency, annually, to the whole population of this country, with that received by the population of this District, would amount to one billion one hundred and forty-seven millions one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars. What a flood of currency would inundate this people! Who, that did not want to see this country corrupted as all Greece was corrupted with the gold of Persia, would want to see it tripled by bank issues? I believe, in relation to trade and currency, it is generally conceded, that the necessary amount of the latter depends upon the quantity of the former. The demand for the currency is, to a great extent, regulated by the quantity of exports and imports, as well with reference to a country, a State, or a country, as to a district. Now, let us see what proportion the amount of currency which the Government furnishes for the District of Columbia, annually, bears to the commerce or the aggregate amount of exports and imports.

For the year 1834, House Document No. 184, 2d session, 23d Congress, shows the aggregate amount of exports and imports, foreign and domestic, to and from the United States, to be worth $230,858,305.

The same document shows the aggregate amount of exports and imports through the ports of the District of Columbia, foreign and domestic, to be worth $1,016,653. Two-thirds of the exports and imports making that sum, came to and went from the States of Virginia and Maryland, received and charged through the ports of Alexandria and Georgetown, D. C. which would leave but $338,886 of exports and imports for the District of Columbia.

Now, sir, if commerce to the amount of three hundred and thirty-eight thousand eight hundred and eighty-six dollars requires a circulating medium to the amount of three millions (the sum furnished to the District of Columbia, annually, by the Government,) what amount of circulating medium will the whole amount of commerce of the United States annually require—that is, what will commerce to the amount of two hundred and thirty millions eight hundred and fifty-eight thousand three hundred and five dollars require? The sum, worked by the simple rule of three, answers $2,043,681,105. Yes, sir; a proportionate amount of currency for the annual commerce of this country, compared with the amount of annual currency furnished the District of Columbia for its commerce, would amount to two billions forty-three millions six hundred and eighty-one thousand one hundred and five dollars. And who would want to see that amount tripled by bank issues?

I maintain, that the people of the District of Columbia want a bank about as much as a cart wants a third wheel. I voted for the Senate bill, as amended by the House, to continue the bank charters, not because I thought it necessary, but because some of the citizens thought their continuation necessary, and because the balance of the citizens did not expressly remonstrate. I also voted for the bill as amended, because I was anxious to see a bank chartered upon the true Democratic principles of equality, and to demonstrate to the people of this country, that it is bank reform, and not bank destruction, that the Democratic party seek.

Let me conclude, by again repelling the assertion, that lean poverty and hungry distress rest upon the people of this District, and that ruin and desolation must be their fate, unless their bank charters are continued. There is no such poverty in this District. The people, I believe, are generally in easy circumstances. They are characteristic for frolic, mirth, and gayety. They live well themselves, and entertain strangers magnificently. Splendid parties and sumptuous entertainments are the order of the day and the amusements of the night. It is slandering this people to say they are the hungry objects of pity and the humble supplicants of Government bounty. But if the gentleman from Georgia, and his party, are sincere in their piteous lamentations over the ruin, distress, and poverty, which they may think prevail in this District, it seems to me, a well-directed judgment, and a due regard to experience, would dictate a different course of policy. A great disproportion of bank capital and paper currency has prevailed here for more than twenty-five years; and by the gentleman's showing, its effects have been most disastrous. Now, if the gentleman would go to work as a skilful physician would do, he would withhold banks and banking policy for fifteen or twenty years from the District; for of all remedies for the cure of a disease, there is none so valuable as the removal of the cause.

Sir, when I deny that it is not the principles of the Democratic party to destroy the banks, suppress all paper currency, and establish a pure metallic currency, I speak with reference to the present pecuniary embarrassments of the country, and the unfortunate manner in which the people and the institutions of the country are at this time involved with, and by, the banks. If the question of banks were a new one, I believe I risk nothing in saying that the entire Democracy of this country would oppose the chartering of banks on any terms. I I also believe, that, with our present experience of the evils of a paper currency, without reference to our embarrassments or debts, a large majority of the Democracy would oppose the introduction of any other than a metallic currency for the ordinary purposes of business. But under our present political system, and the freedom of our institutions, banks of deposite and exchange will exist, and banks of issue may exist. To all this the Democracy do not object, provided the people are not deprived of their reserved rights and privileges, the country overspread with a privileged order of irresponsible associations and bank monopolies, and the whole face of the country periodically blighted with an inundation of irredeemable and worthless shinplaster currency. Equal rights, equal privileges, equal protection to all, and a sound currency, is the motto of Democracy.

REMARKS OF MR. WATTERSON,

OF TENNESSEE.

In the House of Representatives, May 2, 1840—In reply to the attack upon him by his colleague, Mr. GENTRY.

Mr. SPEAKER: In justice to myself, I would ask the kind indulgence of the House, for a short time, whilst I reply to some of the remarks which have fallen from my colleague.

He has charged me with an abandonment of the principles which I professed when an humble supporter of a distinguished citizen of my own State for the Presidency, who, I regret as much as any member upon this floor, is now no more. He is in his grave, sir. There let him rest. I would be the last man upon the face of the earth to disturb his ashes. And if the shroud which surrounds him is to be torn off, the sin be not upon my head. I will leave my colleague to the left, [Mr. GENTRY,] and his prompter to the right, [Mr. BELL,] hyena like, to grabble up the sod which covers him. I shall not be provoked, even in self defence, to say aught against the dead.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that I was a fast friend to Judge White in the last Presidential election; but it is not true, as has been alleged by my colleague, that I availed myself of the tide which set in his favor, and by it was wafted into the Legislature of Tennessee, in 1835. At that election, all my competitors were for White, as well as myself, and we but seldom discussed either his claims or those of Mr. Van Buren. When, however, we did speak upon the subject, we invariably said to the people: White is one of our own cherished citizens; the principles which he professes and has always acted upon, are our principles; he is an able, consistent, and sincere supporter of the present Administration, (Jackson's,) and we have every assurance, if elected, that he will carry out its leading measures: therefore, we prefer him to any other man But at the same time we declared that Mr. Van Buren was our second choice; that he belonged to the same party with which we were proud to act; that he held to the same doctrines and opinions, on all great political questions, which Jefferson, Madison, and our own patriot Jackson, held to; and that, should ever the contest settle down between him and Mr. Clay, or Mr. Webster, or Harrison, or any man of the old Opposition party, we would not hesitate to give him our cordial support. Yes, sir, these were our declarations and professions. None of us rode, or attempted to ride, upon the current of Judge White's popularity, or that of any other individual. The election turned upon different grounds. And here permit me to remark, that, notwithstanding I was but little more than eligible to a seat in the Legislature, yet I received more than three-fourths of all the votes polled in the county—the largest county in the State, and, I am happy to add, my native county, sir. Can my colleague say as much? If not, he should be a little more particular, hereafter, how he makes round assertions, unsupported by the facts of the case.

Mr. Speaker, I ask, was Judge White run in Tennessee as an Opposition, or Whig candidate? On the contrary, did not his leading friends hold him up, not only as a Jackson man, but the better Jackson man? And did they not also profess to be the ardent supporters of Jackson's administration? Nay, sir, did not my colleague himself declare under the sanctity of an oath, that he believed Judge White would be more certain to carry out the "principal measures" of Jackson's administration, than Mr. Van Buren, or any other individual who "had been presented to the consideration of the American people for the Presidency," and give that as a reason why he should be nominated and supported by the Republican citizens of Tennessee? Has my colleague forgotten this? Has his memory, which is said to be the lowest attribute of the human mind, become impaired at so early a period of his life? Is it necessary for me to refresh his recollection? Whether it be or not, I shall proceed to do so, in my own vindication, against the unprovoked and pitiful assault he has been instigated to make upon me. I will exhibit facts, stubborn and undeniable facts—facts which will show who are the apostates—who have abandoned the principles they professed to entertain, when urging the people to enlist under the White banner.

I would first, sir, invite the attention of my colleague to a part of the preamble and resolutions of our Legislature in 1835, nominating Judge White a candidate for the Presidency, which he has made it convenient to overlook, whilst reading detached portions of the same, with the vain hope of establishing my inconsistency. The paragraph is in these words:

"And whereas no individual has been presented to the consideration of the American people as a candidate for the next Presidency, whose character and political opinions afford the same guarantee for the maintenance of these principles which brought General Jackson into office, and for carrying out the principal measures of his administration, and which so well accord with the political sentiments of the people of Tennessee, as set forth in this preamble, as our fellow citizen Hugh L. White, therefore,

"Resolved, That Hugh Lawson White be recommended to the people of the United States as a man eminently qualified to fill the office of President."

This part of the preamble, in the House of Representatives, was passed—yeas 56, nays 16; my colleague, MEREDITH P. GENTRY, and myself, voting in the affirmative. Thus, it appears, that we were both Jackson men then, and desired to see "the principal measures" of his administration carried out by his successor; and on that account, mainly, sustained by our votes the nomination of White for the Presidency, in the Legislature of Tennessee. Sir, I am still a Jackson man. I still approve of the "principal measures" of his administration. I am still associated with his friends. But where is my colleague? He is to be found in sweet communion with the Federalists and Abolitionists in this hall—the old revilers of Jackson—the most deadly enemies to the South and our Republican institutions. Yet he has the audacity to rise in his place, and brand others as apostates. Verily, brazen impudence will never cease.

Mr. Speaker, I have before me a speech made at Nashville in May, 1835, by another colleague, [Mr. BELL,] who, it is well known, had no slight agency in bringing forward and sustaining Judge White for the Presidency. From that speech I will read a few extracts, and would ask the House to observe in what glowing and eulogistic terms General Jackson and his administration are spoken of—what flaming Jackson men the friends of Judge White are represented to be:

"It cannot be objected, said he, that General Jackson or his administration is, or can be, seriously affected by a contest between two of his friends, (White and Van Buren,) for the succession. Gen. Jackson has been eminently successful and triumphant in all his measures. It is one of the happy consequences of his great success, that the friends of his administration may choose from among the whole number of his friends whom they prefer to succeed him, safely, and without danger to his administration. (Great cheering.")

Again:

"Opposition to the administration of General Jackson is the course which the worst enemies of Judge White desire his friends to adopt. They are so anxious upon this point, that they appear determined to have Judge White and his friends in opposition, whether they will or not. But, gentlemen, the friends of Judge White will adhere to General Jackson and his administration from consistency, and a respect for their own character, and because they will be supporting their own principles upon all questions properly administrative in their nature, which have arisen or are likely to arise. They know too well how to bestow their ammunition, to waste it by firing into a bomb-proof battery. (Great cheering.")

And again:

"It cannot be even plausibly objected that Judge White may not be expected to carry out the principles of the present Administration, so far as depends upon him; if we run a parallel between him and his competitor (Mr. Van Buren) upon this point, and calculate the probabilities, we shall find that the chances are in favor of Judge White. He has been consistent in the support of his present principles, and the principles of the Administration: his competitor has not. If it shall be said that the friends and supporters of Judge White are not likely to be such as will sustain his principles, I answer, that they are more likely to be homogeneous in sentiment than the supporters of Mr. Van Buren, as far as principle is concerned. Should Judge White prevail in the contest over his opponent, surely the great Democratic States which it is said will support Mr. Van Buren, will not desert their principles, because their favorite leader shall have lost his election. Their cherished Democratic principles will undoubtedly continue dear to them under the lead of Judge White. Unless, then, the great body of Mr. Van Buren's friends shall desert their principles, the Democracy of the country will still be triumphant. But we cannot suppose so great and so gross a defection from principle, at least in whole States; and so those fathers of the Democracy of the country, and who it is said are so much grieved at the prospect of a division in the Democratic ranks, may dry up their tears." (Cheers.)

[Here Mr. BELL arose and said his colleague was evidently making an attack upon him, and if he were permitted to proceed he hoped that he [Mr. BELL] would be allowed to reply.]

MR. WATTERSON continued. I am making no attack upon my colleague unless the reading of his own speech is an attack upon him. I am simply showing the position which he, as one of the leaders of the White party in Tennessee, maintained towards General Jackson and his administration. And, sir, before I take my seat, I will give evidence upon evidence, proving to a demonstration, that not only he, but many others in that State, who are now the fiercest in their denunciations against the Democratic party, were, in 1835, the loudest in their professions of Jacksonism.

The next witness which I will introduce is the Hon. Balie Peyton, well known, here and elsewhere, as one of Judge White's most able, zealous, and distinguished supporters. Let us hear his testimony. I find it in a speech made at a public dinner, which was given to him at Oxford, North Carolina, April 2, 1835. A friend by my side says it is the best speech that Mr. Peyton ever delivered.

It is charged (said Mr. Peyton) that Judge White "is the candidate of the Opposition, that he has separated himself from his friends, and that he has abandoned General Jackson. To gentlemen of the Jackson party here and elsewhere I have a right to speak, for I claim to be one of the most humble, yet one of the most ardent of General Jackson's friends; I have always been allowed to have at least as much zeal as discretion in every thing which concerned him. I was early taught to revere him as one of the patriarchs who achieved our frontier independence; I was born, raised, and live within a few miles of the Hermitage. Gen. Jackson is associated with many endearing recollections. He and my father toiled together in the same common cause; they went through the Indian war side by side, and ever afterwards they were friends. In the late war, my brothers were volunteers in his army, followed him to victory, and one of them to his grave. Since I have been capable of forming an opinion, and judging for myself, my attachment to the man, my confidence in his principles, and admiration for his virtues, his patriotism, his chivalry, and his political course, have increased.

"To gentlemen of the Jackson party here and elsewhere I will say, that if these charges were true—if a doubt existed in my mind of their utter want of all foundation in fact—nay, if I did not know that it was absolutely impossible for them to be true, I would be ashamed not only to ask you to support Judge White for such an office as the Presidency of the United States, but I would turn from him myself as a HYPOCRITE and DESERTER.

"Judge White the candidate of the Opposition! Judge White abandon those principles upon which he has acted through life! Who presented him to the American People? Who first unfurled the White banner, an emblem of purity and peace, under which all can repose with confidence and safety, and take breath after those fierce and angry conflicts which have so recently swept over the country? It was the people of Alabama, followed by the people of Tennessee, General Jackson's most ardent friends and zealous supporters. Yes, sir, the White banner was first unfurled where General Jackson's victorious flag was first seen streaming in the wind, and by those people who cultivate his glorious battle field, backed and sustained by the brave officers and soldiers who bore his victorious standard on the plains of Talladega, and the Emuckfaw, through the fields of Tallahatchee, Tehopeka, and Enotachopko, and planted it before the gates of New Orleans, and there, in its defence, under the guidance of their chief, the most celebrated captain of the age, performed such feats of valor as won for him immortal glory, and for their country imperishable renown. Yes, sir, these are the men whose spontaneous feelings have presented Judge White as a candidate for the Presidency, without any solicitation or agency on his part. He has been presented by the earliest friends, the oldest soldiers of General Jackson, if not the best."

Mr. Speaker, could language be stronger? What! said Mr. Peyton, "Judge White the candidate of the Opposition! Judge White abandon those principles upon which he has acted through life!" Impossible! Why, sir, he seemed to be perfectly horror stricken at the very idea, and under the impulse of his Jackson feelings, exclaimed, "if these charges were true, (that is, that Judge White had abandoned Old Hickory and joined the Whigs) I would turn from him myself as a hypocrite and a deserter." Comment is unnecessary.

I will, now, sir, read from a letter which bears date, January 1st, 1835, and signed by eight members of Congress from Tennessee.

"We owe it to consistency, to principles, and to our own character, to do nothing that would so divide our party, as to overthrow it with the leading principles identified with it, and therefore if now, or at any time hereafter, there should be a probability of producing such a result by running Judge White, we ought not to take him up; or if taken up, and the danger should become imminent, it would be necessary that one or the other of the opposing candidates of our party should be withdrawn.

JAMES STANDIFER,
BALIE PEYTON,
WM. M. INGE,
SAMUEL BUNCH,
JOHN BELL,
JOHN B. FORRESTER,
LUKE LEA,
DAVID W. DICKINSON."

"Our party;" what party? The Democratic Jackson party. The "leading principles identified with it," said they, must not be overthrown, and, therefore, if such a result is likely to be produced by running Judge White, "we ought not to take him up." What more? But if he is taken up, and the "danger should become imminent," "one or the other of the opposing candidates of our party should be withdrawn." Who were the opposing candidates of "our party?" Judge White and Mr. Van Buren. Then according to their own declarations, if Judge White had been taken off the track, they would have supported the other candidate of "our party" (Mr. Van Buren) for the Presidency. Now, sir, what do we hear? Their tune is changed, and right in the face of their former assertions, they roundly charge that Mr. Van Buren never did belong to "our party"—the Democratic party—to which they professed to be attached themselves. Yes, sir, they assert (at least the most of them do) that he never was a Democrat, although they supported him for the Vice Presidency in 1832, and in a certain event (the withdrawal of White) were prepared to support him for the Presidency in 1836! And, would it be believed, they now iterate and reiterate charges against him which they pronounced false and slanderous but five years ago!

Mr. Speaker, upon the preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of Tennessee, nominating Judge White a candidate for the Presidency, a number of speeches were made by his friends, setting forth the reasons why the freemen of that State should support him in preference to Mr. Van Buren. Among others I hold in my hand one delivered by General Caruthers, the brother-in-law of my colleague [Mr. GENTRY.] Hear him:

"The truth is, the race is between White and Van Buren, the candidate of the people, and of the Baltimore Convention. These gentlemen are both talented, and have both fought in the Republican ranks. They have been good Jackson men. White, to be sure, has done him more service, for he commenced sooner by many years, and has fought harder, for he always has been in the hottest of the action, and the old chief has never sounded his political war-trump, but White was in the field, and at his side; he has never called for a vanguard, but White has stepped forward * * * * * * * White has come out on all the vetoes and messages, and every leading measure of Jackson's administration; and is therefore pledged in print, and under his own hand upon them, and will, as sure as he is an honest statesman, carry them out, if he should succeed. Mr. Van Buren's situation has not been such as to make it necessary that he should take sides upon these agitating questions; and it seems to be admitted on all hands, that he is one of those politicians who will not obtrude his sentiments upon the public, on questions which have two sides, but is modest and retiring in his policy; there is perhaps one exception in this course. I would not do any man injustice. On one occasion, in a toast, if I mistake not, he did say, "uncompromising opposition to the United States Bank." Since what little we see of his sentiments is good, what a pity it is we cannot get more, in toasts, or some more solid way. But White has made lengthy arguments on that subject, for which he has been lauded to the skies by the very men who are now abusing him. He has, ever since 1817, been standing upon the strong ground, that the Bank of the United States and all banks of that kind, are unconstitutional, as well as inexpedient. * * * * * * * If Judge White cannot be elected, I would much prefer his election (Mr. Van Buren's) to that of any Opposition man, notwithstanding my objections to him; for you have seen, sir, from I have said, that I have many objections to him, when compared to White; but still I would much prefer him to any man whose principles are adverse to those which have characterized and made glorious the present Administration."

This, sir, is the evidence of one of Judge White's leading friends in our Legislature in 1835. And what does it prove? That White and Van Buren were both considered Republicans at that time; that they were both Jackson men; White, to be sure, had done Jackson "more service," because he had "fought harder," and was always in the field and at his side when the old chief sounded his political war-trump. Moreover, White had come out on all the vetoes and messages, and every leading measure of Jackson's administration. Indeed "since 1817 he had been standing on the stuong ground that the Bank of the United States, and all banks of that kind, were unconstitutional, as well as inexpedient," whilst Mr. Van Buren had been rather sparing of such "good sentiments," and had only said on one occasion, and that in a toast, "Uncompromising hostility to the United States Bank." But notwithstanding these and some other objections to Mr. Van Buren, he was much preferable to any man whose principles were adverse to those which had "characterized and made glorious" Jackson's administration. I will add that the ground taken by Gen. Caruthers was the same that all White's friends assumed, from the most distinguished, down to the most humble member of the party.

Mr. Speaker, in April, 1835, a very large White meeting was held at Franklin, in my colleague's [Mr. GENTRY] own county, at which a spirited preamble and resolutions were drawn up by the Hon. A. P. Maury, Dr. W. S. Webb, James Johnson, John Watson, Dr. Joel Walker, James Hogan, jr. Gen. L. Nolin, W. Rucker, and T. L. Green, esq. They were unanimously adopted. Newton Cannon acted as chairman. Here is a part of the preamble.

"Since the election of Jackson, has White faltered in support of the Administration? Has he been less vigorous or less efficient that Mr. Van Buren in advocating its measures? On the contrary, has he not stood forth on the floor of the Senate, as one of its ablest advocates, bearing himself so nobly as to increase the admiration of his friends, and extort the reluctant esteem of his opponents? In the mean time, what has Mr. Van Buren done? What recorded evidence have we, that, if elected, he will carry out the measures of the present Administration?"

My colleague [Mr. GENTRY] will recognise, among the committee who reported the preamble and resolutions, the name of the Hon. A. P. Maury, his predecessor in Congress, and, in the chairman who signed it, the ex-Governor of Tennessee, Newton Cannon. Will he be good enough to inform the House in what company these men can now be found? Whether, like himself, they have deserted the old Democratic camp, and joined the blue light Federalists of the North? I hope, unlike him, they have not become the "SLANDERERS and REVILERS" of the purest Republicans and best men of the age, in order to place in power men whose principles are at war with all that our gallant State has ever held dear.

I could detain the House, sir, from this time until to-morrow morning, by reading similar extracts from the preambles and resolutions adopted at White meetings in Tennessee, but I conceive it to be unnecessary, and will hasten on, as I have already consumed more time than I intended when I arose.

It will be recollected that a White paper was published in this city in the early part of the year 1835, called the "Sun," under the auspices, and, as I have understood, with the money of my colleague [Mr. BELL] and others. In their opening "address to the public," the editors said:

"Judge White is, and has long been, the firm, undeviating, and intimate friend of Gen. Jackson; bred in the same political school, warmed by the same ardent patriotism, and cherishing the same Republican feelings."

These sentiments were echoed and re-echoed, Mr. Speaker, by all the White papers in Tennessee. The Nashville Republican, the leading White Journal in the State, teemed with articles of a like kind. Hear that paper, in February, 1835:

"On most of the great political topics of the day, they (Jackson and White) have thought alike, and side by side have they battled for those principles which have been pronounced by a large majority of the American people to be sound, salutary, and correct. Judge White has been an efficient, sincere, and independent, though not a sycophantic supporter of the most important measures of Gen. Jackson's administration, and no man would, we are convinced, carry out those measures with more ability, firmness, and discretion." * * * * "One of the many causes which will induce them (the people of Tennessee) to support Judge White, is, that he has been a consistent and straightforward supporter of the administration of him (Gen. Jackson) whom they have delighted to honor.

The Knoxville Register, published in Judge White's own town, his organ and mouth piece, held this language in April, '35:

"Gen. Jackson must feel assured, that the great political principles which brought him into power, and which he has so nobly sustained, will be inviolably preserved under the administration of either Judge White or Mr. Van Buren. Their political principles are the same, and they are both supporters of his administration."

Mr. Speaker, I shall trouble the House with no more documents. What I have already laid before them, triumphantly establishes the truth of what I stated in the outset, that in Tennessee, Judge White was supported not only as a Jackson man, but the better Jackson man, and that the leaders of the White party professed to be the ardent friends of Jackson's administration—to be opposed to all the doctrines and wild schemes of the modern Whigs. Sir, suppose Gen. Harrison had been run in Tennessee instead of Judge White; how many votes would he have received against Mr. Van Buren? Not ten thousand out of more than one hundred thousand. At that time no man in the Union could have got the electoral votes of the State in opposition to Mr. Van Buren but Judge White—much less a black cockade Federalist, who supported, and was supported by, both the elder and younger Adams.

Sir, I think I heard the word "fawn"—that, but a short time ago, I "fawned upon the distinguished leaders of the Whig party in Tennessee." This is not only incorrect, but absolutely false. Let my colleague [Mr. GENTRY] ask the man [Mr. BELL] whose spawn he is, if ever I "fawned" upon him. No, sir, no. Among all my political sins, thank Heaven, I will not have to answer for that, either in this world or the world to come. If my colleague meant to include himself among the "distinguished leaders," and to allege that I "fawned" upon him, that is a much greater mistake. If I would not "fawn" upon the principal, think you that I would "fawn" upon the tool? If he had in his mind one of the late Senators from Tennessee, [Mr. Foster,] and used the word "fawn" to convey the idea that I was once his friend, I plead guilty to the charge. But never since Mr. Foster voted for Mr. Crittenden's gag bill, would I have supported him for any office, from the highest to the lowest. I consider that bill, as well as the one now under consideration, as one of the most deadly blows which have ever been aimed, by any of our country, against that liberty which was achieved by the blood of the patriots of the Revolution.

Mr. Speaker, my colleague, in the excess of his wisdom, has thought proper to inform the House that some "GENEROUS JUDGE" gave me a license to practice law; but as to the extent of my "fees" he is uninformed! This is truly a most wonderful development, worthy of the high source from which it comes. I regret, however, that it has been made, as I fear it will as effectually blast my future prospects as Mr. GRUNDY's report in the Senate blasted, in the bud, the project which my colleague gave notice he would introduce, to "distri-bate the proceeds of the public lands, and to ASSUME THE DEBTS OF THE STATES!"

My colleague, sir, has dealt in much slang of a similar kind in reference to myself, but it is so low and contemptible, that I deem it beneath my notice, and therefore will pass it by as I would the ravings of a simpleton. I expected when he commenced his speech, that he would endeavor to controvert the facts which I stated on a former occasion in regard to the complexion of the Harrisburg Convention; but scarcely a whisper has fallen from his lips. In this he acted wisely—no doubt under due advisement. Not a single statement which I made when addressing the House upon this bill (Mr. BELL'S gag bill) has he disproved. Remember that, sir!

Mr. Speaker: in replying to my colleague I have had to use strong language, but not more so than his vulgar attacks merited. I think I have shown, conclusively shown, to every member upon this floor, be he Whig or Democrat, who are the apostates, my colleague and his associates in Tennessee, who supported White as the "better Jackson" man, and are now for Harrison, or myself and others who did the same thing and are now for Mr. Van Buren.

Thanking the House for the unanimous consent with which I have been permitted to reply to the dignified and decent remarks of my colleague, and the attention they have paid me, I shall say no more, leaving him to enjoy the victory he has gained, the laurels he has won by his maiden effort.

REMARKS OF MR. LEADBETTER, OF OHIO.

In the House of Representatives, July 1840.—On a motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the Naval Appropriation bill.

Mr. LEADBETTER said: Mr. Speaker, I rise, sir, to a privileged question; and, sir, I do so from a sense of duty which I owe to my constituency, as well as to myself. Having voted in the affirmative on "the passage of the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the present year," I move to reconsider the vote of yesterday, by which this bill was passed. And, sir, if the House will reconsider this vote, I shall move to recommit this bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with the following instructions, which I send to the Clerk's table, to be read for information:

"That House bill No. 6, making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1840, be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, and that said committee report, without delay, the probable expense of purchasing a site, and of the construction of a dry dock in the harbor of New York, together with the necessary fixtures, engines, &c. appurtenant thereto, and the probable length of time it would require to construct the same; and, also, as to the propriety of commencing the work at this time, under the depressed situation of our financial condition."

Sir, I stated that it was a duty which I owed to my constituency to make this motion; and I shall now proceed to state the reasons why I have not only considered it my duty to make this motion, but to offer a few reasons why the vote upon this bill should be reconsidered and recommitted with instructions, such as I have proposed.

Sir, when this bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I then submitted a few remarks upon the impropriety of commencing the construction of this work at a time when the state of our finances seems to forbid it. But a test upon a question of this kind could not be made in committee; the yeas and nays could not be called. But what was the course pursued by the friends of this extravagant and unwise appropriation of money when this bill was reported to this House? Were not all propositions to strike out, in whole, or in part, this item in the bill, cut off by the previous question? But, sir, the friends of true economy did not stop here; for as soon as the amendments were passed upon by the House, a motion was made to recommit this bill, with instructions to strike out this appropriation: but no sooner made than New York was on her feet, and the previous question was again sprung and sustained. And such appeared to be the devotion to salt water constitutionality, that the yeas and nays were refused upon that motion.

Sir, if the yeas and nays had then been permitted to have been taken upon that question, by which my constituency could have known by whom it was that this prodigal expenditure had been fastened upon them, in common with the rest of the laboring community, I might have been induced to let this bill pass on its way to the Senate chamber unmolested. But this small boon was denied, and there was no alternative left but to make the motion which I have. And, sir, I will now put the question to this House, whether this is the proper time to commence the construction of a work which will eventually cost this nation not less than two millions of dollars? And who among us is prepared to say that this dry dock, with its fixtures, can be constructed for less? Where are your estimates, and who made them? What committee has reported upon this subject? What evidence have you of its absolute necessity at this moment, and why is it attached to the navy appropriation bill? Does the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means pretend to inform us how much this work will cost the people, what length of time it will require in its construction, and what the sum to be paid for a site? No, sir, no.

Sir, I have not had sufficient time to make a full examination into the history of the rise and progress of this grand scheme. But from a slight examination, I find that in the year eighteen hundred and thirty-five, a law was passed, and the sum of one hundred thousand dollars was therein appropriated for the purchase of a site, and the construction of a dry dock in the harbor of New York. Sir, I have been informed, verbally, that some four or five thousand dollars of that appropriation was expended in making surveys. Two years since, at the second session of the last Congress, a bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, appropriating one hundred thousand dollars towards purchasing a site, and in the construction of a dry dock in the harbor of New York; and, sir, this bill was then defeated; and defeated at a time when the Treasury was in as good a condition as it is at this time. Sir, I should like to know what new lights have burst upon the vision of this Committee of Ways and Means, and of this House, that this appropriation must be pushed through at this inauspicious moment?

Why was not this appropriation offered for consideration at the last session of Congress? The honorable chairman was then a member of the same committee over which he now presides. Will the former members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who are now members of the present committee, gratify me in this particular? If the members of the committee will not respond, will the immediate friends of this measure inform me why an effort was not made at the last sessions to pass this appropriation? Did they know that they had been defeated the session before? Did they consider it prudent to let the matter pass by, until this hall should be filled with new members, and then, by attaching to it the navy appropriation bill, under the honeyed words of an "unexpended balance of a former appropriation," &c. "be, and the same is hereby reappropriated," by which it might appear to the unwary as if the construction of the work had been long since begun, and the money still in the Treasury? But, sir, there is one other view to be taken in relation to this subject? By the law of eighteen hundred and thirty-five a site was to be purchased. By the bill reported in eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, a site was to be purchased. By the bill just passed a site is to be purchased. Is the House aware that upon the passage of the law, in eighteen hundred and thirty-five, all the land and mud and water adjoining, or adjacent to, the navy yard at Brooklyn, passed into the hands of speculators? Peradventure this appropriation may be necessary to assist them, or help them out with their speculations; but of this I know nothing and care less. It is sufficient for me to know, that a purchase is to be made; the laws all require it, and this must be done without reference to the expense; and I will venture to affirm, that at the next session of Congress, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will bring into this House an item attached to the navy appropriation bill, asking us to vote the further sum of one hundred, or one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for the purpose of completing the payment for a site for a dry dock in the harbor of New York. Sir, in looking round me, I am constrained to ask, what has become of the vaunting friends of retrenchment? Shall I appeal to that party, who have hung out the banner of Harrison reform?

[A member rising to a question of order, Mr. L. was informed by the SPEAKER that this was a question of reconsideration, and that it was not in order to discuss the question of party, &c.]

Sir, I am well aware that this is a question of reconsideration, and I am well aware that it is not in order to discuss party questions, nor will I; and I am as well aware that the question of reconsideration permits me to discuss the merits of the bill, or any part of it, or otherwise it would preclude me from giving my reasons why the vote should be reconsidered. But, sir, I did not appeal to that party under any hope or expectation that they would join with me in the reconsideration of this question. No, sir; no, sir, I know them too well to indulge in such idle hopes; such like appropriations are in perfect keeping with all other of their acts, professions to the contrary notwithstanding. But, sir, I feel myself at liberty to appeal to that party with whom I have taken the greatest pleasure in acting, and more particularly will I appeal to those who are, in this matter, acting in concert with the great body of the Opposition, to pause before it is too late, and to reflect upon the course they are pursuing, the obnoxious charges to which they may be subjected, by the adopton of an unwise and imprudent precedent, of making appropriations for the commencement of new works, without an estimate of the probable expense. Have you weighed well the consequences, and are you aware of its dangerous tendencies? I will not enter into detail here; every member is fully aware of the results. But, sir, if their constituents are willing to submit to this kind of legislation, mine are not. Sir, that people which I have the honor to represent are not only willing to be taxed for every necessary expenditure of their Government, be the amount what it may, but they demand this at the hand of their Representatives; but in addition to this, in common with the rest of the laboring community, they have a right to know the amount which is proposed to be raised, and the purdoses to which it is appropriated. And, sir, when you refuse that of the community, from whom all your resources are drawn, this knowledge, whose right it is to know, let me say to such, that they are treading upon dangerous ground, and that to trifle with the laboring people will not end in trifles. Sir, at a time when you are building towers with stupendous colonnades to adorn your Eastern cities, under the pretence of necessity and convenience, under the shade of which your loafer can snuff a constitutional sea breeze, and which for splendor and magnificence are scarcely equalled by those erected at the labor and expense of a trodden-down people, at the nod of Eastern despotism, you are still drawing upon the hard earnings of an industrious, patriotic, and confiding people. And, sir, at a moment when the exigencies of the times seem to require all the energies of the people to provide means for the support of Government, you propose to commence a new work, not knowing when it is to end, and evidently not demanded by the best interests of the nation. What spectacle do you present to the laboring community, and especially to those who reside in the West? In that section of your common country, a small appropriation has been asked for, for the prosecution of a work already commenced, and that based upon estimates; and, sir, upon this question we heard denunciations "long and loud," upon the the subject of extravagance and wasteful expenditures; and the lofty mountains of the Alleganies interposed their high constitutional barriers, and foiled the appropriation. But no sooner than an appropriation savors of salt water, the lofty Alleganies sink into insignificance, (even in the minds of many who represent Western interests;) but even money itself, all at once, becomes plenty, and the resources of the nation are so abundant, so vast, that even an estimate of time or expense is altogether unnecessary. Nay, more; but direct the President of the United States to pay to a set of speculators, for a few rods of mud and water, as many thousand dollars as they may choose to demand, and for the filling around the walls as much for each load of earth as may be asked. This, sir, I call economy with a vengeance.

[Here Mr. ANDERSON from Maine, a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, rose and stated that the committee of which he was a member, had this subject for a long time under consideration, and that they had the evidence before them, that the Board of Navy Commissioners had decided upon the location of the dry dock, and that no purchase would be necessary; that it would be located upon the ground now owned by the Government, and now a part of the navy yard.]

Yes, sir, I understand the gentleman, and I will call the attention of the House to the law itself, and the language made use of in the bill as now passed. And what is it? "To purchase a site." Does the gentleman not know that many strong arguments were made in favor of this purchase at the last Congress, and in which it was shown most conclusively by those whose business it was to know, that this dry dock could not be erected upon the ground where it is now decided to be built, without injuring or almost destroying the ship yard?

I will now ask what is the inference? Are we not sufficiently well acquainted with human nature to know how easy it is to undecide that which has been decided and resolved upon again and again, and that our best resolutions, upon reflection, are changed, and should be, when reason dictates? But if this work was to destroy your ship yard in 1838, how does it happen that it will not in 1840? Have you any new surveys, any new lights? Then recommit the bill and let them come forth. Perhaps I may be convinced.

What rule of construction will you require your executive officer to establish in carrying into execution the laws you pass? Will you require them to look elsewhere than in your statute book, and dare they adopt any other rule, or will you permit them to adopt any other rule? If you will not, and they dare not, when they open your statute book, and find there a law requiring a site to be purchased for a dry dock in the harbor of New York, will not a site be purchased? Most assuredly; and when a report is made to this House of their proceedings, you will again find the argument of 1838 revived, proving incontestably the impracticability of erecting this dry dock upon the ground now occupied as a ship yard, and the absolute necessity of purchasing a site for its location. Sir, although I have never yet seen a dry dock, I am not to be caught in traps of this kind. My constituency are not only willing to toil, and toil on, if it should become necessary for the purpose of sustaining their country. but in common with the great mass of the laboring community, will always be found ready to do battle in their country's cause, when the exigencies of the case may demand their services. But they demand, at your hands, to be furnished with a data by which they conform some idea when their extraordinary exertions for you may terminate.

Sir, I am fully prepared to tell gentlemen who pays your revenue, who supports your shavers, speculators, and banker; and I can tell gentlemen who it is that does not pay the revenue. It is not the merchant, but the consumer. Yes, sir, the consumer; those who toil, and by the sweat of their brows are enabled to purchase and consume your imported articles. Nor that alone, sir; it is by the labor of those who toil, that your drones and non-producers not only live, but riot in extravagace. It is through your laborers that they live and move, and without them your loafers would be compelled to resort to some other means for a living. Sir, if the laboring community should take it into their heads to withhold from market their surplus produce, your loafers would be compelled to hoe their own potatoes, and to drink less hard cider. But, sir, I remarked that, among my constituents, there was neither loafers or loungers; nor do I believe that there is one among them who would claim the benefit of your bankrupt bill, should it become a law. But, sir, if this method of making appropriations shall obtain with an American Congress, you had better awaken from its slumbers that bill from the Senate, which passed that body for the relief of speculators, which now lies sleeping upon your table, and include the General Government.

Mr. Speaker, although many around me appear to be a little excited from some cause, I will allay any apprehensions of danger in relation to this, their favorite appropriation, by stating again, that the instructions do not go to the striking out of the bill, which I should prefer, but for estimates; the House, in its present state of feeling, being evidently opposed to striking out, as the next best thing that could be done to satisfy the people, as to the justice and propriety of making this appropriation at this time. I have proposed the instructions; and when the report shall come in from the committee, I do not entertain the least possible doubt but that a majority of this House will then concur with me in opinion.

SPEECH OF MR. WAGENER,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

In House of Representatives, June 16, 1840—In Committee of the Whole on the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Conscious that the members of this committee are wearied with this protracted discussion, could I consult my own feelings and inclination, I should not occupy their time for one moment; but as this bill establishes new and important principles as regards the fiscal operations of this Government, and as its friends have been charged, upon this floor, with hostility to the best interests of the people, I cannot, in justice to my constituents and myself, (whatever may be my reluctance, at any time, to engage in public discussion,) consent to its passage with my silent vote. I, however, promise the committee that my effort will be to condense my arguments as much as possible, and to adhere strictly to the subject under consideration; but, from the wide range indulged in by many who have preceded me, I hope I may be pardoned should I incidentally offer a passing answer to some of the unjust allegations made against the late and present Administrations.

Honorable gentlemen complain that the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means should have thought proper to bring this bill before the House before other bills now on file, of a general character; and with what justice they make the complaint, a few facts will determine. This bill, after it came from the Senate, was some time before the Committee of Ways and Means before it was reported to this House, and almost every day was the chairman interrogated, why this delay? And if the friends of the Administration are sincere in their support of this bill, why not bring it forward? Such were the daily charges made by the opponents of this bill; and now, forsooth, after a lapse of some months, the bill is brought forward for consideration, and they complain it is too soon, and urge its delay until the next Congress. What inconsistency! Independent of the opinion of this House, the people themselves expect a decision of this question. They have called for it long and loudly; and to refuse to act upon it, in one way or the other, by which this agitated question shall be finally settled, would be in open defiance of their wishes.

I consider, Mr. Chairman, that the first inquiry should be, are the existing laws for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue, full, ample, and sufficient?

By the act of June, 1836, to regulate the depositesof the public money, the Secretary of the Treasury is required to select, as depositories of the public moneys, State banks, upon certain specified conditions, unnecessary to detail; and by the fifth section of this act, it is furiher enacted, that no bank shall be selected or continued as a place of deposite of the public money, which shall not redeem its notes and bills, on demand, in specie; nor shall any bank be selected or continued, as aforesaid, which shall, after the 4th July, in 1836, issue or pay out any note or bill of less denomination than five dollars.

The duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, under this deposite law, is positive and unconditional. That so soon as a bank of deposite refuses to pay her notes, on demand, in gold and silver, she ceases to be a depository, and the moneys in her possession withdrawn by the Secretary of the Treasury, and of course come under his immediate control. Is this committee willing to continue this immense power and responsibility in the hands of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury? Has not the President, in his special and annual messages, called upon Congress to add additional safeguards for its security; and have they not been unheeded? And, sir, I was not a little surprised that the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts who spoke first, (from his usual candor and fairness in debate,) should have so unjustly cnarged the Executive with a usurpation of the moneyed power, when the law made it absolute, that no bank could be a depository, which suspends the payment of specie for its notes.

If the Opposition is prepared to maintain that State banks are the safest fiscal agents of the Government, after a violation of their trust, that this deposite law is sufficient, and the discretionary power of the Secretary of the Treasury harmless and proper, be it so. For my part, I never can consent that any officer of the General Government, whatever amount of confidence I may place in his integrity and capacity, shall have such unlimited discretionary power. And, sir, to my surprise did I hear honorable gentlemen of the Opposition virtually contend for the continuation of this discretionary power to the Executive, while in the same breath they were denouncing Executive patronage. The advocates of this bill are for circumscribing discretionary power over the purse of the country; they are for placing such safeguards around the money of the people, that will secure it against any power but the law.

Then, inasmuch as I consider the existing deposite law, in certain contingencies, as throwing the whole moneyed power of the country under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, and inefficient in other respects, and as I believe the bill now under consideration is a safer and more stable system for the collection and safekeeping of the public moneys, I feel constrained to advocate its adoption, and will proceed to discuss the relative advantages of a Bank of the United States, State banks, and an Independent Treasury, as the fiscal agent of this Government.

It a fact worthy of record in the outset, that the Opposition to the present Executive have for the last two sessions denounced him for urging upon Congress the establishment of an Independent Treasury, and an entire separation of the Government from banking institutions, as her fiscal agents; and during this whole time they have not ventured unitedly to propose a plan for the safekeeping and disbursing of the public moneys. This position is an anomaly in the history of political parties; and it would have been unaccountable to me, were it not that I find, from the late proceedings of this party, that one of their cardinal doctrines is secrecy, and an inquiry as to their political sentiments unbecoming and ungenteel. They also, in some respects, resemble an Eastern monarch, who requested the soothsayers to interpret his dream, but would not tell them the character of the dream which was required to be interpreted. However, let them disguise their opinions as they may, the antagonistical system to the Independent Treasury is a Bank of the United States, which will lead me first to consider it as the fiscal agent of our Government; secondly, the Independent Treasury; and lastly, the causes that have produced such revulsions in our monetary system, and that have periodically affected our commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural interests.

Before I proceed to the consideration of a Bank of the United States as the fiscal agent of the Government, allow me to make a few remarks upon banking generally. It is important that I should do so, from the fact that many honorable gentlemen have unjustly charged the friends of the Administration as destructives, as advocates of an exclusive metallic currency, and as in favor of uprooting the order of society.

We have had, in the short space of two years, two important eras in the history of our banks, and full of useful admonitions. No one who can have the best interests of his country at heart, can but deplore and deprecate the conduct of these institutions. No one will deny that they require thorough reformation. No one here will stand up their advocates in violating their promises. The charge, then, that the friends of the Administration (at least I speak for myself, and I believe I might say for the party) are for the destruction of all the banks of this country, and introducing an exclusive metallic currency, is unfounded. I must, however, be permitted to say, that the banking institutions have shaken the confidence of the people in their usefulness, having failed in the object of their creation. Instead of providing a currency equal to gold and silver, they have overwhelmed our country with a depreciated paper circulation, alike injurious to the farmer, mechanic, and laborer. They have, in some degree, entered the political arena, (particularly the late Bank of the United States,) to subserve their own purposes and advancement. When I admit that I am not in favor of destoying the banks, but for reform, I wish to be understood that I am opposed to non-specie paying banks; that I am opposed to banks, (and which I now believe to exist,) not required for the legitimate and productive business of the country. I am in favor of banks being restrained within their fair and honest means—of their specie basis being enlarged—of small notes being discontinued, which will throw into circulation gold and silver, for the small and ordinary business of the people. The great error with the States has been, that they have created too much banking capital; and if continued in, and not restrained, our country must be subject periodically to the dreadful consequences resulting from their expansions and contractions. Is is not important that this Government should not encourage this wide-spread mania for banks and paper currency, if in its power incidentally?

I will now proceed and ask, is a Bank of the United States, subject to so many vicissitudes, the most stable and safest fiscal agent of our Government? Is it such an agent that any wise Government will select, were there no constitutional difficulties? I will not deny it may have some advantages, but its disadvantages far overbalance them. By recurring to the late Bank of the United States, when she acted as the fiscal agent of this Goverment, you will find that she neither proved the regulator of our State banks, the maintenance of an undepreciated currency, an equality of exchanges, nor the most stable and proper fiscal agent of our Government. Nothwithstanding the eulogiums we have had, by some honorable gentlemen, upon the late Bank of the United States, I ask, where is the evidence that she regulated banks and the currency, in times of difficulty and embarrassment, for then is the period when its advantages must be tested? When general prosperity pervades our land, the currency needs no regulation—it regulates itself. Where is your regulator, when by a system of over-banking, and of consequence, an excess of credit, falls upon us? Need I call this committee to the recollection of the distressing period of 1818, '19, '20, and '21, to prove the utter inability of the Bank of the United States, backed then by all the powers of the Government, to relieve the country and regulate the currency and banks? I refer honorable gentlemen to the history of that day for the substantiation of my assertion. During the late war, we had no Bank of the United States. The State banks were then only in existence; and if any merit is due, it belongs to them, and not the Bank of the United States. It is true that these banks suspended after the war, from so great a stretch of their means to advance money to the Government, and did not resume until after the Bank of the United States was incorporated. It was not, however, brought about by the Bank of the United States; it was by the prudent course pursued by the State banks themselves. At that very time, the Bank of the United States was on the brink of ruin: no dividends declared; her stockholders became alarmed; her officers changed; and only by a violent contraction she weathered the storm. But the commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural community had to suffer—yes, bleed to the core. The stockjobber and speculator then fattened upon the distresses of our citizens, through loans from this very institution to their favorites. Is not this true? Let history answer. What was her conduct, further, while the fiscal agent of our Government? She retained one hundred and seventy thousand dollars, under pretence to pay damages upon the protested French bill. She called upon the holders of the three per cents, when due, (and the money of the Government in her vaults to pay these three per cents,) to induce them to postpone their demand of payment. They complied, thereby postponing the payment, and holding the Government security for the same. She retained the money deposited with her to pay the soldiers of the Revolution, after it was demanded by the Secretary of War, and other agents appointed. And shall I call to the recollection of this committee the time when this institution was struggling, with her Goliah strength, to overpower the General Government; and had it not been for the Roman firmness of Ex-President Jackson, the issue might have been doubtful? Seventy thousand dollars were appropriated by this Bank, to be used by the President of the Bank, to have speeches printed and circulated, denouncing the President of the United States as a tyrant, and unworthy the confidence of the people. This was done, too, by a portion of the Government money. The issue was made—the people the arbiters. The Executive was sustained—a happy result for our Republic. Shall I call your attention to a more recent occurrence, which should satisfy the most incredulous of the unsafety in employing a Bank of the United States as her fiscal agent. In the crisis of 1837 and 1839, where stands in her majesty the Bank of the United States, continued by a charter from the State of Pennsylvania, and which charter Nicholas Biddle, then President, declared, at a meeting of its stockholders, was preferable to the one that had expired, and in consequence of which, the charter was accepted by its stockholders? Yes, I repeat, where did she stand at these two important periods? Did she prevent the suspension of specie payments in 1837 and 1839? As regards the last period, she was the first to suspend, and mainly instrumental in bringing it about.

A meeting of the officers of the banks in Philadelphia, were called together last October, without any previous notice as to the object, by most of them, and, to their astonishment, a proposition was made to suspend. I think thirteen banks were represented, and but three were for suspension, and one of those three was the Bank of the United States. The proposition was lost; notwithstanding, the next morning after this meeting, the Bank of the United States suspended, and thereby forced the smaller institutions, very reluctantly, however, to suspend also. Do not these facts prove, beyond the possibility of cavil, its inefficiency to control the State banks, currency, or exchanges? Does not the conduct of this bank, while the fiscal agent of the Government, satisfy you of the necessity of the prompt separation of a Government from such institutions? Does her conduct not speak volumes against renewing the union? Would it be wise, would it be good policy, to create anew such a fiscal agent? Is it not fair to infer that no great dependance can be placed upon the faithfulness of a new institution? You have no assurance that a bank will be true to her trust. And, sir, above all, if the Government, by any possibility, can be made subservient to such an institution, is it not our bounden duty to refrain from employing such a dangerous agent? Is any one, who hears me, satisfied to see their country subject to the mandate of a bank? For my country's honor, I hope not.

I have, thus far, only spoken of the expediency of employing a bank as the fiscal agent of our Government, and will now only revert one moment to its constitutionality. As there is no express power contained in the Constitution of the United States, authorizing Congress to create a bank, and, as I believe, to carry out any one of the powers contained in that instrument does not require a bank, therefore I am irresistibly led to the conclusion that a Bank of the United States is unconstitutional. In addition, I will call the attention of the committee to a report made in 1811, by a distinguished Senator from Kentucky, to show his opinion, at that time, upon the question of the constitutionality of the existing Bank of the United States:

"Mr. Clay, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of the stockholders of the Bank of the United States, praying that an act might be passed to continue the corporate powers of the bank for a further period, (I believe one year,) to enable it to settle such of its concerns as may be depending on the 3d of March, 1811, reported, that as they did not consider the bank constitutional, they would not and could not grant the request."

I refer to this in order to show what were the opinions of that distinguished Senator at that time, and how far he carried them.

The continuation of State banks, as our depositories, appears to have but few advocates upon this floor; but, in candor, were I compelled to vote for a Bank of the United States, or State banks, I should give it for the latter. Yet, as they have been found inadequate to the task, and the best interests of the country call for an entire separation of the Government from the banks, I feel it my bounden duty to oppose their continuance.

The State banks, by their own act, have separated themselves from the Government, and not by any compulsory process on the part of the Executive. How did they separate themselves? By the laws, under which they were created the depositories of the public revenue, they were required, at all times, to redeem their paper in gold and silver; and so soon as they failed in this, they ceased to be depositories. Did not the Government act in good faith towards these institutions? Were they not continued as depositories up to the time of their suspension; and would they not have remained until this moment, performing the same service, had they acted in good faith? To their own faithlessness must they attribute this separation. And, sir, so far from the Executive and his friends indicating any hostilities to these faithless institutions, I refer you to their conduct at the extra session of 1837. Unable to pay over to the Secretary of the Treasury the deposites due the Government, Congress, instead of compelling prompt payment, allowed them from six to eighteen months to liquidate the amount due Government, and at this very moment more than half a million remains unsatisfied. Is this evidence of hostility towards these institutions? Does this show a disposition, on the part of this Administration, to destroy them? Disappointed in their confidence that these institutions would have been enabled to perform the duties of fiscal agents faithfully and effectually, they have become satisfied of the absolute necessity of a separation. And to show the sentiments of the Executive upon this subject, I subjoin an extract from his first annual message:

"The discontinuance of the use of State banks, for fiscal purposes, ought not to be regarded as a measure of hostility towards these institutions. Banks, properly established and conducted, are highly useful to the business of the country, and doubtless will continue to exist in the States, so long as they conform to their laws, and are found to be safe and beneficial. How they should be created, what privileges they should enjoy, under what responsibilities they should act, and to what restrictions they should be subject, are questions which, as I observed on a previous occasion, belong to the States to decide. Upon their rights, or the exercise of them, the General Government can have no motive to encroach. Its duty towards them is well performed when it refrains from legislating for their special benefit, because such legislation would violate the sprit of the Constitution, and be unjust to other interests; when it takes no steps to impair their usefulness, but so manages its own affairs as to make it the interest of those institutions to strengthen and improve their condition, for the security and welfare of the community at large, they have no right to insist on a connection with the Federal Government, nor the use of the public money, for their benefit."

Having thus very briefly presented my objections to the re-establishment of a Bank of the United States, and to the continuation of State banks, as the fiscal agents of this Government, we now come to the consideration of the system of an Independent Treasury, as contemplated by the bill before us. What does it establish?

A Treasury, in which shall be deposited all the moneys collected by Government agents. That the safekeeping, transfer, collecting, and disbursing of these public moneys, shall be performed exclusively by these agents, and not by banks. That the moneys, so collected and disbursed, shall be, progressively, in gold and silver, and notes of specie-paying banks, until 1843, when the whole shall be collected and disbursed in gold and silver, and additional safeguards for the more effectual prevention of frauds and peculations on the part of these agents. These, sir, are the important provisions of this bill; simple, plain, not complicated, safe, and efficient. For its security, for its efficiency, for its safety and stability, and, above all, for its Republican feature, in selecting and controlling its fiscal agents, should, and I have not a doubt will, receive the sanction and approbation of this House and country. Need I refer you to the system advocated by Mr. Jefferson at the time the first Bank of the United States was chartered, similar to the one we now are considering? Need I remind you of its salutary influence, to a certain extent, upon our monetary system? Need I repeat a comparison of this system with banks irresponsible to the Government? Need I call to your recollection the inefficiency of the existing laws, providing for the safekeeping, collecting, and disbursing of the public funds? Need I remind you of the strenuous effort made by the Bank of the United States, when the fiscal agent, to overpower the Government, and force it to her terms, for its preference over banks? I am sure I would be encroaching unnecessarily upon your time, did I enlarge upon these several propositions; and therefore shall proceed to examine the consequences that the Opposition would fain ascribe to the effects of this bill.

First. That it creates one currency for the Government, and another for the people; in other words, gold and silver for the office holders, paper currency for the people.

It is important, before we proceed to the examination of this assumption on the part of the Opposition to this bill, to have defined what they mean by currency. Are we to understand them that the paper currency, as it now exists, should be universal, so far as regards this Union? If so, and from the whole tenor of their arguments it is the fair inference, I take issue. There is no axiom in political economy, more universally admitted than that currency should be uniform and of equal value throughout a nation; if otherwise, injury is done to one portion of it. How will this principle apply to the present state of our currency? Is it uniform? Is it equal in value throughout the nation? Need I enlarge upon this point, to prove that it is not? It will even be admitted that paper currency itself, in different sections of the Union, differs in value; and from the Delaware to the most extreme southern point of the United States, all paper circulation is below the value of gold and silver, from five to twenty per cent. This, then, is the currency that the Government should receive, according to the views of the Opposition. Who would have supposed that there ever could have been a party, in this country, who would maintain such a system, which militates against the Constitution, fastens upon us a depreciated paper circulation, and does most manifest injustice to the Government creditor? This bill does not create one currency for the Government and one for the people. It does no more than the Constitution requires. It is based upon the immutable principles of justice; that is, in its collection it demands, progressively, gold and silver, and in payments by the Government the same is paid to its creditors. So with individuals in their transactions; no one is required to receive any currency of less value than gold and silver. And, sir, I will refer to an authority which cannot but have weight with the Opposition, maintaining, with his usual force of argument, the necessity of the Government collecting its revenue in gold and silver. I allude to the distinguished Senator of Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER.) He says:

"There was no nation which had guarded its currency with more care; for the framers of the Constitution, and those who enacted the early statutes on this subject, were hard money men. They had felt, and therefore duly appreciated, the evils of a paper medium; they therefore seduously guarded the currency of the United States from debasement. The legal currency of the United States was gold and silver coin; this was a subject in regard to which Congress had run into no folly. Mr. W. declined occupying the time of the House to prove that there was a depreciation of the paper in circulation. The legal standard of value was gold and silver; the relation of paper to it proved its state, and the rate of its depreciation. Gold and silver currency, he said, was the law of the land at home, and the law of the world abroad. There could, in the present state of the world, be no other currency. In consequence of the immense paper issues having banished specie from circulation, the Government has been obliged, in direct violation of existing statutes, to receive the amount of their taxes in something which was not recognised by law as the money of the country, and which was, in fact, greatly depreciated.

"As to the evil of the present state of things, Mr. W. admitted it in its fullest extent. If he was not mistaken, there were some millions in the Treasury, of paper, which were nearly worthless, and were now wholly useless to the Government, by which an actual loss of considerable amount must certainly be sustained by the Treasury. This was an evil which ought to be met at once, because it would grow greater by indulgence. In the end, the taxes must be paid in the legal money of the country, and the sooner that was brought about the better. If Congress were to pass forty statutes on the subject, he said, they would not make the law more conclusive than it now was—that nothing should be received in payment of duties to the Government but specie; and yet no regard was paid to the imperative injunction of the law in this respect. The whole strength of the Government, he was of opinion, ought to be put forth to compel the payment of the duties and taxes to the Government, in the legal currency of the country." He holds the same strong language in a speech delivered in April, 1816, on the collection of the revenue, which I should have read, did I not desire to close my remarks as soon as possible. Who, upon this floor, has gone further than this distinguished Senator for a hard money currency? Who has more ably and triumphantly sustained the principle contained in the bill, of the progressive payment of gold and silver for taxes and duties? Who has more impartially defended the duty of Government to preserve our legal currency, and not to embark on the wide ocean of a paper currency?

The gentlemen, in their eagerness to deceive the public, (and all for their love of the people, maintain and proclaim that this currency, of gold and silver, was only for the office holders. But what is the truth? Why, sir, of the whole collection, not one-tenth part of it goes to the office holders. To whom, then, is it paid? To Government creditors. And who are they? The war-worn soldier of the Revolution, whose services a country's gratitude placed on the pension list, calls upon a pension agent at Natchez (for example) for his small pittance, and is paid in the bank paper of that city, fifteen per cent. below the value of gold and silver. And the soldier and volunteer, who now fights under the scorching sun of Florida, is to be paid in depreciated paper; and the sailor, too, "whose march is on the mountain wave, whose home is on the deep." And shall I go farther, and tell you that the mechanic and the laborer, who toils from morn to eve, is to meet the same fate, if the system advocated by the Opposition is to prevail? Is such to be the currency of this country? Is this even-handed justice?

Second. They allege that it will destroy the banks, credit, and currency of the country.

How is this possible? The collection of twenty-five millions in gold and silver, throughout the Union, can have but little effect upon these institutions, one way or the other, and none whatever upon those that are solvent and prudent in their business. It is admitted, on all sides, that at no time can there be more than five millions of specie (when the whole dues are paid in this currency) in the Treasury, and the progressive principle contained in the bill will give the banks ample time to prepare for the change.

Some gentlemen seem very much alarmed that this amount of gold and silver, that would remain in the Treasury, might seriously affect the specie basis of the banks. One moment's reflection must dissipate such fears, if any do really exist. Assume that five millions in fourty-four are in the Treasury—how much, to supply this deficiency, would each bank have to purchase? We have nine hundred banks, whose capital is $358,000,000; and one and a half per cent. upon their capital would supply that abstraction. Is it not well known that the State banks, when they were selected as depositories, immediately enlarged their specie basis, by purchasing bullion from abroad? and surely it can be no hardship for these institutions to add this small amount to their specie basis. In addition to this, it enlarges our legal currency—an effect devoutly to be desired.

It will destroy credit. This proposition is so wild and irrational, that I am sure I need not detain you long upon its examination. How is it to destroy credit? Is it because the Government funds are not to be any longer used by banks? Is it because she will not countenance unsound institutions? I can imagine no other argument; and it is so brittle that it breaks with its own weight. I understand perfectly well, Mr. Chairman, the object of the effort made to ascribe to this bill the effect of destroying credit. It is for the purpose of carrying forth to the country the idea that the friends of this measure are opposed to all credit. It is not true; the charge is without the slightest foundation. No one has ever questioned the value of credit, so far as it contributes to advance productive industry, encourages a rational spirit of enterprise, and adds to the industrial capital of the country; but when, by legislation, you create means by which you can obtain credit, beyond the legitimate wants of the country, it will produce evils, and under those evils we are now suffering; and which, we contend, call loudly and strikingly for reformation. The credit system has been abused—has been inflated. Its abuse and inflation have been effected by an unnecessary increase of banking capital, (fifty per cent. of which is fictitious,) not for the advancement of the real wealth of the country, but to open avenues by which the reckless speculator may draw means to purchase our public domain, unproductive to him; by which individuals have been enticed from their usual avocations, to engage in business less laborious, but with a false hope of being more productive, and without any capital; by which the importer could flood our country with foreign products, and by which the luxurious and unproductive class could revel in their pleasures. Whatever amount of credit and capital is necessary to give full efficacy and power to all the branches of industry, should be encouraged and fostered; and, in the language of a celebrated author, "the undertakers of industry are really the heart of the body politic, and their capital is its blood."

The President, in his special message, holds this language on the credit system: "In expressing these sentiments, I design not to undervalue the benefits of a salutary credit to any branch of enterprise. The credit bestowed on probity and industry is the just reward of merit, and an honorable incentive to further acquisition; none oppose it who love their country, and understand its welfare. But when it is unduly encouraged; when it is made to inflame the public mind with the temptation of sudden and unsubstantial wealth; when it turns industry into paths that lead sooner or later to disappointment and distress, it becomes liable to censure, and needs correction. Far from helping probity and industry, the ruin to which it leads falls most heavily on the great laboring classes, who are thrown suddenly out of employment, and by the failure of magnificent schemes, never intended to enrich them, are deprived in a moment of their only resource. Abuses of credit and excesses in speculation will happen, in despite of the most salutary laws; no Government, perhaps, can altogether prevent them; but surely every Government can refrain from contributing the stimulus that calls them into life."

The currency is to be deranged; and how, I would ask? If I am to understand the gentlemen that the currency, as it now exists, is to be affected, and a currency equal to gold and silver, by the operations of this bill, to be substituted, I heartily respond to their proposition. But if they are for upholding and maintaining the present depreciated currency, (and from the tenor of that argument I have a fair right to draw this conclusion,) then we are as far apart as the poles. This bill can have no further effect upon our currency than aid in its regeneration.

Much has been said about money and currency, and their effects upon the prosperity of a country. We have had brought forward the currencies of the different countries of the world, for our imitation; one party of this House contending that such a currency would be most likely to advance our best interests; another such an one. Now, sir, so far as regards my own reflections upon this subject, I am free to say, that I do not consider it the best policy for this Government to imitate either. From our locality, from our wide and extensive domain, from the nature of our Government, we are forced to our own resources, for a stable and uniform currency. The legal currency of this country is gold and silver; the general currency is a mixed one, composed of gold and silver, and bank notes. The important principle to attain is, to preserve this mixed currency stable and uniform. It seems conceded on all sides that we cannot dispense with banks; and, in discussing this question of policy, I assume it. Then, sir, as our currency is a mixed one, how is it uniformly to be preserved?

The wise men who framed our Constitution (having the fatal consequences of a paper money, by authority, before them) established no other currency, or money, than gold and silver; and, if we desire to follow in their footsteps, this nation (composed of twenty-six sovereign States) must repudiate any currency that is not its equivalent, as a representative of value. Money is generally understood as the representative or measure of value; and it must be of equal value, or great injustice is imposed upon the community. And, sir, it is the universally admitted opinion, that gold and silver is the most stable and uniform currency that can be devised; and, being possessed of intrinsic value, has become the universal equivalent of any commodity throughout the world. Not so with a paper currency. It has no intrinsic value; it is, properly speaking, to a certain extent, a circulating credit. And, sir, it should never be permitted to circulate for any length of time, when it does not realize, on demand, gold and silver. This, then, should be the aim of this nation to effect. We have had it demonstrated, that to encourage an excessive paper circulation is not the true policy of this Government; but to circumscribe it as far as our constitutional powers will permit. The withdrawal of the public funds from banks, and the requirements of payment, gradually, of our debts in gold and silver, will have, irrefragably, a salutary influence upon our monetary system. And, sir, if a reformation cannot be effected, the banking system will break down with its own weight. There will be no necessity for legislation. I hold that no currency in this country can exist long, that does not maintain a gold and silver value. The people will not submit to any other.

Thirdly. That it will reduce the value of real estate, the wages of labor, and the productions of the country.

When gentlemen are compelled to resort to assumptions like these to sustain their opposition to this bill, they most demonstrably prove the weakness of their position. How can this bill affect the value of real estate? Gentlemen say that property is depressed, sacrifices made, and general ruin oppresses the landed interest; and that this state of things is to be imputed to the Independent Treasury. It must be by some magic that a measure not in existence has produced such a supposed revolution in our pecuniary affairs. Gentlemen are not to hope that bare assertion is to be admitted as fact, or false argument as true. No one who will examine dispassionately and impartially into cause and effect, but will admit that the true cause of the depression in the value of real property (if it does exist) is not the one assumed by the Opposition. I am not aware, however, Mr. Chairman, that the condition of the country, as assumed, is true; but for the argument admit it. What has produced it? The facilities of procuring means from banks brought into existence a speculative spirit, encouraged unusual competition; which gave a fictitious value to lands, and advanced their price above their real value. This state of things was temporary. Banks contract; loans reduced; means cease; and of consequence a reduction in the nominal value of land. In support of the justice of my conclusions, I will for a moment refer to days gone by. What was the cause of the pressure in the prices of lands, in 1818, '19, '20, '21, and '22, when the Bank of the United States was in existence? Yes, sir, for the wide-spread ruin that then overwhelmed our farmers, I could appeal to those who reside in my district for its intensity. Lands that were sold at that time for twenty to thirty dollars per acre, now bring from sixty to eighty dollars. They then experienced real distress from the extension and contraction of bank credit. No Independent Treasury at that time. It is, however, a consolation (in the wide spread desolation as depicted by the opponents of this bill) that the farmers of the district I have the honor to represent have avoided the rock upon which they split in 1819, '20, '21, and '22, and amid the present crush they stand unscathed.

The value of the products of the farmer is reduced by the operation of this bill, say its opponents. In maintaing this proposition, they refer to the present prices of grain, and impute its depression to the Independent Treasury. Do gentlemen seriously maintain this doctrine? If they do, I must confess that I was not prepared for such an absurdity. Prices of flour and grain are affected by supply and demand, and, in some measure, by expansions and contractions of credit. In 1820, flour was five dollars per barrel; in 1821, $3 75; in 1826, $4 50; in 1830, $4 50—when there was no Independent Treasury to operate. What then the causes? There were two—the supply greater than the demand, and contraction of credit. What is the true cause now? Through the bounties of Providence, we have been blessed with a luxuriant harvest, and the farmer's granaries are full to overflowing. He must have a market for the surplus, and in proportion to the demand the prices will advance or decline. There being no foreign demand for our staples, and a surcharge of the surplus necessary, prices of course decline; and in addition, the present condition of our banks more or less affects their prices. Notwithstanding this superabundance of our products, and no foreign demand for them, prices are not as low as they were in 1821, '26, and '30.

No one upon this floor can feel a deeper interest in the welfare and prosperity of the farmer than myself, and did I not, I should be unworthy a seat here. A large proportion of my constituents are farmers, whose support I have at all times received, and for which friendship I trust I shall never desert their best interests.

It will reduce the wages of labor.

The productive labor of this country should be fostered and encouraged; and could I believe that this bill could have the least effect upon this class of our population, it should never receive my support or vote. But as I conscientiously believe it will be productive of good, (to a certain extent,) and beneficial to this class of my fellow-citizens, I am impelled the more earnestly to advocate its passage. What should the mechanic and laborer, who has toiled the week out, receive for his labor? Should he receive it in depreciated bank paper? Should that class of our citizens, whose productive labor advances the true wealth of the nation, be compensated in less than gold and silver? Is this the doctrine of the Opposition? What are the prices of labor now? Have they been reduced materially, or at all? Is not labor better compensated now than it was in many periods during the existence of the Bank of the United States? The endeavor to impress upon the working class the idea that the Executive and his supporters are hostile to their interest, will not prevail. To no class of our community is the Democracy of the Union more indebted for its ascendency, and to no one class of its citizens will it cling more strongly, in maintaining their interest and supporting their welfare.

I now come to the last branch of this subject—the prominent causes that have produced the unsettled state of our monetary affairs, and the fluctuations of trade upon our commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural interests.

An ineffectual effort has been made by the Opposition to attribute to the measures and policy carried out and sustained by the late and present Executive, the deranged state of our currency, the vibrations and uncertainty of trade, and the pressure now existing upon a certain portion of our community. Would time allow me to enter into a full examination of the measures and policy of the late and present Administrations, I feel persuaded that I could satisfy every candid mind, who seeks for the truth, that so far from the measures recommended by the President as being productive of these evils, had they been carried out, they would have, to a very great extent, averted the present condition of our country. The causes are too prominent to be eschewed. They are no longer to be disguised. They are no longer to be enveloped in doubt and uncertainty by subterfuge and sophistry. They stand in bold relief before the people. And what are they? Excessive banking, carrying in its train excessive credit and an inflated currency, and the immense State loans created by issuing stocks (and which are held principally by foreign capitalists) for the purpose of prosecuting internal improvements and to provide for banking capital. These are of the prominent causes to which we are to ascribe our present monetary condition, and my design is to produce such facts as will conclusively sustain the position I have assumed.

In 1820, number of banks was 308, capital $137,000,000.

In 1830, number of banks was 320, capital $148,000,000.

In 1840, number of banks was (mark the difference) 901, capital $360,000,000.

The appalling fact is here developed, that the increase of banks, from 1830 to 1840, was five hundred and eighty-one, and the increase of capital, two hundred and eleven million dollars—seventy-five millions more than the whole capital of 1830. What other effect in our monetary system could have been anticipated, when these statements are before us? They opened at once a wild field for excessive credit and unsafe speculation; and how effectually was it embraced! In 1836, our imports exceeded our exports sixty-one millions. The banks discover that they have extended their credit beyond their available means. Curtailment takes place. What the consequence? a pressue in 1837, and a suspension of specie payments—a resumption in 1838. The same game played in 1839—thirty-nine millions imported over our exports, and thirty-four millions more than in 1838, and another suspension follows. And, in further elucidation of my views, contrast the sale of public lands between 1830, '35, and '36. In 1830, one million two hundred thousand dollars; in 1835, fourteen million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars; in 1836, twenty-four million dollars. Does not this expose, establish, beyond the possibility of cavil, the cause of the present unwholesome and unsound condition of our moneyed concerns? Does it not prove that fictitious banking capital, to seek employment, encouraged these enormous importations and wild speculations in our public domain? At one moment we have a redundancy of circulation, at another a contraction—continually disturbing the due and natural course of trade. And let me here call the attention of the manufacturers as to the effects which this overbanking has had upon their interests. To impute your distresses to the Independent Treasury bill, as the opponents of the General Administration contend, cannot be sustained by any fair reasoning. They have no data by which they have arrived to this conclusion. It is mere assertion, mere supposition. But I will show you, by data not to be overthrown, that the banks, by their enormous loans to importers, have facilitated the introduction of a large surplus, beyond the wants of the Government, of foreign goods, and which now are to be sold for what they will bring, to your great detriment and loss. They have driven you out of the market, unless you come in and submit to a wholesale sacrifice of your property. Had not these facilities been within the reach of the importers, would eighty five millions of foreign goods in two years beyond the exports, (and principally from England,) have been imported into this country, a supply far above the wants of the people? And had not more been imported than a wholesome trade would warrant, would it not have left you in the market, with a reasonable hope of realizing fair sales? Are you not, by this excess of foreign goods, remaining in the markets of New York and Philadelphia, and now being sold at auction, without reserve, sensibly and materially affected in the sale of your manufactured goods? I leave you to answer.

A new drain (and one of no common magnitude) upon the resources of our industry, has arisen in the enormous debt created by the different States of this Union, for the purposes of internal improvement and of banking capital. Scarcely freed from a debt of one hundred and twenty millions dollars, made for the prosecution of the late war, and the people yet warm rejoicing in their deliverance, are overwhelmed with a debt of two hundred millions, which does not nett two per cent.; a loss of six millions annually at least to the people of this country, payable to foreign capitalists. The effects produced by this rapid and unexampled creation of a public debt upon our monetary system and substantial interests of the country, are too manifest to be any longer concealed In the prosecution of my argument, it is far from my intention to do any injustice to the States; nor do I doubt, in the least, their capability of meeting their engagements promptly and honestly. But my object is to examine their condition with reference to its effects upon our monetary system, and the consequences that have followed from their immense loans.

It appears from unquestioned statements, that the debts contracted by the different States, for banking, canals, railroad, and miscellaneous objects, amount to not less than two hundred millions of dollars, for which certificates of stocks and bonds have issued. These loans are principally taken by the Bank of the United States, and occasionally by a few of the State banks; and as soon as the negotiation had been closed, the amount is credited on their books to the States, and immediately thereupon certificates of loan are issued in their favor. These certificates soon wend their way to Europe, through the Bank of the United States, to be sold, to uphold their increased business, produced by speculating in these loans when they were without legitimate means. So soon as these stocks received a shock, confidence in their solidity was questioned by the capitalists of Europe—sales ceased, unless from twenty to twenty-five per cent. below their par value, which deprives these banks of their anticipated resources. Disappointed in their means, they contract and oppress their debtors, notwithstanding they are not effectually relieved. Their situation continues imminent—bankruptcy is on their heels—suspension their dernier resort—the whole monetary system thereby deranged, and the people oppressed. This is one of the fatal results occasioned by the States negotiating their loans with the banks. Another is, that they have given a stimulus to excessive importations demonstrated by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on exports and imports, to which I call your attention.

From the year 1820 to 1830, (eleven years,) the excess of imports over exports was $37,662,959. From the year 1831 to 1838, (eight years,) the excess of imports over exports was $194,319,920.

The former period exhibits in the aggregate a legitimate business; the latter an overturning of the fair operations of trade. The difference of the imports, in these two periods, is in favor of the latter $156,656,961. No less surprising is the fact that during the same time, when, upon the fair principles of trade, our exports of gold and silver should have exceeded, from 1831 to 1838, those from 1820 to 1830, the very reverse is the truth.

From 1821 to 1831, excess of exports of gold and silver, $3,497,000. From 1832 to 1838, excess of imports of gold and silver, $55,054,158.

To what conclusions, from this extraordinary statement of facts, must we arrive? We are irresistibly compelled to attribute, in a great degree, the deranged and unsound state of our monetary system, the oppression of our commercial and manufacturing interests, and the immense increase of importations for the last eight years over our exports, to excessive banking at home, in connection with the vast State loans contracted in Europe.

In conclusion, did time permit, I should feel myself justified in noticing the attacks made by honorable gentlemen upon Ex-President Jackson, whose whole life has been devoted to his country's service, but shall content myself by merely observing that his name and actions have become part of his country's history; and when the aged patriot shall have ended his earthly career, and the green sod of the valley covers his bones, then even party asperity will admit his virtues, and posterity will venerate his great name. And the present Executive, "following in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor," will, for his prudent, wise, and energetic administration of the Government, receive the unwavering support of his Democratic fellow-citizens, who have nailed their banner at the mast-head, and spread it to the breeze, on which is inscribed, in large and bright letters—AN INDEPENDENT TREASURY—A SEPARATION OF THE GOVERNMENT FROM BANKS.

SPEECH OF MR. HOPKINS,

OF VIRGINIA.

In the House of Representatives, April 22, 1840—In Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriations for the civil and and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year 1840.

Mr. HOPKINS addressed the committee as follows:

MR. CHAIRMAN: I had no intention nor desire to engage in the discussion which this bill has produced; because it is a bill perfectly intelligible in its character and purpose, founded on Executive estimates, which have been subjected to the test of rigid calculation and economy; and without an appropriation to cover which, the credit, character, and functions of our Government must immediately and severely suffer.

On the merits of a financial measure so indispensable to the national welfare, I could anticipate no serious opposition from any quarter whatever; and still less a latitude of debate which embraces all the popular topics, whether pertinent or foreign, weighty or light, ludicrous or grave, which for a series of years have agitated the political parties of this country, and settled the pretensions of rival candidates for lead and authority in the national councils.

But reality has dispelled the illusions of hope, and baffled the anticipations of a sanguine mind. And I have been daily compelled to witness the illiberal distrust, jealousy, and fear, which have marked the debates of the Opposition on the important subject which is now before us. Instead of that temperate and enlightened policy which should pervade the National Legislature, and which should make each Representative of the people sensible of the good which always emanates from liberal sentiments and disinterested co-operation in our efforts to promote the public weal, each Opposition member seems to debate and to legislate on the principle that it is his duty to cripple and disconcert the order of public business—to stop, to unhinge, and to dislocate the whole machinery of the Government, and to hang it up, like "a rusty mail, in monumental mockery."

Union, sir, was the watchword to which our fathers unalterably adhered, and which enabled them to bequeath to us the precious inheritence we now enjoy; but which inheritence, I fear, we are fated to contaminate and impair, if not ultimately to destroy, by departing from the enlightened and patriotic policy on which they acted. Now-a-days that wise and liberal assurance of mutual confidence and support is forgotten in a fierce collision of jarring and conflicting passions, which can have no better tendency than to weaken and to undermine the wholesome institutions of our common country.

I am persuaded, sir, that if gentlemen will extend the sphere of their political horizon, and look down the vista of futurity, they must perceive the deplorable consequences to which this illiberal and short-sighted policy infallibly tends. They must see that this miserable and inglorious scuffle for power and place is calculated to debase the heart and understanding, to sour and eradicate all those generous and patriotic feelings which a benevolent nature implanted within us, and to depreciate the cause of free government all round the civilized globe.

Every government which the ingenuity of man has hitherto devised, has been necessarily attended with expense, and whoever expects to see any government successfully administered without the requisite pecuniary means, indulges an expectation that is vain and visionary, irrational and absurd. We must take the choicest dispensations of Providence with the alloy inseparable from them, and submit with resignation to the unavoidable conditions, while we enjoy the advantages of his omnipotent goodness.

To censure and depreciate our public characters with an indiscriminate and hasty zeal, and to charge every grievance, whether real or imaginary, national or private, to the folly and depravity of the Government, is the most ungenerous and unprofitable office which a Representative of the people can perform. It requires neither good breeding, intelligence, gratitude, nor patriotism, to perform it; and I feel it to be a duty which I owe to the whole country, and to my constituents especially, to remain no longer a silent listener to denunciations so illiberal, groundless, and futile, as those which have been so profusely lavished on the Administration by the Federal speakers; speakers who seem delighted with every opportunity to blazon and exaggerate the distresses of their country, and to discourse about every thing, rather than the necessary business which is now before us.

Before I proceed, however, to a consideration of the most important topics which the bill presents, I invoke the indulgence of this committee, while I make some passing commentaries on a document which has just been published, and circulated for political effect; a document which has been forced into the debate here, and which was designed to give to the people, while going to the polls to decide a great political contest, an exaggerated, unexplained, and odious representation of the expenditures of the Government from 1824 to 1837, inclusive, and of our Democratic policy and measures in relation to the national defence. I allude, sir, to the document signed by R. GARLAND, JOHN BELL, JOHN M. BOTTS, THOS. CORWIN, M. H. GRINNELL, J. C. CLARK, LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, TRUMAN SMITH, and CLARLES NAYLOR, who style themselves "The Executive Committee." Here, sir, is an extract from it:

This document is calculated to create a belief that it was prepared by a committee regularly raised by public authority, to investigate the expenses of the Government, and the military condition of the country. It is proper, therefore, that the public should know that neither House of Congress, nor any Department of the Government, ever raised or authorized that committee; but that, on the contrary, the members of it were raised and organized by the Federal party in Congress, and never had any more legal authority to exercise the province of a committee than the humblest private citizens of the nation have. And, as if they wisely distrusted their own intrinsic weight with the nation, they have artfully endeavored to derive a fraudulent assistance from the assumption of a character they never deserved, and to which they never had even a colorable title. But the members of this self-styled Executive Committee represent a party notorious for the assumption of imposing names—a party which has always entertained the delusive notion that party names could prevail over public principles, in the control and direction of the Government. Hence, whenever their public actions have rendered a particular name odious to the people, their names, but not their actions, have been suddenly changed.

The name of Federalist was one under which the high-handed tyranny of the elder Adams perpetuated so many mischievous deeds, that it was abandoned for the more hopeful name of Federal Republican. But the spirit of encroachment on the constitutional charter of our liberties continued the same, and induced that baffled and perplexed party to assume the name of National Republicans, and to maintain it until the short and disastrous Presidency of the younger Adams forced upon that party the necessity of another name. Accordingly, under the advisement of that notorious personage, James Watson Webb, the chosen champions of a hopeless cause assumed the name of Whigs. Yet, under all this chameleonism of party names, the hue and character of their political principles have remained the same; and, as if infatuation was disposed continually to afflict this disconsolate, deluded party, these ancient Federalists and modern Whigs now avow no public principles whatever, except the principle of raising themselves into power and place.

Boldly presuming on the ignorance and credulity of their fellow-men, they ostentatiously parade before the public view such coarse and vulgar pageantry as only gratifies the senses of a savage race. They impudently rate all reason and argument above the comprehension of the vulgar crowd; and treating the experience of half a century as a liar and a cheat, they rely on fictions as a commendable substitute for the realities of truth. As a fancied equivalent for common sense, they resort to defamation and abuse. And to suit each shifting and occasional calculation of selfish policy, they parcel themselves out, under the auspices of every name, claptrap and humbug, that promises to serve a temporary end.

No wonder, therefore, that sundry individuals of this party should assume the name of "Executive Committee," and put forth, to every portion of the country, their political addresses. Of one of these addresses, the following is a copy:

"WASHINGTON, January 24, 1840.

"SIR: The undersigned, an Executive Committee, appointed by the Opposition members of Congress, have taken the liberty of appointing you an Executive and Corresponding Committee for your county, and we have the honor of enclosing a prospectus for the Madisonian. We recommend that paper to the confidence and support of the opponents of the Administration throughout the country. The committee attach much importance to a general circulation of the Madisonian, and other political pamphlets, calculated to enlighten the public mind. The subscribers which you may procure (and we doubt not, ic nsidering the cheapness and ability of the paper, they will be many) will be entitled, gratis, to all such pamphlets.

"We have confidence that it will afford you pleasure to aid us n our efforts to rescue the Administration of the Government from the hands of the present imbecile and corrupt incumbents. With the aid of an honest and fearless press, these efforts, we trust, will be successful. We are aware that the acceptance of this appointment may subject you to some sacrifice: your patriotism is a sufficient guarantee that it will be borne with cheerfulness. The consideration that we are in the service of an injured and crushed people, should animate us in the use of every honorable exertion to effect the common object in view—the restoration of the Government to the days of her patriot Presidents. Your obedient servants,

JOHN BELL, Tennessee.
J. M. BOTTS, Va.
THOS. CORWIN, Ohio.
M. H. GRINNELL, N. Y.
LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, Mass.
TRUMAN SMITH, Conn.
CHAS. NAYLOR, Pa.
J. C. CLARK, N. Y.
Committee."

As this committee was appointed by the whole Federal party in Congress, and has acted, during the session, with the knowledge and approbation of that party, here and elsewhere, it is fair to conclude that the committee truly represents the party by which it was created.

But, I think, Mr. Chairman, you will presently agree with me that there is no member of that self-styled "Executive Committee," who can be very deeply interested in giving to a Democratic Administration a fair and impartial trial; especially on the subject of those Southern rights which Mr. Van Buren is solemnly pledged to support, and which various members of this committee have resolved to oppose, and have already opposed, to the full extent of their abilities.

On the 4th of March, 1839, "The Connecticut Anti-Slavery Society propounded to Mr. Truman Smith the following question, viz:

"1st. Are you in favor of the immediate abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia?

"2d. Are you opposed to the admission into this Union of any new State whose constitution tolerates slavery?"

And on the 17th of March, 1839, Mr. Smith answered in the affirmative, and boldly avowed that here were "questions of indissoluble right, where here could be no concession nor compromise."

In an address to the electors of Chenango county, published on the 3d of November, 1838, Mr. John C. Clark, while a candidate for Congress, declared that the right of petition belonged equally to all "without reference to condition or color;" and expressed the fervent hope that the period was not remote when "the appeals of the free, the humane, and the oppressed, for the abolition of slavery, would not be made in vain."

Mr. Thomas Corwin, the present candidate of the Federal party for the office of Governor in Ohio, recorded his vote with his associates Messrs. Smith, Clark, Gates, and Slade, against a resolution offered in the House of Representatives by Mr. Wm. Cost Johnson, declaring that "no petition, memorial, or resolution, or other paper, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or any State or Territory, or the slave trade between the States or Territories of the United States in which it now exists, shall be received by the House, or entertained in any manner whatever."

But do not fear, Mr. Chairman, that I have resolved to distress you with a separate biographical notice of the illustrious nine who compose the self-styled executive committee. They are friendly companions, one and all, associated in a common cause; and have, like their ancestors before them, linked their fortunes in one concerted Federal tie. But there is one member who deserves a special remembrance; for he was notorious, in very memorable days, for an open resistance to men and measures on which our proudest recollections delight to dwell. The memory of the Hartford Convention cannot die. It is embalmed in memory and recorded in history as a negative example to after times. One of the grievances which the New England Federal party of that day complained of, was, that the Southern States had an undue share of power in the constitutional apportionment of representatives to Congress; and the Hartford Convention labored to divest the South of a portion of its political power, and to prevent the admission into the Union of every slaveholding State.

When this nation was engaged in the thickest of a perilous and doubtful war with England; a war for national honor and independence; a war on the issues of which the liberties of the only Republic in the world depended, the honorable LEVERETT SALTONSTALL prominently figured on the public stage. If a faithful memory fails me not, he was then a member of the Massachusetts Legislature, in which he brought forward and supported the memorable measures of the Hartford Convention; measures calculated to defeat the public will, to discourage the national defence, to encourage the public enemy to ravage our coast, to burn our towns, to desolate our fruitful fields; and, in a spirit of savage barbarity, to violate youth, beauty, and innocence; and to spare no sacred altars, and no household gods.

"At the extra session of the Massachusetts Legislature, in October, 1814, Governor Strong's message was referred to a select committee, composed of the following members: Messrs. Otis, Bemis, and Wood, of the Senate, and Messrs. Sullivan, Saltonstall, Lincoln, and Whitman, of the House of Representatives; which committee, on the 8th of October, reported in favor of calling the Hartford Convention." The report recommends a choice of delegates to that convention, in which other States were earnestly invited to unite; and the committee declared that the Constitution of the United States, under the administration of the persons then in power, had failed to secure to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the Eastern sections of the Union, those equal rights and benefits which were the great objects of its formation; and which they could not relinquish without ruin to themselves and their posterity. That those grievances justified and required vigorous, persevering, and peaceable efforts to unite those who realize the sufferings and foresee the dangers of the country, in some system of measures to obtain relief, for which the ordinary mode of procuring amendments to the Constitution affords no reasonable expectation, in season to prevent the completion of its ruin. That the people, however, possessed the means of certain redress; and that as their safety, which was the supreme law, was in question, those means should be promptly applied.

Yes, Mr. SALTONSTALL and his coadjutors prevailed on their disaffected brethren in the New England States to organize the Hartford Convention, the members of which were collected from Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Vermont; and which Convention did, on the 4th of January, 1814, prepare and promulgate to the world, a long report and many resolutions, all tending to depreciate and revile the measures of their own Government, and to force this nation to ground her arms, and to surrender our honor and independence to English tyranny and domination. In one of these Hartford Convention resolutions the ominous threat was boldly proclaimed, "that if the application of those States to the Government of the United States, as recommended in a preceding resolution, should be unsuccessful, and peace should not be concluded, and the defence of those States should continue to be neglected, it would be expedient for the Legislatures of the several States to appoint delegates to another convention, to meet at Boston, on the third Thursday of June, 1814, with such powers and instructions as the exigency of a crisis so momentous should require."

That this unhallowed work might speedily progress, and the Hartford Convention be freely encouraged in a factious opposition to the national will, and to frown with indignation on the national success and a further prosecution of the war, the Massachusetts Senate, then wholly controlled by the Federalists, resolved, on the 15th June, 1813, that "in a war like the present, waged without justifiable cause, and prosecuted in a manner which indicates that conquest and ambition are its real motive, it is not becoming a moral and religious people to express any approbation of military or naval exploits which are not immediately connected with our seacoast and soil."

However disguised, sir, the obvious tendency of those proceedings in the Massachusetts Legislature and the Hartford convention was to prepare the way for a separation of the Union, and the formation of a different structure of government. And, indeed, in the various debates which recommended those proceedings, it was boldly contended that the Constitution of this country could no longer be respected; and that a revolution in the Government should carry no terrors to a patriotic heart.

That the Hartford convention spirits of the last war are part and parcel of the Whig or Federal party of the present day, is obvious from the fact that every surviving member of that convention is acting with the Whigs; and that each deceased member died in that political faith, under some one of the various names which the Federal party has capriciously assumed.

In support of this assertion, you will allow me to avouch the testimony of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. PARMENTER] who resides in the vicinity of Boston, where the Hartford Convention drama was gotten up, and where some of the actors in that dark tragedy still reside.

In the fall of 1838, when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] was a candidate for the seat he now holds in this House, "the Essex Antislavery convention" propounded to him a variety of questions on the subject of slavery.

To these questions Mr. SALTONSTALL, on the 1st of November, made a long reply, the substance of which is embraced in the following extracts, viz:

"As to the constitutional power of Congress to abolish slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, I have never had any doubt, and did not suppose, until recently, that it could be made a question, or that the exercise of the power would be opposed on that ground. I think it clear, also, as a general principle, that Congress has power to abolish slavery in the Territories. . . . . .

"The question as to the constitutional power of Congress to abolish the slave trade between the States is one of more difficulty. . . . . .

"But, not to enlarge, from what examination I have given the subject, my present opinion is, that Congress has the power to prohibit the slave trade between the States.

"Those powers with which the Constitution has invested Congress relate to vastly important subjects. None more so can come under their consideration. Surely no reason can be found in their great importance, why they should not be exercised. However delicate, exciting, or complicated, questions in relation to slavery may be, or may be made, they ought, in my opinion, to be brought before Congress, and to be made the subject of full, free, and deliberate discussion in that legislative body, which alone has the power to remedy these evils. No one who has noticed the 'signs of the times,' and the progress of opinion concerning slavery, not only in the United States, but throughout the civilized world, can doubt but these subjects must be brought forward, and that Congress must, and will, eventually, exercise their constitutional power in relation to them. I do not now see what is to be gained by delay, or how these questions are to becomes less difficult or complicated by postponement. On the contrary, with my present views, I am of opinion that Congress ought immediately to exercise its full constitutional powers, by efficient legislation on the subject of slavery.

"I have always considered it a sufficient ground for a want of confidence in the President of the United States, that, in entering on the duties of his office, he made the gratuitous declaration, in effect, that he should veto any bill which for its object the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia—the most objectionable sentiment ever avowed by a Chief Magistrate of this nation."

During our last war with England, the gentleman [Mr. S.] was also a prominent member of the Essex Convention, over which Timothy Pickering presided; and from which convention that Federal junto promulgated so many treasonable threats, and disreputable slanders against Jefferson, Madison and their political friends.

The memorable document which that junto issued on the 12th of July, 1812, may suffice as a sample of the rest. Here, sir, is an extract from it:

"We have the confession of Mr. Jefferson, when in an evil hour he gained the President's chair, that the United States were in the full tide of successful experiment. And what has changed the scene? What has produced years of suffering, and at length war? The total departure from those principles of administering our Government which had brought in a full tide of prosperity."

* * * * * * *

"Our country is greviously oppressed by prohibitions of trade, wantonly imposed by the Government of the United States; and its measure of iniquity is now filled up, by a declaration of war, impolitic, unnecessary and unjust.

"We will not submit. Men deaf to the voice of reason and justice must be deprived of power.

"We delare that our rulers, (James Madison and the Republican administration of that time) have forfeited all public confidence, and that our dearest interests require every possible effort to reduce them to private life.

"Those representatives who supported and voted for those pernicious measures, and finally for the desperate and atrocious act of declaring war, have shown themselves to be enemies of the Commonwealth.

"Our common interest, liberty and safety are now more injured by the doings of our National Government, than they were, who, in 1775, took up arms to defend them against the measures of the Government of Great Britain."

By order of the Convention.

"TIMOTHY PICKERING, President.

Here, then, sir, is a great central committee which the Federal party have organized at the seat of Government, some of whose members stand pledged to abolish slavery in every form, and whenever they can; and to ripen and to consummate that vast and horrid scheme of political ambition, which the Federalists of the South and Abolitionists of the North have conjointly planned to sever the Union, and to cover the land with murder, rebellion, and blood. And, as if to insult the pride, to awaken the apprehension, and to kindle the indignation of every Southern patriot, a Hartford Convention politician is selected to counsel and to guide!—a peace-loving hero, who, in the hour of battle, stood upon the confines of treason to his country's cause, and had only to make another step to reach the felon's gallows, or the headman's axe!

Yet, sir, this public spirited patriot—this heroic champion of liberty and law—now modestly invokes a restoration of this Government to the days of our patriot Presidents!

Surely, sir, Democrats who desire the maintenance of Southern rights may well distrust the policy of any restoration which such a self-created Executive Committee is calculated to produce; and very safely ascribe the pretended fear of a standing army, the affected, new born zeal for public economy and the general weal, and all the various political scarecrows of the day, to the same Federal aristocracy which has always labored under a political disability to be pleased with any thing that a Democratic Administration could effect; and which has steadily endeavored to depreciate the honor, prosperity, and institutions of this country, whenever Federalism ceased to rule it legitimately by the grace of God.

This financial document, artfully prepared by a self-created Executive Committee, purports to prove by an unexplained statement taken from the Treasury Department, in 1838, that the expenditures of the United States amounted, in 1837, to $39,164,745; and, on the credit of the unexplained statement, the credulous and uninformed multitude are invited to believe that the current ordinary expenses of the Government have reached this magnitude under the auspices of our present Democratic Administration.

The very same Treasury Department, from whence the Executive Committee obtained their unexplained statement, fully and precisely shows each separate item of the public expenditures. Yet this fair, impartial, patriotic, self-created executive committee produced nothing, and stated nothing, which indicates how, or for what purpose, any one item of those public expenditures accrued. No; that would have defeated the purpose for which the precious document was concocted, and would have convinced the public mind that the practice and professions of the present Administration have fairly conformed to the public expectation and desire.

But, sir, delusion must take her dusky flight, and public justice must be amply vindicated. The whole and wholesome truth is what the people anxiously desire, and are entitled to receive. And it shall go freely forth to the world, that every honest and rational man may comprehend and acknowledge the wrongs—the flagrant, wilful wrongs—that have been offered to this wise, upright, and economical Administration.

Here, sir, is a tabular statement, showing, in three separate columns, the public expenditures from 1824 to 1839, inclusive:

Years	Aggregate amount of all expenditures, or payments of every kind, from the Treasury.	Aggregate amount independent of the payments on account of the public debt, whether funded or unfunded.	Aggregate amount for permanent and ordinary purposes, excluding payments on account of objects either extraordinary or temporary.

1839	37,129,396 80	25,982,797 75	12,325,800 18

And here, sir, is another tabular statement, showing the public expenditures for extraordinary objects, including the public debt, in 1837, 1838, and 1839; that is, during the three years of Mr. Van Buren's Presidential service:

Public debt	1837.	1838.	1839.
Trust funds	$21,322 91	$5,605,720 27	$11,146,599 05

	313,931 71	402,326 17	232,359 36

The first of these tabular statements exhibits the aggregate expenditures; and the second one the detailed, separate expenditures for extraordinary and temporary purposes, including the public debt.

The second table explains the third column in the first one; and the two tables will enable every citizen to understand the true amount and character of our public expenditures. They clearly show that the public expenditures for permanent and ordinary purposes have never amounted to $14,000,000, during any one year of the present Administration.

The table commences with the last year of Mr. Monroe's administration, and comes down through the single term of Mr. Adams, the two terms of General Jackson, and the three years of Mr. Van Buren; and applies the same impartial rule to them all. It first gives the aggregate, and then separates the extraordinary from the ordinary expense; and by a simple exhibition of figures, clearly shows that the aggregate expense of Mr. Monroe's administration was not, as has been too often asserted, asserted, only $13,000,000, but about the double of that; while the frugality claimed for any preceding administration at the expense of Mr. Van Buren's, is deceptious and unreal, and is only apparent, even in a fallacious form, when resort is had to the very process which reduces the expense of Mr. Van Buren's administration below the sum of $14,000,000; that is, by a deduction of the extraordinary.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have met with no gentleman of enlarged views and knowledge of this great country, who would venture to assert that $14,000,000 as wa prodigal allowance for the current expenses of a nation so extensive in territory, so expansive in action, and so progressive in wealth, power, and resources, as the Republic of the United States. Every gentleman, I think, concedes the propriety of such an allowance for the maintenance of a Government so mighty as this. But the Opposition party endeavor to fasten on the Administration the exclusive responsibility and the public odium of every expenditure beyond this sum; and unfairly argue that the President is bound, without regard to the public will, to Congressional action, or party votes, to limit by Executive interference the public expenditures to a determinate and precise sum.

This doctrine of the Opposition is arbitrary and cruel, and exposes the President to certain and undivided censure, no matter what his conduct may be. For if he approves a bill for any extraordinary or temporary expenditure of money, he is forthwith charged with extravagance and prodigality. If he rejects it, he is charged with settled hostility to the improvement of his country; and the ready and concocted clamor goes forth that the public prosperity is paralyzed by ruthless shocks from the veto power of the President.

This, sir, is the same sort of ungrateful treatment which President Jackson received from the pretended friends of a strict and frugal Government.

When General Jackson was placed at the head of the Government, the Jeffersonian expounders of the Constitution were feeble and few; and not more than forty-five trusty Democrats could be mustered in the House on a call of the roll.

Federal construction had become so strongly armed with gravers' tools and mining implements, that paper money was created without stint; and while sturdy mountains stooped their ponderous heads, artificial rivers and magnificent roads every where proclaimed the extravagant log-rolling spirit of the age. The representative integrity of the nation had capitulated to the potent and seductive assaults of corruption. Members of Congress, and the conductors of the press, had soiled their pockets with the fatal lure of a great moneyed power, acting in open defiance of the Government.

And the last hope of a written Constitution, and the perpetuity of free government, resided in the Executive breast, in the stout and honest heart of General Jackson. He defended the sacred charge. And his veto of the Maysville road bill and the United States Bank must ever rank in history among the proudest of his civil achievements. He who had faced with dauntless breast the foreign tyrants of his country, nerved his heroic soul to a successful combat with those stealthy corruptors and internal enemies of the Republic.

The earnest solicitude which President Jackson constantly evinced to limit the public expenditures to the economical wants of a frugal Government, is matter of history; and is illustrated in his public messages to Congress, in his opposition to a tariff for protection, to the system of internal improvements, to a continuance of the United States Bank, and to all those doubtful and constructive powers, the exercise of which created perpetual discord in the nation, and an appalling drain on the public Treasury; and I may add, sir, that his economical spirit was strongly manifested in the payment of more than fifty millions of the national debt.

Still the public expenditures greatly exceeded his expectation and desire. But that was his misfortune rather than his fault. He could not possibly prevent it; for he never had, at any time, from the commencement to the close of his eventful administration, a majority in both Houses of Congress, and he was sometimes found, I believe sir, in a minority in both.

But no motive but the public good could touch his impenetrable heart. He persevered, and attained his ends; and by the purity of his purposes, the wisdom of his councils, the vigor of his resolves, and the cloudless glory of his character, brought back the body politic to a healthful constitutional action.

That Mr. Van Buren has also endeavored, by every constitutional and rightful method, to check the spirit of extravagance which has prevailed in the expenditure of the public funds, there is abundant evidence to prove. In his able and explicit letter of October, 1832, to the North Carolina committee at Shocco Springs, he expressed the opinion that the general interests of the whole country would be greatly promoted by withholding appropriations for internal improvements, until some constitutional regulation upon the subject could be provided. It is true, sir, he once voted for a bill to authorize tolls on the Cumberland road, a public work projected many years before. But I am not aware that the constitutional powers which that road involves, were discussed until President Monroe vetoed one of the Cumberland road bills; and in the debate on Foote's resolution, to authorize the Vice President to call to order for words spoken in the Senate, Mr. Van Buren alluded to his vote on the Cumberland road bill, and declared that it was the only vote he had ever given in the Senate, which could be tortured into a departure from the principles he truly entertained—that he deeply regretted the vote—that if the question were presented again, he should vote against it; and that he applauded the course of President Monroe, when he stamped his negative upon that bill. His annual message to the present Congress, proves the sincerity of his views upon this important subject, and has subjected him to the violent censure of the latitudinous Whig party, who claim and exercise unlimited authority to appropriate the national revenue to objects of internal improvement, and then charge the evil consequences on the Democratic party.

On the 14th of February last, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD] a talented and distinguished Whig, asserted on this floor that "the great interest of internal improvement by the General Government, was placed in jeopardy by the attitude which President Van Buren had assumed towards it. "Here, in my place, and on my responsibility, as a member of this House, I charge (said he) that the President of the United States has now assumed an attitude of distinct and avowed hostility to the policy of making further appropriations for internal improvements; and I shall refer to proof of the fact. I make this charge, not certainly in the way of reproach, since the President has acted in the matter, in the discharge of his constitutional duty, as the official adviser of this House; and, as I am bound to suppose, according to his conviction of right and duty; but I speak of the matter of fact, as I shall now show it to be: a matter beyond doubt or controversy." The gentleman [Mr. BARNARD] having exhibited the evidence in support of his charge against the President, said that nobody could doubt, who looked into the evidence, that it was the settled policy of the President, in which he was sustained by his Secretaries, that no appropriation whatever ought to be made, the present year at least, for works of internal improvement. That the President insisted, in the strongest terms, on the duty of Congress to keep the appropriations within the estimates presented; and insisted that nothing should be appropriated for works of internal improvement. That both the Legislature and the Executive should be held to the strictest accountability if any thing of the sort should be permitted; and intimated that he (the President) might interpose his veto authority to prevent it?

It is passing hard, therefore, that the Federalists should, in the teeth of their own voluntary evidence, charge the President with a disposition to dissipate the public funds, and to encourage extravagance in the most dangerous and hateful forms.

If, during the present administration of the Government, an increase in the aggregate expenditures of the nation has taken place, the items referred to in the table I have produced, will fairly exhibit the purpose and character of it; and prove that the increase has arisen in the army and navy—in the Indian service—in the Indian wars—in the removal of the Indians, and in the purchase of their lands—in the protection of our Northern and Western frontiers—in our public arms and munitions of war—in the defence of our maritime coast—in pensions—in the remuneration of our gallant officers and soldiers—in the charges of national legislation—in durable fire proof edifices for the public offices and archives—and in the various expenditures for the District of Columbia, over which Congress exercises a guardian care.

It is not my purpose here to vindicate either the separate or aggregate expenditures made under the present and past Administrations; but to prove that such expenditures cannot be honestly condemned by the Opposition party, for the obvious reason that those expenditures, at the very time they were authorized, received more countenance and support from the Opposition, than they ever did from the Administration party.

The votes on which the yeas and nays were taken in Congress, during the present and past Administrations, will plainly show, that a large majority of the Opposition members did freely and cordially support the bills for extraordinary appropriations. These votes are recorded in the journals of Congress, promulgated and confirmed in the speeches and proceedings of the day; and furnish abundant, undeniable, and conclusive proof, as I shall now attempt to show.

The "Act supplementary to the act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution," approved 7th June, 1832, passed the House of Representatives by a vote of yeas 128, nays 45; of the affirmative, 60 were of the Opposition. Of the negative, 20 were of the Opposition.

In the Senate, this bill was passed by a vote of yeas 24, nays 19. In the affirmative, 15 of the Opposition, in the negative but 2.

The aggregate expenditure under this bill has been $11,922,232.

A bill authorizing a subscription to the stock of the Alexandria Canal Company, approved 25th June, 1832, was ordered to a third reading in the House of Representatives, by a vote of yeas 90, nays 78. Of the affirmative, 69 were of the Opposition, of the negative, only 11.

In the Senate, the vote upon this bill was yeas 38, nays 5. Of the affirmative, 22 were of the Opposition, of the negative, none. Sum appropriated by this bill was $100,000.

A bill to raise a regiment of mounted rangers, approved June 15, 1832, passed the Senate by a vote of yeas 30, nays 11. 18 of the Opposition for the bill, and 3 against it.

The yeas and nays were not taken on this bill in the House of Representatives, but I infer from the favorable consideration given to it in the Senate by members in the Opposition, that it received the support of their friends in the House.

This regiment of rangers was subsequently converted into one of dragoons, and has produced an annual expenditure of $300,000, making in eight years $2,400,000.

A bill vesting in the corporation of the city of Washington the rights of the Washington Canal Company, approved May 31st, 1832, was passed in the House of Representatives by a vote of yeas 99, nays 91. Of the affirmative, 70 were of the Opposition; of the negative, only 13.

The expenditure under this bill was $150,000.

A bill to improve the navigation of the Potomac river between Georgetown and Alexandria, approved March 2d, 1833, was passed in the House of Representatives by a vote of yeas 105, nays 69. Of the affirmative, 66 were of the Opposition; of the negative, only 11.

The expenditure under this bill was $150,000.

A joint resolution for the continuation of Gales and Seaton's compilation of State Papers, approved 2d March, 1833, passed the Senate by a vote of yeas 22, nays 9. Of the affirmative, 18 were of the Opposition; of the negative, 1.

The expenditure under this act was $145,606.

A bill for the benefit of the city of Washington, (interest on Holland debt,) approved June 28th, 1834, passed the House of Representatives by a vote of yeas 98, nays 78. Of the affirmative, 53 were of Opposition; of the negative, only 11.

In the Senate this bill was passed by a vote of yeas 21, nays 19. Of the affirmative, 18 were of the Opposition; of the negative, 8.

The expenditure under this bill was $70,000.

A bill for the better organization of the marine corps, approved June 30th, 1834, passed the Senate by a vote of yeas 25, nays 12. Of the affirmative, 19 were of the Opposition; of the negative, 1.

This act produced an annual expenditure of about $70,000; exclusive of an increase of the pay of officers of the corps by other acts, making in six years the aggregate sum of $420,000.

A bill to regulate the pay of the navy, approved March 3d, 1835, was ordered to a third reading in the Senate by a vote of yeas 29, nays 12. Of the affirmative, 21 were of the Opposition; and of the negative, only three.

This bill passed the House of Representatives by a vote of yeas 117, nays 103. Of the affirmative, 61 were of the Opposition; and of the negative, only 14.

According to the estimate of the Fourth Auditor, this bill produced an increased annual expenditure of about $500,000, which, in five years, amounts to $2,500,000.

A bill authorizing the South Sea and Pacific Ocean Exploring Expedition, approved May 14th, 1836, passed the House of Representatives by a vote of yeas 92, nays 68. Of the affirmative, 45 were of the Opposition; and of the negative, 25.

The estimates of expenditure under this act, in 1836,-37,-38, and '39, amount to the sum of $559,382.

A bill for the relief of the corporate cities of the District of Columbia, approved May 20, 1836, passed the Senate by a vote of yeas 17, nays 16. Of the affirmative, 9 were of the Opposition, and of the negative 7.

This bill passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 110; nays 69. Of the affirmative, 56 were of the Opposition, and of the negative, only twenty.

The appropriation under this bill was $1,500,000.

A bill to regulate the compensation of certain officers of the revenue cutters, approved July 2, 1836, passed the House of Representatives by a vote of yeas 143, nays 52. Of the affirmative, 51 were of the Opposition, and of the negative 29.

This bill produced an annual increase of expenditure, (taking the number of officers now in the service as the rule of calculation,) of $17,684, making, in four years, an aggregate increase of $70,736.

A bill to raise an additional regiment of dragoons or mounted riflemen, approved May 23, 1836, passed the House of Representatives by a vote of yeas 145, nays 32. Of the affirmative, 59 were of the Opposition, and of the negative only 17.

The annual increase of expenditures under this bill is about $300,000, making an aggregate, in four years, of $1,200,000.

A bill to provide for the improvement of certain harbors, and for the removal of obstructions at the mouths of certain rivers, and for other purposes, approved March 3d, 1837, passed the House of Representatives by a vote of yeas 107, nays 51. Of the affirmative, 49 were of the Opposition, and in the negative 23. This bill passed the Senate by a vote of yeas 24, nays 17. Of the affirmative, 10 were of the Opposition, and of the negative only 3.

The expenditure under this bill was $300,000.

A bill to amend the judicial system, approved March 3d, 1837, passed the Senate by a vote of yeas 38, nay 1. Of the affirmative, 22 were of the Opposition.

A bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1836, producing an increased expenditure, was ordered to a third reading in the Senate by a vote of yeas 41, nay 1. Of the affirmative, 23 were of the Opposition.

A bill for the collection of materials, and the purchase of sites, &c. for the construction of certain fortifications, passed the Senate on the 26th of May, 1836, by a vote of yeas 31, nays 9. Of the affirmative, 11 were of the Opposition.

A bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1837, passed the House of Representatives February 23d, 1837. An amendment appropriating $400,000 for six vessels of war, was agreed to in the House by a vote of yeas 116, nays 48. Of the affirmative, 50 were of the Opposition, and of the negative 23.

A resolution for the purchase of books for distribution among such members of the 25th Congress as had not received the same under former resolutions, was introduced by Mr. Rariden, and on the 27th January, 1838, passed by a vote of yeas 113, nays 71. Of the affirmative, 54 were of the Opposition, and of the negative 31.

A bill making partial appropriations for the suppression of Indian hostilities of 1838, passed the House of Representatives by a vote of yeas 164, nays 2. Of the affirmative 75 were of the Opposition, and of the negative 2.

The appropriation under this bill was $1,000,000.

A bill making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for the year 1838 and for arrearages of 1837, passed the House of Representatives by a vote of yeas 143, nays 37. Of the affirmative 48 were of the Opposition, and of the negative 35.

The appropriation under this bill was $6,739,410.

A bill making an appropriation for the continuation of the Cumberland road, passed the House of Representatives by a vote of yeas 96, nays 80. Of the affirmative 65 were of the Opposition, and of the negative 24.

The appropriation under this bill was $459,850.

A bill making appropriations for building lighthouses, &c. passed the House of Representativs by a vote of yeas 65, nays 56. Of the affirmative 41 were of the Opposition, and of the negative 16.

The amount of appropriation under this bill was $307,000.

A bill to provide for certain harbors, and for the removal of obstructions at the mouths of certain rivers, &c. during the year 1838, passed the House of Representatives by a vote of yeas 108, nays 81. Of the affirmative 65 were of the Opposition, and of the negative 27.

The appropriation under this bill was $1,535,008.

This account of our national appropriations and expenditures is faithful and true; and is fully illustrated and confirmed by the unimpeached and unimpeachable records of the whole country. No ingenuity can falsify it. No sophistry can pervert it. It must remain forever as a lasting refutation and wholesome rebuke of all the idle, ungenerous, and disingenuous charges which have been continually made against the present administration of the Government.

I sigh, Mr. Chairman, over the frailties of political ambition, and the degeneracy of partisan morals, when, in the very teeth of such authentic and irrefutable evidence—evidence which proves the sincere and persevering disposition of the Administration party to keep the public expenditures within the limits of a wise and wholesome economy—we daily witness the bold, ceaseless, and unscrupulous efforts of the Federal party to distort facts—to reprobate the very expenditures which they themselves did publicly advise—to cast on others the evil and the odium of a public prodigality which they themselves created and continually sustained by their own recorded speeches and votes—to barter the refined and enduring gold of private and national justice for the acquisition of some trashy capital in hand; and to reverse the proper positions, and the faithful lights in which the muse of history should record the character and the actions of our public men.

No force should resist, no art repress, nor subterfuge avert the public indignation, when reckless, factious partisans desperately determine to govern or to ruin a great and prosperous nation. Truth, virtue, patriotism, and wisdom, give a preferable title to command the councils of a free, enlightened people; and must always lie at the bottom of national glory and felicity.

No party, however emulous of rule, or exalted in authority, can venture with impunity to weaken and to undermine this fair and solid foundation of Republican prosperity.

We owe it to the bounty of Providence that the mischievous desires of the heart are often counteracted by a strange confusion of the head, which makes desperate politicians audacious without art, and hypocritical without deceiving. Nature has implanted a salutary instinct in the mind, and a sense of eternal justice in the heart, which enables every virtuous people to appreciate their honest benefactors, and to protect them against the crafty combinations of confederated foes; the scheming avarice of party strife; and all the vile, revengeful, maddening rage of disappointed ambition.

Gentlemen in the Opposition exaggerate the distress of the times; and prognosticate a restoration of national felicity under the hopeful reign of General Harrison. They first overcharge their picture of distress; and then applaud the efficacious panacea of a National Bank, in making a cure, and in raising and maintaining the prices of our staple productions.

Sir, the future may be safely predicted from a faithful history of the past. During the palmy days of the National Bank there was as much general distress, and as much fluctation in the prices of our staple commodities as there has been since.

The average price of flour in Philadelphia, during the four years of Mr. Adams's administration was $5 11¾. During the eight years of General Jackson's administration, it was $5 90. During the four years of Mr. Van Buren's administration it has not been less than $7.

In Niles's Register, under date of October 9th, 1819, we find the following:

"WHEAT.—The Buffalo Journal of the 14th ultimo, says considerable quantities of wheat of the first quality were sold during the past week at thirty seven and a half cents the bushel; and the Gazette says, it did not meet a ready sale even at that price."

Again: "There was a considerable sale of good and wholesome flour in Baltimore, a few days since, which after the cost of transportation and other incidental expenses were paid, yielded the owner only $1 25 cents the barrel."—Register, March 17, 1821.

This was under the reign of the National Bank and during the "era of good feelings" in Mr. Monroe's administration. But one then had the folly to tell the farmers, that these low prices were owing to the administration, nor could they be charged to the want of a National Bank. But let us come ten years later—take the year 1830, with a National Bank, and 1840 without a National Bank. The prices in those years in the great Western market for bread stuffs and provisions, Rochester, were as follows:

In April, 1830, with a National Bank.	In February, 1840, without a National Bank.
Wheat, 75 cents a bushel,	Wheat, 88 cents a bushel,
Flour, $4 25 the barrel,	Flour, $5 25 the barrel,
Oats, 20 cents the bushel,	Oats, 31 cents the bushel,
Corn, 35 do	Corn, 47 do
Potatoes, 18 do	Potatoes, 20 do
Beef, $2 50 to $3 cwt.	Beef, $4 to $5 cwt.
Pork, $4 per cwt.	Pork, $5 per cwt.

I present, sir, a statement of prices, taken in part from the Pennsylvanian, and in part from the Globe, and which, I presume, is correct:

From 1811, when the charter of the old National Bank expired, to 1816, when the recent United States Bank was incorporated, the average price of flour in Philadelphia was $9 19, and so great was the fluctuation in the prices of that article after the National Bank commenced business, that in 1820 flour fell to $4 72, the smallest average price in the Philadelphia market since 1790.

Here we find that when the National Bank was in all its noon of power and fame—in the prosperous golden days of 1830—the prices of produce were considerably lower than they now are, under all the hindrance and embarrassment which a suspension of specie payments by the "great regulator" and its attendant satellites was calculated to produce.

The embarrassment and distress which gentlemen complain of have been produced, in a great measure, by the very policy which their own political friends have advocated and forced on the country.

I propose, sir, to examine some of the prominent causes of this imputed embarrassment and distress; and, unless I am grossly deceived, or wholly incapable of comprehension, I think I may affirm that the Administration is in no way responsible for them. The secret of the pecuniary revulsion which has fallen on the banks, impaired their credit, and disconcerted the natural order of trade, lies in causes over which the General Government could exercise no control, without a total prohibition of all the wise and salutary principles of the Constitution.

It is the province of a considerate mind sometimes to recur as well to fundamental principles, as to past events, and to profit by the lessons which both are calculated to afford. To that wholesome preliminary of political action I fain would invite the gentlemen on the other side.

But I cannot anticipate obedience to the invitation. Gentlemen seem desperately engaged in a struggle for lead and authority in the national councils; and insist that the spoils of office they burn to enjoy, are abused and perverted by their political opponents. In the patriotic pursuit of the glittering prize, gentlemen are so blinded by prejudice and rage that they cannot see, or seeing, will not admit, that any thing that is good, praiseworthy, or honorable, can be accomplished by any other mortal man than the modern Federal Whigs; or that any calamity, private or national, can fall upon the land, without the direct agency or sinister connivance of a Democratic Administration.

However capricious in principle, familiar to the changes of their party cognomen, and habituated to every shifting and occasional expedient of public policy, no wild bee woos the odors of the morn with more delight, nor takes a course more directly to the honeyed hive, than do the Federal Whigs in their inflexible endeavors after power and place.

The wealth, glory, and stability of the nation must all be levelled to the mire, that Federal Whigs may rise upon the collected ruins.

A little attention, sir, to the condition of our foreign trade for several years past, and a comparison of our exports with our imports, will satisfy the committee that the balance of trade has accumulated against us to a very injudicious amount.

The reports of the Secretary of the Treasury show, that from 1820 to 1830 the imports were $625,451,517
And the exports, - - - 587,788,558

Excess of imports over exports, and balance against the United States, $37,662,959

Presenting for that period an average balance of foreign trade against us of three millions four hundred thousand dollars per annum.

From 1830 to 1838, the imports were $869,780,304
Exports - - - - 675,460,384

Making an excess or balance against us of - - - $194,319,920

In eight years, averaging upwards of twenty-four millions each year.

What produced this fearful balance against our foreign trade?

One of the most direct and efficient causes was the free and continual issues of paper money, which occasioned a rise in the nominal price of every commodity among us.

The consequence was that the high price of foreign productions tempted foreigners to send us a large amount of commodities, while the high price of our domestic productions prevented foreigners from taking in exchange a large amount of our own commodities. As therefore we bought from foreigners more than they bought from us, they would not take the paper, but the coin of the banks; and they took the coin in such quantities as to leave the banks without an adequate supply for banking purposes.

The consequence was, the banks failed, violated their engagements to the nation, and defrauded their bill holders. If the affairs of the banks had been previously well mannaged, the banks might have diminished the issue of notes, called in a portion of their debts, and stopped the exportation of silver and gold.

Another cause of this balance of trade against us, is to be traced to the prodigal facility with which the various States created public debts, for the redemption of which they pledged bonds and stocks, which were sold abroad at depreciated prices, and for what they would bring.

A printed publication, under the authority of Mr. Flagg, late Comptroller of the State of New York, shows the debts contracted under the authority of the different States that have, from 1820 to 1838, resorted to the expedient of borrowing money on the credit of their stocks and bonds bearing interest, and redeemable at a distant day.

Making an aggregate of State debts of	$170,806,277

Of which sum $148,226,657 were contracted between 1830 and 1838; during which period the excess of imports over exports swelled to the enormous sum of $194,319,920.

To the amount of this public debt, created by the States, may be added the bonds and other liabilities which, within and since the period which I have named, have been issued and sent into foreign markets for the benefit of incorporated companies; and which, according to a recent computation, swell the grand aggregate of our foreign debt to $200,000,000.

The security upon which this fearful balance was suffered to remain unliquidated, was founded principally on State bonds and stocks, and notes issued by corporations created by the States. For the redemption of the principal and interest of such bonds and stocks, the faith of the States has been solemnly pledged. These bonds and stocks are mostly in the hands of foreigners, but a fair and honest redemption of them is not, on that account, the less sacred and obligatory.

A public debt of $200,000,000, and an annual interest of ten or twelve millions more, with the unavoidable pecuniary means annually to be raised to discharge the current and ordinary obligations of the State and Federal Governments will, for many years to come, tax the property and industry of the people, and weaken the resources of every State which has improvidently borrowed capital to invest in expensive and unproductive schemes.

I have already stated that from 1820 to 1838, there was an average excess of imports over exports of twenty-four millions of dollars, every year. Through the instrumentality of bankers and attorneys, our State bonds and stocks reached the hands of foreign capitalists, who paid for them principally in promiscuous merchandise, while the foreign gold and silver, which we received in part payment, only stimulated the spirit of extravagance and speculation; and were quickly reinvested again to bleat the excess of our importations.

From 1820 to 1830, the exportations of gold from the United States amounted to $70,932,660
The importation of gold into the United States, for the same period, amounted to - - 69,144,645

Making the excess of exportations $1,788,015

From 1830 to 1838, the importations of gold into the United States amounted to $92,991,308
The exportation of gold from the United States for the same period amounted to - - 39,646,136

Making, within eight years, an excess of importations of - $53,345,171
Add to this the excess of merchandise for the same period - 148,174,045

From this sum deduct a deficit of merchandise in the year 1838 - 8,908,282

And the aggregate excess, for eight years, amounts to - - $192,610,935

Whoever, sir, will examine the origin and progress of our foreign debt, will perceive that they have closely indicated the constantly growing excess of our imports over our exports, since the year 1820.

From 1820 to 1830, the amount of our State debts was only $26,000,000; at which period the balance or excess of imports over exports was only $37,662,959. And here we reach the fatal period at which State legislation began unwisely to pamper the extravagance of the day; when State bonds and State stocks were continually and profusely issued for public objects of imaginary utility.

From 1830 to 1838, the stocks and bonds, issued under the authority of State Legislatures, amounted to $148,000,000; during which period our imports exceeded our exports by $192,610,935.

Private and incorporated companies, reckless individuals, and sovereign States, all indulged in the heedless enterprise of a speculative cupidity. This pervading spirit multiplied banks, and covered the land with paper money.

In 1820, there were in the United States 308 banks, with a capital of $137,110,611, whereof $19,000,000 were in specie.

In 1830, there were in the United States 330 banks, with a capital of $145,192,268; whereof $22,114,917 were in specie.

In 1838, there were in the United States 829 banks, with a capital of $317,636,778; whereof $35,184,112 were in specie.

There is, Mr. Chairman, another comparison of cotemporaneous events to which it may not be inappropriate to allude.

From 1820 to 1830, the sales of the public lands amounted to the sum of $13,300,826.

In the single year of 1836, the sales of the public lands amounted to the sum of $25,167,833.

Here we see that the effect of the issue and sale of State bonds and stocks, and of corporate liabilities of various sorts, furnished the means of feeding and sustaining the inordinate speculative spirit of the age; and which led to an exchange of millions of acres of the most valuable public domain for depreciated bank notes, till the famous specie circular of 1837, measurably checked the general mischief, by requiring payment for the public lands to be made in coin.

But so deeply seated was the passion of speculation, that even after the banks suspended in 1837, the specie payments for public lands exceeded, in that very year, $7,000,000.

Again, sir, from 1820 to 1830, there was not one barrel of flour, or one bushel of wheat, imported into the United States. Whereas, from 1830 to 1838, we imported into the United States 5,643,075 bushels of wheat.

This shows that the spirit of speculation had so greatly diverted the labor of the country from the cultivation of the soil, that some portion of our foreign debt was created even for the necessaries of life.

Yet, sir, with all this startling evidence before us, gentlemen can find nothing in the legislation of the various States, in the unbridled avarice of banking institutions, nor in the general, wide-spread prodigality of the age, which could disturb the wholesome regularity of that foreign trade with which our own domestic prosperity has become so intimately blended.

No, sir, this loved disturbance of the country's weal must be traced to a Democratic President; or else "Othello's occupation's gone," and the source of Whigish hope and Federal expectation dries up.

While the Federal speakers tax their inquisitive minds, and perplex their fruitful imaginations, to create an exaggerated national distress, and to assign political causes for it, they have remembered to forget the explicit testimony of their favorite witness—the late President of the United States Bank.

But Mr. Nicholas Biddle shall now come forth; and the Federal orators who labor to depreciate the value of their own Government, shall have the benefit of his wisdom and experience.

In a published essay which that gentleman wrote, he portrayed the causes which have produced an enormous foreign debt, a reduction of our exports, and a suspension of specie payments by the banks in the United States. And even he who waged a bold and arrogant war against the Government, and who has been ever ready to condemn it with a severe and unscrupulous pen, does not pretend that the course of the Administration has tended, in the least, to create disorders in the currency, fluctuations in the market, or any of the general embarrassment and distress which the disontented gentlemen so mightly delight to paint.

"ESSAY ON THE CURRENCY, BY MR. N. BIDDLE.

"The currency of the United States consists of coin, and of bank notes promising to pay coin. As long as the banks can always pay the coin they promise, they are useful, because, in a country where the moneyed capital is disproportioned to the means of employing capital, the substitution of credits for coin enables the nation to make its exchanges with less coin, and of course saves the expense of that coin. But this advantage has by its side a great danger. Banks are often directed by needy persons who borrow too much, or by sanguine persons anxious only to increase their profits without much pecuniary interest or personal responsibility in the administration. The constant tendency of banks, therefore, is to lend too much, and to put too many notes in circulation. Now, the addition of many notes, even while they are as good as coin, by being always exchangeable for coin, may be injurious, because the increase of the mixed mass of money generally occasions a rise in the price of all commodities. The consequence is, that the high price of foreign production tempts foreigners to send us a large amount of their commodities, while the high price of domestic productions prevents the foreigners from taking in exchange a large amount of our commodities. When, therefore, you buy from foreigners more than they buy from you, as they cannot take the paper part of your currency they must take the coin part. If this is done to a considerable extent, the danger is that the banks will be obliged to pay so much of their coin for their notes as to leave them not a sufficient quantity to answer the demand for it, in which case the banks fail and the community is defrauded. To prevent this, a prudent bank, the moment it perceives an unusual demand for its notes, and has reason to fear a drain on its vaults, should immediately diminish the amount of its notes, and call in a part of its debts. So, on the large scale, when the banks of a country perceive such a demand for coin for exportation as diminishes too much the stock of coin necessary for their banking purposes, they should stop the exportation. This they can always do, if their affairs have been well managed; and here lies the test of bank management.

"The law of a mixed currency of coin and paper is, that when, from superabundance of the mixed mass, too much of the coin part leaves the country, the remainder must be preserved by diminishing the paper part, so as to make the mixed mass more valuable in proportion. It is this capacity of diminishing the paper which protects it. Its value consists in its elasticity—its power of alternate expansion and contraction to suit the state of the community; and, when it loses its flexibility, it no longer contains within itself the means of its own defence, and is full of hazard. In truth the merit of a bank is nearly in proportion to the degree of this flexibility of its means. If a bank lends its money on mortgages, on stocks, for long terms, and to persons careless of protests, it incurs this great risk; that on the one hand, its notes are payable on demand, while on the other, its debts cannot be called in without delay—a delay fatal to its credit and character. This is the general error of banks, who do not always discriminate between two things, especially distinct, in banking, a debt ultimately secure, and a debt certainly payable. But a well managed bank has its funds mainly in short loans to persons in business—the result of business transactions—payable on a day named, which the parties are able to pay, and will pay at any sacrifice; in order to escape mercantile dishonor. Such a bank has its funds, therefore constantly repaid into it, and is able to say whether it will lend them out again.

"A bank so managed, if it finds too much demand for its coin to go abroad, begins by not lending more than it receives every day; and then goes further, by not lending as much as its income, declining to renew the notes of its debtors, and obliging them to pay a part or the whole, making it a rule to keep its discounts within its income. The operation proceeds thus: by issuing no new notes, but requiring something from your debtors, you oblige them to return to you the bank notes you lent to them, or their equivalents. This makes the bank notes scarcer—this makes them more valuable—this makes the goods for which they are generally exchanged less valuable; the debtor, in his anxiety to get your notes, being willing to sell his goods at a sacrifice. This brings down the prices of goods, and makes every thing cheaper. Then the remedy begins; the foreigner, finding that his goods must be sold so low, sends no more; the American importer, finding that he cannot make money by importing them, imports no more. The remainder of the coin, of course, is not sent out after new importations, but stays at home, where it finds better employment in purchasing these cheap articles; when the foreigner hears of this state of things, he sends back the coin he took away. He took it away merely because your own domestic productions were so high that he could not make any profit in his country by taking them. But when the news reaches him that his productions are very cheap in our country, he will also learn that our productions are cheap too, and he sends back the coin by diminishing our paper, and it will stay until driven away by another superabundance of paper. Such is the circle which a mixed currency is always describing. Like the power of steam, it is eminently useful in prudent hands, but of tremendous hazard when not controlled, and the practical wisdom in managing it lies in seeing the proper moment to expand and contract it; taking care, in working with such explosive material, whenever there is doubt, to incline to the side of safety.

"These simple elements explain the present situation of the country. Its disorder is overtrading, brought on by overbanking. The remedy is to bank less, and to trade less.

"It is the order of nature, that if men or nations live extravagantly, they must first suffer till they repair losses by prudence, and that neither men nor banks should impose on the community by promises to pay what they cannot pay."

Here, then, sir, is the greatest banking character of the age, voluntarily abdicating the moneyed throne, fully revealing the secrets of bank freemasonry, and proclaiming, like an honest man, that the disordered condition of this country was produced by overbanking and overtrading, and that the remedy is to bank less and to trade less.

That the great inflated credit system which has prevailed among us, has failed to realize our promised blessings; that it has pampered wealth and defrauded labor; that it has only benefited a crafty few at the expense of the multitude; is obvious to every enlightened man who has watched the progress and operation of incorporated wealth. And it is appalling to reflect, that notwithstanding the banks have utterly failed to perform for the Government and the people their most important moneyed engagements, they have claimed an exemption from every forfeiture, and have turned politicians, and daringly contended for supremacy in the political contests of the day; while, in open violation of their deliberate pledges, they have wickedly endeavored to regulate prices in a way to subserve their arrogant schemes of political ambition. In the progress of contention for political power, they not only make loans to, and coerce payments from, particular persons, according to their political tenets, but they resort to political curtails, and turn their torturing, distressful, corporate screws upon whole communities of our fellow men, control the circulation of money, and reduce the prices of labor, property, and produce, till a control over the poor man's bread controls at once his patriotism and his vote, and even the liberty of thought and speech.

Sir, let this league of banks, this fearful incorporated dynasty of modern times, be strengthened to the measure of its own desires, and be tempted by its characteristic avarice to act in concert, as it surely will, with a Federal President and a National Bank of ample means, and from that very moment the Government may always act in full and firm defiance of the public will. Some wild bull then, with furious rage, with liberty of limb and unfettered horn, will toss your laws and liberty in the air.

Even now, while I address you, sir, in the national hall, near a thousand of these potent institutions, with their hundred millions in circulated notes, with two hundred thousand stockholders, presidents, directors, and clerks, and millions of dependent debtors, control the towns, and strive to defeat the re-election of President Van Buren and his political supporters.

And why, sir, have the bankrupts in politics and the bankrupts in trade confederated against Mr. Van Buren and his political friends? Obviously because that enlightened statesman and his political friends have determined to reclaim, if they can, this great country from the perilous disorders which have been produced by overbanking and overtrading throughout the land.

Sir, shall avarice pervade and subjugate the land? Shall all worth, wisdom, and morality perish in the general struggle to accumulate wealth? Shall irredeemable bank paper circulate forever, make a merchandise of justice, and openly defy the laws and institutions of the country? Shall public liberty prevail no more, and our own free Government crumble into dust, for want of that ordinary pecuniary assistance it derives from us?

We owe it to the wisdom of our ancestors that these are questions which it is rather for the people than for politicians to decide.

For myself, sir, whatever may be the changing scenes and fashions of the age, whoever may lead the national councils and prevail here, while I continue a member of this House, civil LIBERTY shall have an advocate to uphold her cause in full and free defiance.

SPEECH OF MR. RHETT,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, June, 22, 1840—On the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The great difficulty in addressing the committee on a subject so vast as that before them, is, to limit our observations to those parts of it, which are of the greatest importance, but which, at the same time, have not been touched or exhausted. Feeling the difficulty of the task, and the importance of time at this stage of the session, I had given up all expectation of addressing the committee; and should not now address them, were it not for some of the extraordinary positions assumed yesterday in the debate. On this great question, it will not be enough that we believe that we are right. In a popular Government, like ours, where the intelligence and feelings of the people ultimately shape and determine the policy of the Government, we must show that we are right; and that the measures we support are consistent with truth and justice, and promotive of the best interests and happiness of the people.

Gentlemen who have debated this question before the committee, have very properly carried it up to the first principles of our Government. On the one hand, it has been contended that this bill is strictly a Republican or Democratic measure. On the other hand, this has been denied; and the bill has been represented as despotic in its character, and totally opposed to the principles of our free institutions. The gentleman from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] aware of the difficulty of this latter position, has contended that Democracy consists merely in numbers, and that that policy is Democratic which the majority, for the time being, think proper to adopt. Hence he argues that a United States Bank is a Democratic institution, because a majority of the people passed it into a law. The State bank deposite scheme was a Democratic measure, because a majority adopted it; and so, according to this position, very convenient for those who entertain his opinions, every Federal and unconstitutional project, which has obtained the sanction of a majority on this floor, has been a good Democratic measure.

Mr. Chairman, it cannot be by measures only, which may be as changeable as the temporary passions and interests of men, that we are to settle great principles of Government. Measures do not determine principles, but principles determine the character of measures. If the broad principles of liberty, which lie at the foundation of our institutions, could have been trodden out by the stern foot of tyranny or the practices of custom, where now would have been our position amongst the nations of the earth? And if usage can make right, and we have learned nothing more, after a half century of free government, than this, that Democracy consists in the mere will of a majority, it were better that our great experiment for extending liberty and free government to man, should cease entirely. What is Democracy?

A Democracy is simply the rule of the people—not of a part, but of the whole people; and a Republic is the same in signification—meaning, as its derivation imports, a government of all. The means and contrivances by which the people may rule themselves, may be various; but any means and contrivances, which do not secure to all the inestimable privileges of self-government, and protect all from aggression on their peculiar rights and interests, are inconsistent with the great principles of Republicanism or Democracy. Hence, in ancient times, the checks and balances in the constitutions of all Republics, and now, in our own Government, the limitations and arrangements of the Constitution of the United States. The principle of representation makes the great difference between our Democratic forms of Government, and those of antiquity; but the object of both has been the same: to enable the people—the whole people to rule themselves. Undoubtedly, as one of the means to accomplish this end, the mere will of a majority may be resorted to, and ought to be resorted to, whenever the interests of the majority and minority are the same. In such a case, the minority are safe; for the majority cannot oppress them without oppressing themselves. But whenever the interests of the majority and minority are variant, experience has proved that power can no more be trusted in the hands of many than in the hand of one man. The minority will be ruled, and will not rule themselves; and they may be ruled by those whose interests are promoted by their oppression, and whose power depends on their subjection. Now, to say, under such circumstances, that a minority are free, even though they may not be oppressed, is a gross abuse of terms. They will be laboring under a despotism which, if used to promote the welfare of the majority, as all history proves to be the usual course of things, may prove far more remorseless and grinding than the rule of a single individual. What is a despotism? It is mere arbitrary power. Will that Government be less a despotism, because many, instead of one or a few, control it arbitrarily? Was Athens more free under her thirty tyrants than under Pisistratus? The numbers who rule arbitrarily are nothing to the principle. Liberty consists in self government; and the end of a Republic or Democracy is to secure this great privilege to all—to the minority as well as the majority; and whenever this end is not secured, where there are peculiar interests belonging to any portion of the people to be protected, the Government, whatever it may be to others, whatever its form, is to them a despotism. The truth is, sir, this notion of the arbitrary will of a majority producing liberty, is not only inconsistent with Democracy, but with the ends of all civil society and government, and the object of a written Constitution. Why do men form themselves into society, and submit to government? Is it not to obtain protection from injustice and oppression? And why do they form a written Constitution? Is not the end the same—protection?—and in a popular Government, where power, if uncontrolled, is all in the hands of the majority, for what purpose make a Constitution, which is nothing but a bundle of limitations upon power, if it is not to protect in their rights the minority, whose interests may be different from those of the majority? The majority need no protection by a Constitution, for they can protect themselves. All the checks and balances in a Constitution are designed to protect those who, from position or weakness, may be exposed to injustice, and to secure to all the privilege of self government; and if these ends are not secured to the minority, the leading object of all society and all good Government and of a written Constitution, is entirely lost to them.

The Constitution of the United States correctly exemplifies all these principles. If the will of a majority would have been liberty to all the people of the United States, the Constitution could have been written on a half sheet of paper. What constituted the great difficulty in forming it, and occasioned its jealous limitations and distribution of powers? Why, sir, it was to secure liberty to all, by counteracting, not by enforcing, this very principle of the will of the majority, which has been represented as the essence of Democracy. The people of the States, inhabiting a vast extent of territory—embracing various latitudes and climates—were interested in dissimilar productions—and employed in different pursuits of industry. To have established the will of a simple aggregate majority, as the principle of government over such a people, would be nothing else but a despotism. It was clear that they could rule themselves only by being left to the control of those interests peculiar to the different sections of the Confederacy, and that those powers of Government only could be safely intrusted to a Federal head, which were general to all the sections, and which, in their exercise, would affect them all equally. This is the whole theory of the Constitution. No one in the convention which formed it, ventured to propose the will of a majority as its basis; and those who were most jealous of liberty, and fearful of uncontrolled power—the Republican party—were for granting the least powers to the Constitution. Democracy, with them, was self-government to all—not the dominion of a part of the people; and they foresaw, that the more power was thrown into the hands of the Federal Government, the more irresponsible it would become—the weaker would be the sections—and the more exposed their peculiar interests to the aggression of the majority, whose interests might be opposed to theirs. And the same difference in policy, actuated the Republican party after the Constitution went into operation. The Federal party have been struggling from its origin to break down the limitations of the Constitution by construction—to resolve all its powers into "the general welfare," and thus establish the dominion of a majority of all the people of the United States as the principle of the Government. On the contrary, the Republican or Democratic party have endeavored to maintain the limitations of the Constitution, and thus afford that protection which the Constitution intended to secure to the minority—and to all the people of the Union the privilege of self-government. In this view it is that the organization of the Senate, the requisition of two-thirds to alter the Constitution, and the establishment of a President—which gentlemen instanced to prove that this Government was not Democratic—are in strict conformity to the cardinal principles of Democracy. Jealousy of all power, distribution of power and checks upon power, are its chief instruments for giving and maintaining liberty to the citizens. Our Government is strictly a Federal representative Democracy.

If these principles, Mr. Chairman, be correct, we are not to look to the varying acts or usurpations of a majority in Congress, for what constitutes Democracy or Republicanism; but we must look to the Constitution, and to those measures and principles which protect all, from the oppression or plunder of a part—carrying out in its highest sense, the maxim of "the greatest good to the greatest number," as the criterion of legislation and Government.

Let us now turn to the anti Republican features of the bill before the committee.

The bill, it is said, is anti-Republican, because it takes power from the people which ought to be reserved to them, and separates them from the Government. The principle laid down is certainly good. No more power than what is absolutely necessary, should be taken from the people; and they should be thoroughly identified with their Government. But is taking power from the banks taking it from the people, or a separation of the Government from the banks, a separation from the people? The position takes for granted, that the banks are the people. But if the banks are not the people, but corporate institutes independent of them, it would seem to follow, that any connection of the Government with them, would be separating the Government from the people, and giving it by the association, new elements of power, which might be dangerous to their liberties. The people are far more identified with fiscal officers, as their instruments for collecting the revenue of the Government, who are directly responsible to them, than with banks who are entirely independent of their control. The truth is, that those who oppose the connection of the Government with banks, oppose it on the very ground gentlemen affect to assume, in advocating it—the anti-Republican tendency of the connection. It adds power to the Executive and this Government, which ought to be reserved to the people or the States. It separates the Government from the people, by linking it to corporations irresponsible to them. On the contrary, to use officers responsible to the people, is the only method of collecting the revenue consistent with the principles of the Government. The theory of a representative Government is, that the people govern through their agents, whose acts are their acts. The whole Government and all its officers are theirs. Ultimate responsibility to the people is that which assimilates them with their Government, and constitutes the great principle of their self-government; and that measure alone is anti-Republican which is characterized by irresponsibility to their power.

But all free Governments, it is said, use banks as their fiscal agents, while despots use treasurers, to collect and disburse their revenues. If this was true, it would prove nothing, unless it can be shown that there is something in banks very dangerous to the revenues of a despot, and safe for those of a free people: and further, that under a written Constitution like ours, the authority exists for Congress to establish a United States Bank, or to sanction a connection with the State banks. But is it true that any Governments in the world pursue the policy recommended by the opponents of the bill, and use banks as their fiscal agents and depositories, over which they have no control? I think, sir, no such anomaly or example exists. It does not exist in France, where the Government has entire control over the Bank in France. It does not exist in England, for there, the Government has borrowed the whole capital of the Bank of England; and the bank is, to all intents and purposes, a Government institution. Both in England and France then, the agents employed to keep and disburse the revenues, are responsible to the Government. Is this so here? Was the United States Bank formerly, or are the State banks now, responsible to this Government? or do gentlemen propose to make them so by legislation? Far from it. The supposed independence of these institutions of the Government is, in their estimation, one of their chief recommendations.

It is further urged, that this bill is anti-Republican, because its tendency is to ruin the banking institutions of the States. If any one maintains such a proposition as the consequence of the regular action of this bill, in collecting and paying out the revenue in specie, for one I must decline answering him. Nothing can be more silly and more vain than to combat fancy with argument. But if, in this position, allusion is made to the proposition to render the State banks amenable to a bankrupt law passed by this Government, I answer, that there is no such measure proposed in this bill—and if it was, such an act, in my opinion, would be unconstitutional; and however necessary regulation and control might be to these institutions, they are not responsible to this Government. The sovereignties which created, alone can destroy them; and I will not consent that their privileges or existence shall be touched, much less be overthrown by the action of this Government; and such, undoubtedly, is the opinion of a decided majority in this House. If it was an open question, whether the States have a right to establish these corporations, by whose instrumentality the currency of the Constitution may be driven out of circulation, I might pause to consider it; but the long exercise of the power by the States, coeval with the Government, should render it indisputable. Nor, sir, can I see any force in the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CUSHING) that the design of the bill is to overthrow, incidentally, the banks of the States, and is therefore unconstitutional and anti-Republican. The incidental effects must not be confounded with the intention of the bill. If the bill, under the disguise of collecting the revenue in specie, is intended in reality to act upon the banks, I concede that it would be unconstitutional; but if the object be in good faith to carry into effect the constitutional duty of collecting and disbursing the revenue of the country, it is perfectly constitutional, even though there may be some incidental effect upon the State banks produced by its operation. As far as I know the intention of those who support the bill, they will pass this bill with a view to this Government; and, in their opinion, its effect upon the banking institutions of the States will be very insignificant.

Mr. Chairman, in connection with the revenue, the subject of direct taxation has been introduced. It has been said that this bill has the tendency to accumulate taxes on the people, increase the expenses of collection, and produce embezzlement and waste. I think its influence will be directly the contrary, when compared with the methods of keeping and disbursing the public revenue, gentlemen opposed to it propose. But I admit that there is a tendency to accumulate taxes on the people, and to waste it on profligate and unconstitutional schemes; that tendency originates in your system of laying and collecting your taxes by indirect taxation.

I know, sir, how easy it is to raise a false clamor on the subject of direct taxes. Gentlemen who are seized with the horrors at the project of requiring a tax directly from the people by a tax collector, are perfectly willing that the same tax should be taken from them by a custom-house officer. It is not the tax, then, but the manner of getting it, which awakens their sympathies. If it is taken indirectly—by stealth and concealment from the people, their democracy is vastly gratified; but to take or receive it directly—openly from the people, excites their patriotic sensibilities to an alarming excess. If there was any expedient, by which Government could be carried on without taxes, it is not improbable that all nations would adopt it. But according to the progress in modern finance, taxation is a necessary evil. Government is necessary, and taxes are the ordinary price we pay for it; and if this be so, the only question left for consideration is, which is the cheapest, most efficient, and Republican method of laying and collecting the taxes.

Indirect taxation—that is, laying the taxes on foreign articles when imported into the country, is an admirable expedient for a despotism. The people, who consume the commodity, ultimately pay the tax, without being aware of its imposition; for the merchant who imports it, and the trader to whom he sells it, add the tax to the price of the article. The unconsciousness of the people of the tax thus taken from them, is the basis of the calculation, that four times more taxes may be raised from them by indirect taxation, without difficulty or murmuring, than by direct taxation. Hence the facility with which such taxes are laid, and the tendency to accumulate them. In all despotisms, the taxes collected from the people are expended—not with any view to their interests, but to minister to the luxury and profligacy of rulers, or to afford the means of keeping them in subjection. It is not surprising, therefore, that, as the taxes are thus applied, there should be as much concealment as possible in collecting them. As the people do not rule, and the Government is not for them, but over them, the more ignorant they are of its operations, the better for their rulers. The more furtively the taxes are collected from them, the more patient they will be of its burdens. That the system of indirect taxation, therefore, should be a favorite revenue expedient of all despotic Governments, is in perfect accordance with the principles on which they are based. But that such a system should be advocated in a popular Government—a Government based on the intelligence and patriotism of the people, in which a knowledge of all its affairs, and responsibility to them in all its transactions, is not only their high prerogative, but absolutely necessary for its correct administration, and the preservation of liberty itself, is one of those violent inconsistencies which only occur when the head and heart are in direct opposition. Do gentlemen believe that the people can and ought to rule themselves? Then why concealment and artifice towards them in that matter, which of all others in all civilized communities, is most vital to liberty? It is in laying and collecting taxes, and the expenditure of taxes, that the great contests for free government have been fought; and again and again must the same contests arise, if the people are to continue free, or be made free. To defend their rights, they must know them. To judge of the taxes they pay, they must see and understand that they pay them; and to supervise the expenditure of them with the keen jealousy their liberties require, they should be conscious of the exact burdens they impose. Unless these positions be a string of fallacies, the plainest, simplest, and most intelligible method of collecting taxes from the people, is that which is most faithful to their interests—most trustful to them—most Democratic. No man, in private life, would consent that his agent should have the power of drawing his money from him, without his knowing it. Why then should such a practice be tolerated in our transactions with the people? Are they imbeciles or slaves—too weak to understand, or too corrupt to pay the cost of their free Governments?

Nearly all the differences concerning the Constitution and Government of the United States, have originated from the abuse of the taxing power and expenditure. A large portion of the country, from the manner in which the taxes have been imposed, by indirect taxation, have looked upon taxation, not as a burden, but a blessing—not as exaction from them, but an instrument by which they should be enriched at the expense of the country. Hence a steady thirst for expenditure, and for high taxes, that they may be expended or thrown away. Inequality of burdens, from the operation of the Government, has been the consequence of this state of things, and that discontent which should always attend oppression amongst a free people. Thus, in addition to concealment in the collection of the taxes, by indirect taxation, we have had inequality in its exactions and expenditures. It is scarcely possible to conceive of a more disastrous conjunction of bad principles in taxation. Profligacy and waste, discontent and strife, are its inevitable results; and with these must come increased powers to the Government, to meet and overcome its increased difficulties. New powers must be assumed, as the objects of expenditure are multiplied; and its arm must be strengthened to suppress the murmurs and discontents which its injustice may excite. The road to consolidation in this Government is through the money power.

It has been represented that the expenses of collecting direct, are far greater than those of indirect taxation. If it were so, the difference in the expenses of collection, would be nothing when compared to the loss the people must sustain, from the inevitable tendency to profligacy of expenditure inherent in the system of indirect taxation. But it is not true, that the expenses would be materially different between the two systems. In England, where the greater part of the taxes are direct, the difference is but one per cent. The Government of the United States have imposed direct taxes for only four years, in 1798, and during the last war; and in 1816 the expenses of collecting four millions of dollars did not exceed four per cent. while the expenses of collecting the indirect taxes of this Government in 1837, the last fiscal year in which the expenses are reported to us, was more than ten per cent. But there is a striking expedient for economy, in collecting direct taxes by our system of Government, which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] has alluded to. When direct taxes were laid during the last war, the option was given to the States, to pay up for their citizens the quota of contribution which fell to their share; and, sir, six States, amongst them South Carolina, paid up at once the whole amount of direct taxes required of their citizens, thus saving to the General Government the whole risk and trouble of collection, and to the States the presence of the tax officer. If this was the case in time of war and great pecuniary difficulty, it is not unreasonable to suppose, that in a time of peace, arrangements could be easily made with the States, by which the whole revenue of the General Government, by direct taxation, could be raised through their instrumentality. And even if this did not take place, it would be convenient, as suggested in the Convention which framed the Constitution, for the General Government to employ in collecting their taxes, the same officers employed by the State Governments, in collecting theirs;—and thus, in either event, not a man need be added to the officers of this Government for the collection of their revenue. What will those gentlemen, who are so loud in their declamation against Executive patronage, say to this? What will State Rights men, like the gentleman from Maine, who objected to the bill before the committee, as anti-Republican, because it separated this Government from the States, say to such a system of collecting the taxes? The committee will see at a glance, what force there is in the apprehension, that a host of tax gatherers will be necessarily employed in collecting the taxes by direct taxation. Even if the States, or the officers of the States, were not employed to collect the revenue of the General Government, would it require one more man to collect the revenue by direct than by indirect taxation? Look at the thousands employed in the custom-houses in all our seaport towns—and your revenue cutters, not scattered as they would be, by direct taxation—one tax collector in a district, identified in feeling and interest with the people among whom he lives, and spending among them the whole expense of collecting the revenue, but aggregated and banded together by hundreds in our seaport towns, separated from those who ultimately pay the taxes—the consumers—and causing the whole expense of collecting the revenue, amounting to millions annually, to be disbursed where the taxes are collected. But the people would see the tax collector by direct, and they do not see him by indirect taxation! This, sir, constitutes simply and truly the whole argument in favor of indirect taxation; and to my mind, it is nothing more or less than a flat and flagrant insult to the people.

Mr. Chairman, direct taxation is not only the doctrine of Democracy, but it is the doctrine of the Constitution. It is plain that direct taxes were contemplated to be raised as a permanent source of revenue by those who framed it. After the power was incorporated into the Constitution, an amendment was moved in the convention by Mr. Gerry, "That from the first meeting of the Legislature of the United States, until a census shall be taken, all moneys for supplying the public Treasury by direct taxation, shall be raised from the several States according to the number of their representatives repectively in the first branch." The amendment failed, because the representation fixed in the Constitution, until a census could be taken, was necessarily conjectural; and therefore the taxes might be unequal, and not in conformity to its principles; but the shortest period was fixed for taking the census—three years. It is not reasonable to suppose that the wise and patriotic men who formed this Constitution, contemplated, as the general and only method of taxation by this Government, a system totally useless in a time of war, when money is most required. They had known what war was; and, from bitter experience, had felt that money was its sinews. They therefore gave to the General Government the power of direct taxation, which could avail the people in a time of war, as well as peace. By indirect taxation—raising your revenue from duties on importations, your revenue must cease with importations. War with any powerful civilized nation in Europe stops your commerce, and with it all your resources. Direct taxes then become inevitable, as our last war proved; but a time of national distress is not a time for unusual expedients of taxation. Hence discontents may arise, at the very time when of all others, unanimity is most necessary in the councils of the country. The true policy of every Government, designed to preserve the liberties of the people, is to have such a system of taxation in operation as will support the Government at all times—in war as well as peace. Our indirect taxation has the admirable quality of tending to excess when least needed, and when most required, of being utterly useless. Shall a system so absurd, and so anti-Republican in its tendencies and principles, continue over the freest people on earth?

But let us turn, Mr. Chairman, to another powerful cause, which, in connection with our system of indirect taxation, tends to divert this Government from its proper course. I mean the banks. By expanding the currency they raise prices, and thus render it difficult or impossible for our manufacturers to compete with foreign nations in our own markets. Hence, a resort to the General Government, through its indirect taxation, by increasing the taxes on commodities imported, to exclude them from our markets, and secure a monopoly to the manufacturers.

Now, it has not been denied in the argument, that over-issues by the banks, inflation of the currency, is a tendency inherent in the whole banking system. A bank makes money by putting out its notes, bearing no interest, for the notes of individuals bearing interest; and the more notes of the former character it can sustain out, and of the latter receive, the more money it will make. The temptation to over-issues, in all times of confidence and prosperity, is irresistible; and the currency becomes inflated. Prices follow currency, for currency is only the instrument by which commodities are bought and sold; and if abundant, prices must rise. When this takes place so as to affect the sale of internal productions, competing with the productions of other nations, the true remedy is, to take away the cause which has occasioned the evil—reduce the currency. But unfortunately the producers of the country do not control the currency. It is surrendered into the hands of irresponsible corporations, whose interest it is to keep out an expanded currency. The manufacturers of the Northern and Middle States, instead of applying the proper remedy at home, have hitherto found it easier to come to the General Government; and by having the taxes increased on foreign importations, render the foreign fabric higher in price than the commodities they produce with the inflated currency, and thus sustain themselves without conflict with the banks. Now, if our system of indirect taxation, by laying duties on imports, did not exist, the arm of the Government could not be used, by taxes on importations, to sustain forced prices at the expense of the people, who consume the commodities; and the manufacturers, in common with all other producers, would be interested in correcting the evils of the banking system. As matters now stand, they are its allies, and the people are oppressed by both—first, by an inflated currency by the banks, and then by taxation, at the instance of the manufacturers, by which it is sustained. The effort of the manufacturers is to exempt themselves from the evils of an inflated currency, and to indemnify themselves by high prices exacted from the people, for the increased prices in the process of manufacturing occasioned by the banks. The people are plundered by both.

The people are plundered by both; and yet, sir, with that contempt for those who submit to our imposition, it has been broadly maintained that they are the best friends of the people; that the people are benefited in being compelled to pay on all the necessities of life, enormous taxation, in order that the privileged few, who own banks and factories, might amass wealth; and that high wages to labor occasioned by bank expansions, even though it may be accompanied with higher proportionate taxation, is favorable to its interests. It will be difficult to perceive what the laborer gains by having higher wages, if all he consumes is raised also in price; whilst his loss is certain, unless his wages are sufficient, not only to cover the increased prices in every thing, occasioned by an inflated currency, but also the increased prices occasioned by taxation. But admitting that high prices from an inflated currency are beneficial to labor, nothing can be clearer than that it is impossible to sustain them, under a system of free intercourse between nations. A commodity produced under a more limited currency, by which labor and capital are rendered cheaper, will infallibly undersell a commodity produced under an inflated currency, by which labor and capital are rendered dearer; and when these commodities come into competition, the result is inevitable. Prices must fall to the standard of the cheaper currency, and the commodity produced under the inflated currency, must sell at or near these prices, or sell not at all. It is, therefore, clearly beyond the power of banks to sustain high prices and high wages. Convulsions in trade rather, by which prices may be unnaturally depressed, are the legitimate fruits of an expanded paper currency. The manufacturers are perfectly aware of this; hence, they do not apply to banks to issue more paper to sustain prices, but they come to the Government and demand heavy taxation on the foreign commodity, in order that it might be excluded from the country, and the people be forced to buy the article they produce, at the prices of an inflated currency. It is in this way that taxation, enormous taxation, and not our paper currency, has sustained high wages and high prices, in the manufacturing portions of the Union; and the question resolves itself into this: is it beneficial to labor that prices should be increased by taxation? Can the people gain by taking from them? If so, then the more taxation and the dearer commodities are made by it, the better for the people. Yet, this strange paradox has its advocate in every manufacturer in New England. Formerly men plundered by open violence. It is now better done by quiet legislation.

Mr. Chairman, although paper in some form or other will be used for circulation in a free country, where credit is property, it cannot be shown that our banking system is beneficial to the people. The use of currency is to circulate the productions of labor and capital; and provided there is enough of it for this purpose, increasing or expanding it, cannot make it better. Stability is all that is needed. Suppose, sir, a million of people forming a community, and a million of dollars will answer the purposes of circulation. The power of setting up a bank is given to a single wealthy individual, who gradually gets in the million of specie, and issues in its stead three millions of paper currency, what will the people gain by it? Every thing will be trebled in price, for there are three dollars in circulation where there was one before; but will one man by the operation be added to the community, or a yard of cloth, or a shock of corn more, be added to its productions? Clearly not. On the contrary, in consequence of the high prices occasioned by the paper currency, a premium will be afforded to foreign productions which will come in and undersell the domestic producer. Business in the community will stagnate, labor be oppressed, and emigration ensue. The great father of political economy saw clearly that a community could not be enriched or benefited by merely increasing the currency. The utility of a paper currency, in his estimation, consisted only in substituting paper for a part of the metals, not in increasing the currency. By disengaging a portion of the metals used as currency from this employment, and substituting so much paper in its stead, the specie could be exported, and would therefore add so much to the capital of the country. A cheaper would be substituted for a dearer currency. This is his theory, but he seems to have entirely overlooked the irresistible impulses to overrissues in the banking system, from which bank paper will not be limited to a substitution for the metals withdrawn, but tends continually to an addition to the currency, which swells, and swells, until arrested by convulsion.

The people, then, gain but little by a paper currency, even if it was as stable as a metallic currency. But there is another loss from the variability of bank currency, which should be taken into consideration in calculating its benefits. Independently of its inherent tendency to excess, to which I have already adverted, look to its fluctuations, from the ordinary operations of commerce. Generally speaking, productions are paid for by productions—the exports of a country buy the imports; and in this state of things, exchange between two countries will be equal. But occasionally from the seasons, or some other cause, a nation imports from other nations more than it exports. The exchange is against such a country. It becomes a debtor to the amount of importation over exportation; and the debt is paid, not by bank paper, which is money only in the country in which it circulates, but in that which is money every where—specie. Now suppose, sir, a deficiency of production in grain in such a country as France, where a metallic currency, prevails, of six millions of dollars—what would be the effect of abstracting from her circulation this amount? The shock to the currency could not possibly exceed that which an abstraction of six millions of dollars might occasion; and this abstraction may produce no shock at all; for in consequence of a diminished production in that country, the currency ought to be lessened to keep prices stable. There will be a portion of the specie not wanted for circulation, which would be injurious if retained in the country, and which will be best employed in going out, and bringing into France the grain needed for subsistence. But suppose a deficiency of grain in the productions of the United States, where a paper currency prevails of six millions of dollars—what is the effect upon the currency? The abstraction of six millions of specie, does not affect the currency to the amount of six millions. It is the basis of at least eighteen millions of bank paper, which must be taken from the circulation with the specie. And so also is the effect of exchange upon the creditor country. Where the currency is metallic, and there is six millions of excess of production which is sold to another nation, there will be an addition to the currency of six millions of dollars: but where it is paper, the importation of six millions of specie adds eighteen millions to the currency. The consequences are inevitable. More convulsions—a greater contraction and expansion of the currency, in a paper than in a metallic currency. From the operations of foreign exchange, the effects are treble more on the one than on the other.

Mr. Chairman, the fluctuations in the currency operate with terrible hardship on those who possess property. All the relations between debtor and creditor are subverted. A man's bond may be suddenly doubled on him; or his creditor, when paid, may get but a half of it, from the alteration in the circulating medium. It is impossible to compute the loss sustained, and the injustice perpetrated, by a single convulsion in the currency, on the property of the country; but its effects upon the poorer classes of the community are still greater than upon those possessing property. If the laboring man is affected, in proportion to his income, no more than the man of property, he suffers far more. A loss of one thousand, from an income of two thousand dollars, may be bad enough, but it is tolerable—for with prudence, the ends of the year can easily be made to meet. But a loss of one hundred and fifty dollars, from an income of three hundred, may be ruinous. Three hundred dollars may be absolutely necessary for a laboring man, to feed and support his family. With the one, it may be a question of superfluity—with the other, of bread. But the effects of a fluctuating currency do not stop here. When the currency expands, the wages of labor do not immediately increase in proportion to the prices of commodities or the profits of capital. And the reasons are obvious. Wages follow capital. They are not increased until capital is productive; and they will increase, not in proportion to the profits of capital, but according to the interests of the capitalist and the average price of labor. If the laborer could know what the profits of capital were, he could not obtain from his employer an increase of wages, if other laborers could be obtained, who would work for the wages he received. Hence it may occur, as the state of things in Europe daily proves, that enormous fortunes may be rapidly accumulating, and yet the laborer, from the competition of labor with itself, may be continually hovering over the brink of starvation. Every improvement in machinery adds to the profits of capital, but diminishes the wages of labor, by throwing it out of employment. The wages of labor will not therefore be increased in proportion as prices rise from an inflated currency; and when the currency is contracted, the laborer will not be the last to feel the fall of prices. He is liable not only to diminished wages, but to a discharge from employment. His daily bread—life itself is risked in the reverse. But what does capital suffer if it suspends employment? It loses its profits. It cannot eat. Is it not astonishing, sir, that a paper currency, such as exists in these United States, more liable to fluctuations than any in the world, should be advocated as most especially beneficial to the laborer—the peculiar blessing of the poor. Why, the very stones in your streets, where your factories exist, might cry out against the cruel fallacy.

Exaggeration is the usual resort of a weak cause, and the eulogists of the banking system have not failed to use it egregiously. Banking has been represented as the parent of civilization, the bulwark of liberty, and the mighty instrument by which England was carried through her struggle with Napoleon, and the United States through their two wars.

Undoubtedly, Mr. Chairman, banking (not such however as exists in the United States) arose with modern civilization and commerce, and so did the art of making chimneys and gunpowder. Gentlemen have only mistaken the effect for the cause. Security to property, resulting from fixed laws, produced its accumulation. The safety and accumulation of property produced commerce, and commerce invented the means of carrrying on its operations. Bills of exchange, by which capital was transferred from one country to another, without transporting the metals; and banking, by which a similar convenience was effected in the business of commerce nearer home, sprung up in its course. In the days of feudal pride and power, commerce was esteemed degrading, and was therefore left by the nobility entirely in the hands of the people inhabiting the towns. As commerce extended and the towns increased, the power of the people advanced. Privileges in their favor, which were in fact only privileges from violence and oppression, were multiplied; sometimes bought by money; sometimes won by the sword; and the spirit of liberty arose with the strife and success. Banking was only one of the indications that liberty in some degree existed, under which there was security to the person and property. This, sir, it appears to me, is the true estimate of the banking of former ages. Until the Bank of England was established, no bank in Europe was a bank of issue. They were only banks of discount and deposite, and dollar for dollar was the principle on which they existed. Modern English banking, or American banking, which is an improvement on English banking, is quite another thing. Credit, not specie, is its basis; and the only use of the metals is to describe them on paper, not to pay them on demand, excepting when quite convenient. Will such a system of banking tend more to give security to property or to destroy it; to secure liberty to the citizen, or to overturn it by the profligacy and corruption such a system engenders?

England was carried through her last continental war by her bank!—a bank which suspended at the first shock in '97, and whose paper was depreciated during the whole continuance of the war, and for five years after. But Parliament restrained it from paying specie! Just, sir, as the people of Charleston, a few years since, restrained, the banks of that city from paying specie. Banks, where they can command, know very well how to make appearances. The Government of England had borrowed the whole capital of the bank, and the bank had only to require of the Government to pay up their indebtedness, or legalize a suspension. Their debtor of course bowed to their commands; and the form in which the act was passed, more clearly shows that the bank dictated it. I thought the prosperity of England during this eventful struggle, was attributable to the fact, that she was the only spot in Europe unscathed by the fires of war; and that whilst industry and labor were paralyzed on the continent, she became the carrier of nations and the workshop of the world.

And our two wars, particularly the Revolutionary war, was sustained and triumphed by the aid of banks! The Bank of North America, with a capital of only four hundred thousand dollars, was incorporated on the 31st of December, 1781, after the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown, and only nine months before the war closed. During the last war, the banks had certainly more to do with us. As soon as the war commenced, they suspended specie payments; and when the Government, compelled by its necessities, negotiated loans from them, it was compelled to take in payment for its stock, their notes at par, although at fifteen and twenty per cent. discount. The credit of the Government by their combinations, controlling as they did the whole credit and currency of the country, then passed at some thirty per cent. below specie. Not less than from thirty to forty millions, was lost to the Government by these operations, on the debt we contracted to carry on the war. "But what then," exclaims the gentleman from Maine—"this depreciated currency carried us through the war. Business was done by it, and we gained by our ability to do business hundreds of millions of dollars." Certainly, sir, a depreciated bank currency is better than no currency at all, which is the comparison I suppose by which the gentleman estimates our gain from using it. But suppose a sound currency had existed, which the people had a right to demand from the banks, for this was the purpose and condition of their charters, would not business have been as well done, and the Government have been saved the loss it sustained from their depreciated paper? If the gentleman had said that hundreds of millions of dollars had been lost by the people, instead of gained from depreciated bank paper during the war, he would have been much nearer right in his position. This paper constituted the sole currency of the country, and settled contracts as if it was specie. Who can estimate the loss sustained by the people, in the transactions of business from a depreciated and depreciating paper currency, for the years the banks held the country under the hard pressure of suspension?

Mr. Chairman, having thus expressed my opinion upon the system of banking in the United States, the question may well be asked me, Are you opposed to all banking? I am opposed to all privileged banking, and to all banking irresponsible to the people. It is a common mistake to suppose that charters are necessary for banking. There was, until a few years since, but one chartered bank in Great Britain, while there were hundreds of banks in the empire. Mr. Girard, of Philadelphia, never deigned to ask a charter for his bank. I do not think that the credit of individuals could be prohibited from being used in banking, without such an entrenchment on the rights of individuals as I am not prepared to see exercised. At the same time, as the currency affects the people, and is an interest common to all, all ought to have the power of protecting themselves from its abuses. While, therefore, privileges for banking ought to be given to none, restrictions and regulations ought to be laid upon credit when used in banking, which will protect the people from frauds and fluctuations. Paper, in some shape or other, will be used in the larger transactions of commerce; and nothing can prevent it, but such an interference with the conduct of individuals, as would be more intolerable than the evils of a bad currency. In the largest manufacturing counties of England, almost all the business done in them, is by the paper of individuals. But all the difficulties of this great question—the whole subject of banking, belongs to the States. This Government was designed to be a hard money Government; and the bill before the committee, is intended to restore it to its constitutional functions. The alternative presented by its opponents, of a United States Bank, combines the two most odious features which any measure can present to a people living under a Republican form of Government—privilege and irresponsibility; the one, the attribute of an aristocracy, the other, of a despotism.

SPEECH OF MR. HASTINGS,

OF OHIO,

In the House of Representatives, June 25, 1840—In Committee of the Whole, on the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. HASTINGS addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The provisions and merits of this bill have been so extensively and ably discussed and elucidated by so many gentlemen of talents and ability, that to attempt to tax their patience with any thing more in that way would seem uncalled for, and in truth, I did not intend to have said a word upon the subject, knowing that this would be the case; but now that the discussion is drawing to a close, and perceiving that a few considerations belonging to, or connected with, the bill, have not been adverted to, and one deeply important one—one that has produced the necessity of the measure itself in particular, and which, in the course of the few remarks I shall make, and I will not detain the committee but a short time, I will endeavor to explain. But I am a plain man and will come to the point and proceed at once.

In the course of this debate, gentlemen have said, I do not now remember exactly who, that the intention of this bill is to unbank the banks; to make one currency for the Government and another for the people; that it is to have the effect of a political engine; that it is to favor the manufacturing capitalist and the commercial capitalist at the expense of the working community; and that it will keep five millions of dollars always out of circulation: all which charges have been so entirely confuted during the debate on this floor by the advocates of the bill, that there seems to be no occasion or necessity for any further remarks upon the subject. For myself, Mr. Chairman, I have read over and examined the bill very attentively, more than once, and it is precisely and simply what it purports to be; "An act to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue." I can make nothing else out of it; it speaks plain enough what it is. It is true it will prevent the public revenue, the money which comes out of the pockets of the people, and, ultimately, from the labor of the workers, to pay the public expenses, from assisting in the hazardous exploits, and mismanagement, and tortuous movements and speculations of banking interests, which we have so long experienced. Is it wrong or unjust to keep the people's money proper, which is collected off the people to defray the expenses of their Government, among themselves, instead of placing it at hazard? Surely, no one will say so; and this is what this bill will do; and, in doing so, it will incidentally be otherwise salutary in its operations. It can have nothing in view either about banking banks or unbanking them. If there is any unbanking about it, the banks have been unbanking themselves ever since the 10th day of May three years ago, when they suspended specie payments. In fact, by keeping up the every day circulation of coin, it will incidentally be favorable to such banks as will confine their operation to their legitimae business—that is, discounting business paper, instead of renewable accommodation paper.

As to its being a political engine: if to keep twenty or five-and-twenty millions of the people's money—the public revenues, in constant circulation, in the shape of gold and silver, instead of being in the clutches of the banks, will make it a political engine, it will be one, and a very useful one, too—one that will keep up an every-day intercourse between the people and their Government, through the medium of the same currency; and if it does keep from three to five millions always in the Treasury, the confidence it will create will bring into circulation—beside the revenues—a much greater sum, three or four times, perhaps, that is now shut up in thrifty cautiousness; and so far from favoring the capitalist at the expence of the workers—by keeping a more due proportion of coin in circulation—it will go far toward restoring and keeping up the equilibrium which has heretofore preponderated so heavily in favor of the capitalist, through the partial operations of banking.

It has been asserted, that this important measure of detaching the people's money from the risks of banking, and keeping it always at the command of the Government in the hands of responsible agents, is not demanded—not wanted. I am not surprised at this—some do not want it, we know. The banker does not want it, neither does the broker; the rank usurer does not want it, neither does the shaver who becomes rich on the distresses of his fellow men; the hazardous, reckless speculator is opposed to it, and so is the young, sanguine, inconsiderate, airy-castle-building merchant; but the right thinking, shrewd, industrious one, who understands the true stable interests of his pursuit, is in favor of it; for it may be, to a degree, a salutary restraint upon overtrading. The ingenious mechanic demands it; the persevering manufacturer demands it; the toiling laborer demands it; and the industrious farmer demands it; and these are the supporters of our independence and prosperity. Truth demands it, and justice imperiously demands it, and our wide spread commerce demands it—and why? that our products and manufactures may be the better enabled to compete with those of other nations in foreign markets, through the increased impetus and encouragement that this honest impartial regulation will give to those pursuits. It is a mistake that this bill is not required.

Although much has been said, and is constantly saying, about the causes of the moneyed derangements and embarrassments which the country has been laboring under for many years past; yet, we as constantly forget that all speculations upon the subject must still resolve themselves into one fact, one immediate cause—buying more than we sell. And the next question is, what promotes that circumstance? And the response must be—making money out of paper, instead of earning it by industry, to pay for the goods; credits on import duties; and collecting those duties in the paper money that the banks manufacture to pay for the goods, and placing the public revenues in the same banks to assist in making the paper money. But the more remote the fundamental cause that has permitted all this; the root of the evil, as we might call it, and which has never yet been considered in a correct, just point of view, that I know of, I will endeavor to explain after a little. But, as I was saying, the immediate cause is buying more than we sell, and incurring a heavy balance of trade against us—an unthrifty business, that plain, thinking people would say we should have understood and reformed long ago. Well, be it so; but we may excuse ourselves by saying we have been imposed upon by delusions, by fallacies; by being told that a profusion of bank notes is necessary to develope the resources of the country; that the apparent balance of trade is not the real one; that gold and silver are not as good currency as bank notes; and until very lately, when the working people have been fallen most violently in love with, that they did not understand their true interests; that the credit system, as banking is called, is the paradise of prosperity for our Republic. Now, in my simple opinion, and with all due deference to those who live without doing any thing, credit depends upon such an almost endless variety of contingencies, that it cannot be reduced to a system at all: however, as the objection may be called cynical, let it pass. But one grand assertion, and the only true one, I think, among the whole, is, that the country prospers, notwithstanding all the untoward circumstances it has been laboring under. And it has, that's certain, like a young, independent, persevering, spirited man, who has a fashionable, managing, breeches-wearing wife to support, that gets him in debt over and over again—and he keeps working over and over again, improving all the time though—to pay it. At length he takes heart of grace, turns over a new leaf with the wife, incurs no more debt, persists in industry and thrift, and goes ahead in prosperity, independence, and happiness—just as the working people mean to do now, Mr. Chairman. And to encourage them to persevere in this good resolution, if they should see these remarks, I will submit an extract from exposition No. 4 of the Governor of Ohio's message in 1837, by "A Democrat," to let them see what prosperity might have been attained by five years of this balance of trade. The writer says: "The excess of our importations over our exportations for the five years preceding the present bank suspensions was—

1834	23 000,000
1835	28 000,000
1836	61,000,000

And, to illustrate how this balance might have promoted our prosperity in various ways, he says: "What would this $144,000,000 have done for us? At $20,000 a mile, it would have made 7,200 miles of railroad or canal. At $20 an acre, it would have cleared and fenced in the best manner 7,200,000 acres of land. At $1 25 an acre, it would have purchased, out of the public domain, 720,000 farms, at 160 acres each. At $2,000 a piece, it would have bought, of the same public land, built a substantial house and barn, and cleared and fenced 80 acres on each, 72,000 farms, of 100 acres. At $500 each, it would have set up 288,000 mechanics, with families. At $50,000 a piece, it would have established 2,880 manufactories, which would have employed and paid 570,000 of our own people here at home, instead of the same number in Europe, and made fabrics to the amount of $150,000,000 a year at least. Or, in coin, it would have taken the place of the same amount of bank notes, making our specie circulation, with the $8,000,000 we now possess, $224,000,000. And what have bank expansions and contractions, and their other tortuous proceedings, given us in lieu of those advantages? Idleness and speculation, and a greater propensity to luxury; a growing distaste for honest industry, and deterioration of morals; an increase of aristocratic taint, and consequent distaste for, and falling off from, republican principles; critical revulsions in our political and domestic economy; and privations, and sufferings, and acrimonious recriminations in party, and vexations of spirit."

"A Democrat," Mr. Chairman, asks what this $144,000,000 would have done for us? and I ask what would five times the sum have done for us? for I find that the balance of trade from 1789 to 1837 is more than that. Our imports to the last date, 1837, have been $4,067,975,705, and our exports $3,315,287,888, leaving a balance against us of $752,687,817. And this had all to be paid by labor—by the sweat of the worker's brow! Is not this, sir, an astounding fact for the people of this Union to reflect upon? and will they not take matters into their own hands, and remedy it? Will they ever be the victims of delusion, and reject sober reality? No, sir, they will not. The illusive day dream of making money out of paper, instead of earning it by honest, patient industry, is past. Paper may be a handmaid to specie, and used to a useful extent, but nothing more. Those who have to support the fabric of our prosperity by their hands will see to it—all will be right, and independence and happiness will follow.

I forgot to mention, Mr. Chairman, that the interest upon this balance of trade of $752,687,817 would be upward of $45,000,000 a year—about double what would pay the expenses of the Government. And of this balance of trade—this immense increase of the toils of the working man, imposed upon him chiefly by the paper fallacy and credit duties—nearly one-half was incurred during the operations of the late United States Bank. And what has caused this state of things? the credit system, as it is misnamed; in other words, the paper money system, excessive banking, and credits on duties, as I said before; it is plain as the noonday sun. And what do those who have inflicted this monetary disease upon us—who have nurtured and sustained it—propose for a remedy?—no less than a further trial of the cause that induced it—a continued dose of the paper phantom itself! I am tempted, Mr. Chairman, to say that this is laughable; but it is too solemn to be laughed at; it hazards our liberties. No, sir; I ask the people of this Union, and more particularly the working part of them—from whose labors all has to be extracted, all has to be paid—to take this matter into their most serious, their most grave consideration; to be trifled with no longer, to decide, to act, to apply the remedy, and to make the reformation—wisely, and cautiously, and gradually, but as certain as fate itself; and they will do it, sir; they will do this thing; they will dissipate this inordinate paper money delusion; and all will be well; they prize their independence too highly not to do it.

Among the manifold evils that the late United States Bank inflicted on the country, and which have been well depicted more or less by the gentlemen who have spoken on the subject, there is one that a remark of the gentleman from Kentucky reminded me of, and no light one either. Among the advantages which that gentleman, (whom I highly esteem for his candor and sincerity of opinion,) in his remarks, ascribed to it, he stated that it was a great accommodation to widows and orphans, and aged gentlemen, to make secure investments in, from which to receive good and punctually paid dividents. As a commentary upon these opinions, I will state a few facts, from which conclusions may be drawn that will not warrant the correctness of these opinions.

The report to Congress, January, 1819, after describing the various surreptitious proceedings of the Bank to raise the stock as high as possible beyond the original price, that the speculator, who had possessed himself of it for the very purpose of selling it to the innocent and unwary, such as the gentleman has described, should be more enriched, says: "The effect of these different proceedings was that, on the last of December, 1816, Bank of the United States stock was at 41½ for 30 paid; in April, at 81 for 65; in May, at 98; on the 20th of August, at 144 for 100 paid; on the 30th of August, at 156½; at which price it remained for some days, and then began to decline."

It appears further, that, in the reckless efforts to raise the stock to the above prices, the bank had sunk above $3,500,000, and that, on the report of the investigating committee in Washington, reaching Philadelphia, the stock fell to 93. There was rapid work for ye—from 156½ to 93. Those of the widows and orphans, and aged gentlemen, who were obliged to sell out under this depression, must have made desperate losses.

About this time the situation of the Bank was very perilous; at one moment it had only about $70,000 in its vaults. A Bank of $35,000,000 reduced to $70,000 in specie! What a safe institution to make investments in for either profit or security! Thenceforward it was obliged, it seems, to reimburse its capital from its dividends—a very honest, just measure toward those who had confided in its faith, and bought its stock at extravagantly advanced prices from its stockholders, depending on the dividends for their support. Here is a detail of the operation in a table, of the whole of its semi-annual dividends. It is a curiosity, but not a pleasing one, even at this day, to the innocent purchasers of its stock, at high prices, from unfeeling knaves, who have reduced many of these confiding sufferers to poverty and distress, while they are living on in luxury and dissipation, perhaps, and exerting themselves to continue the same impositions that enriched them. It is necessary to lay it before the committee, for the better understanding of the considerations it has induced.

In looking over this detail of dividends, we are naturally led to inquire what privations many of the orphans, and widows, and aged gentlemen, must have experienced from 1819 to 1828; and particularly those who had purchased the stock at the inflated prices, as high as 156½—which a vast portion of them did; deriving no income whatsoever from it during two years, and, for several years, a mere trifle. For it must be observed, that, when the dividend was only 2½, those who had paid $150 for $100, for instance, were receiving only 1⅝, or $3 33½ per annum; and if they were obliged to sell out when the stock was down to $93, would sink $380 in $1,000. An acquaintance of mine, who had bought at $140, thinking it a wise investment—no better security than the United States Bank—got frightened, thinking the Bank was going to break, (and it was upon the verge of it,) and sold out for $98 or $95, I do not remember which. Gentlemen may rest assured that the orphans, and widows, and aged gentlemen, who were the sufferers at that day by the malversations of the great regulator, did not invoke blessings upon the authors of their distresses.

It was the gentleman from Massachusetts, I think, who said that, from 1789 to 1836, the whole amount lost by deposite banks is not equal to what has been lost by one public officer—meaning Swartwout, I presume. Well, be that as it may, let us see what the United States did not receive, but should have received, for the investment of seven millions in that institution. For the two years, that, it will be perceived from the table, the Bank made no dividend, the United States should have received 7 per cent.; a dividend the Bank ultimately arrived at, and should always have made, if its affairs had been fairly conducted. These two years would, on seven millions, have been $980,000, and the interest on that for the following fifteen years would have been $882,300; making, together, an item of $1,862,300, which the Government should have received, but did not. And upon counting up, it will be perceived further, that the dividends from July, 1821, when the bank re-commenced a dividend, until it arrived at the semi-annual one of 3½ per cent. July, 1828, amounted to $12,511,000; the Government's proportion of which was $3,522,000; whereas a 7 per cent. dividend would have been $3,430,000; making another item of $908,000, which the United States should have received, but did not: and the interest upon this last, for the following seven years, would have been $381,360; another item which the United States should have received, but did not. The whole amount being $3,151,660; and if the interest were calculated upon each reduced dividend separately, it would be considerably more. It is true, the bank, on winding up with the Government, agreed to pay 113, I believe, which would be 13 per cent. on the seven millions; making $920,000, to be deducted from the $3,151,660; still leaving $2,231,660, which the United States should have received, but did not. For every one conversant with banking knows that the banks should have always made a dividend of not less than 7 per cent. if it had confined its operations to common banking rules. Government did not procure the war-loan upon such terms. Stock was issued to the amount of 50,000,000 at 6 per cent. for which only 43,000,000 were received; being a premium of 14 per cent. for the loan, and paying about 7 per cent. for what was received.

It is a pity, Mr. Chairman, that the $7,000,000 of the people's money, which were invested in contemptible bank schemes for twenty years, had not been better employed. If there was power to use it as bank capital, (which there was not,) there was power to use it for a laudable purpose, that would benefit the nation. Lending it, for instance, in sums of $1,000, to 7,000 industrious men, for twenty years, at 6 per cent. to enable them to purchase farms from the public lands, and raise their families in comfort and independence. That would have been doing something; for, if each family raised only a surplus of $50 a year for sale, this $7,000,000 of the public money would have added $7,000,000 more to the national wealth; instead of taking part in the wretched, petty details of banking, as it has been conducted, unworthy the consideration of a free people.

The gentleman from Kentucky says: "We of the West look to such a measure [a National Bank] with deep interest;" and stated, if I remember right, among other things, that the United States Bank regulated the exchanges, and gave us a currency that passed all over the country. Well, be that as it may, it is a well-known fact, that, during its day, the exchanges of the West were really never more deranged, or the circulating value of the local bank paper more fluctuating. It did regulate the exchanges and give us a currency, with a vengeance, by getting us heavily in debt to England, and making us "hewers of wood and drawers of water," and caterers to her power, and interests, and schemes of aggrandizement. But I must differ with the gentleman in his opinion that the West looks with deep interest to a National Bank; my constituents do not want one; they would look upon it as a great evil; they have had experience sufficient in that way; and as to regulating the exchanges, that is one of the evils we have to complain of. The United States Bank, by interfering with the natural course or regulation of exchange, both domestic and foreign, for her own interest, assisted mainly in getting us in debt to Britain. It was one of the delusions that had that effect. But I will explain as briefly as possible; for, if I were to go into all the arcana and ramifications of exchange, I might consume a whole day, and more too. A farmer in the West (my own Ohio, for instance,) having some money to transmit to an eastern city, (I like to bring in a farmer, for he is commonly in earnest,) goes to the storekeeper with whom he deals to inquire how he shall send it safely. It is soon done; the storekeeper deposites the farmer's money (notes of local banks, perhaps) in a United States branch bank, and gets the farmer a draft on the mother bank, as the great regulator was called at that day, for one per cent. or, perhaps, a half of one per cent. sometimes. The farmer goes home well pleased, praises the United States Bank and branch banks to the skies, and tells his neighbors what a blessing they are to the country; that they make money as plenty as slate-stones, and will transmit it for you to Philadelphia, free of risk, for almost nothing—a mere song. This, sir, is one of the phases of artificial exchange, brought about by the United States Bank during her dynasty. Let it be observed, that, at the moment of this transaction, however, the storekeepers, or merchants, were heavily in debt to the Eastern merchants, and some, perhaps, to the branch bank and to their own local banks; and the farmer heavily in debt to the storekeepers for British fabrics, chiefly, and may be to a local bank something, too, either as principal or security—a state of affairs that the United States Bank, herself, had brought about by her delusive rate of exchange and inordinate issues of paper to pay for vast importations of goods; for she and her offsprings, the branch banks, made bank notes at pleasure, and played into each other's hands; and the farmer and his productive acres, and his industry, were good security. Now, sir, I will endeavor to exhibit one of the phases of exchange under the same circumstances of indebtedness, but, in the absence of the designing influences of the National Bank and branches; left free to take its own natural, just course, and produce its natural salutary influence on our economy: The farmer goes to the storekeeper, as before, but the scene is changed—"I can do nothing for you; the West is heavily in debt to the East; we are hard pushed, and you have got a great deal of goods from us, and we must raise money; the West has no funds in the East; I could not get you a draft under four per cent. perhaps." The farmer naturally inquires why it was so easily accomplished before; the reply, merely: "Ah! that game's up—could not play it forever," and so on. The farmer ponders on the matter, goes home and retrenches; he and his family work hard and get out of debt, and keep out of it, by using less of foreign manufacture; the Western storekeeper pays his debt to the Eastern merchant, and the balance of trade no longer against Ohio (perhaps in her favor) and exchange in fair proportion. Such would be the happy results to be arrived at when the honest indications of the faithful barometer of exchange were left free from the insidious operations of artifice. But the knowledge to be derived from the rate of exchange, ascertaining the balance of trade, has been withheld from us by the artificial influences of excessive banking and its expansions and contractions. Over and over again, in consequence of the balance of trade being against us, connected with other circumstances, has Britain, and her bank, and her merchants, pressed our Eastern merchants and banks, and they have pressed the Western merchants and banks, and they, in their turn, have pressed the farmers and workers; and still, these producers, by their indomitable energy of character and persevering industry, have, over and over again, retrieved the disastrous affairs of the Republic; for it is labor, through the toil and sweat of the workers, that must pay every thing ultimately. And as the workers have to bear the brunt, they are inquiring into the nature of the delusions and misrepresentations that have kept them so long in obeyance to the insatiable demands of the paper incubus; and when the farmer puts his hand to the plough himself, he soon finds where the fault lies. Exchange, if left to its own free course, points the balance of trade. For instance: when there is no balance, exchange would be about the expense of transmission of the money; but if the balance of trade were against Ohio in the East, exchange would be above par; and if it were in her favor, it would be proportionably below par; and the people would feel the fluctuations, accordingly, and the operation would be salutary! The United States Bank and her branches, however, prevented this wholesome action by drawing and redrawing upon each other, without any reference to the state of trade—being one of the schemes of the regulator to maintain and perpetuate her power and influence, and which the credit of being the Government bank enabled her to carry on with impunity.

The same gentleman, likewise, in the course of his remarks a few days ago, asked "What is currency, and what is the use of currency?" and then proceeded to define it, to his own satisfaction, no doubt, but not to mine; our conceptions of what currency is, at present, are widely different. In common parlance we all know that currency means money—that which passes current; now I put it to the common sense of every gentleman in this House, whether bank-notes can of late years come under that denomination: Are they current? They circulate, it is true, but are they as current as money? that is the question. What is the currency, or money, of nations? Gold and silver, certainly; and the reason is plain, for these metals are the result of labor itself; statistical writers agreeing that gold and silver coin cost, in the aggregate, its current value in labor; whereas, in tracing the credit system, you can make a million in bank notes for one hundred dollars. And this was the impression when the first revenue law in the United States, in 1789, was passed, in which this wise, cautious provision was made: "The duties and fees to be collected by virtue of this act, shall be received in gold and silver only." Does not this prove that in that day gold and silver only were recognised as being virtually currency; the currency of nations—current at home, and current every where? And what is this bill going to do, Mr. Chairman? What, but to return to first principles; those that guided our wise and patriotic forefathers of the Revolution in guarding us against the delusions of paper money, in their first revenue act, by making our public dues payable in gold and silver, to be arrived at gradually in three years. Why is the redemption of mortgages always so carefully and positively worded, "gold and silver?" Why, but because it is considered the only true currency—that it is always property every where. It would seem to me, sir, that we have been misapplying the term "currency" in attaching it to bank notes; that it should belong to gold and silver only, which is always current, at home and abroad. If a bank note is passing at ten per cent. discount, surely we will not call that current! Certainly not; it circulates, but it is not current. And if it is circulating at its denomination to-day, we know that it may be at a discount to-morrow, and still we call it currency. It does seem to me, sir, that we have been misapplying the word "currency," all along, in attaching it to bank paper. Bank notes may circulate from hand to hand, as evidences of indebtedness; and so do bills of exchange, and notes of hand, and bonds, and due bills, but we do not call them currency. We do not call bonds currency, although their redemption may be well secured, and yet we call bank notes currency, although they may not be secured at all. This seems very inconsistent; unless that gold and silver, being intrinsically honest, and being what is termed "currency," at all times and in all places, both at home and abroad, and bank notes not being intrinsically honest, (their admirers will excuse me for saying so, but truth is truth,) acquire some credit by being ranked under the same term with the honest gold and silver. That, sir, must be the secret, that the word "currency" is so pertinaciously applied to, and demanded for, bank notes, whether they deserve it or not; there it is, sir. It appears to me, that the better way would be to call bank notes "circulation," and gold and silver "currency;" because the former may, and do, circulate through our own country, and not pass current; but the latter always pass current at home and abroad, and everywhere, all over the world. Or, if it is insisted on that bank notes are currency, whether or not, let us call them "currency partial," and the real thing, gold and silver, "currency positive." Suppose we reconcile matters that way. As to the question, "What is the use of currency?" we might set to and trace it up through all its ramifications, and bearings, and manifold interests on the business of life, which would be pretty much of a job—a species of edification that I feel certain gentlemen would not wish to have inflicted on them at present; therefore we will sum it up in plain English, in one designation, and its main one: To buy and sell with, and all will admit that the "currency positive," stands pre-eminent for that purpose. And this bill will have a tendency to keep a little more of it circulation for every day use.

The low wages of labor in Europe, Mr. Chairman, have been held up to our vision as a concomitant of the workers being paid in gold and silver; leaving it to be inferred that that is the cause, and that the 19th section of this bill would lead toward a similar result; or, in other words, that bank notes would keep wages of labor higher. It is all a mistake, sir; low wages in Europe belong to very different causes, as respects Ireland, at least, and which I will show presently. I think that gentlemen know very little about the matter. They who come from those countries might tell them the causes. They are attributable to any thing but a specie currency. Gentlemen need not point to poor oppressed Ireland for their proof—I was going to add degraded; but degraded she can never be, while her warm hearted sons maintain their frank, open bearing—their prominent characteristic all over the world. I am a native of the "Green Isle of the Ocean"—blessed by Heaven and cursed by man—and I am proud of it: of that land of green fields and flowers, of brave hearts and stout hands. I think I know the disposition of my countrymen well. It is not for me to eulogize them. It is sufficient that I know and feel the oppressions that have been exercised upon them for the last seven hundred years—exercised upon them through the same spirit and policy that have inflicted upon the United States the monopoly and exclusive privilege system, misnamed the credit system credit system, indeed! it is the very opposite of credit; for the whole catalogue of slavish circumstances it has involved us in are discreditable to a free people. Has it not made us subservient to Britain, to British policy, to British interests, through the United States Bank, through our stocks, through our corporations, through our monopolies, through our very societies, engendered and promoted by herself? No, sir, it is very, very far from the truth that a metallic currency—the electioneering gulltrap, to impose upon plain, well meaning people—induces low wages for labor as respects Ireland, at least, which I will show beyond controversy. But, in doing so, I must recur to Ireland's halcyon days—comparatively halcyon, I mean; for halcyon days that fair island has never seen since she came under the British dynasty. I allude to the few years of comparative prosperity that she experienced when Britain emerged from the war she had been waging to perpetuate her dominion over her American colonies, now six-and-twenty proud, prosperous States, free, sovereign, and independent; united together by obvious ties, that render them the envy and admiration, and something else I might say, but will not, of all the kingdoms of the old world, and particularly of that same Britain out of whose clutches they had disengaged themselves, through a seven years' struggle of toil, and blood, and privation, and suffering. And ever be revered; ever be hallowed, the memory of those who fought, and bled, and died, through that struggle; who gained for us the unappreciable liberties we now enjoy, and the power of governing ourselves in our own way. I have it to say, Mr. Chairman, and I say it with pride, that there are those with whose blood I am connected, one, who, animated by the same spirit, and the same enthusiastic love of liberty, and the same sympathies for the oppressed that distinguished Lafayette, left his native country, crossed the Atlantic, volunteered into the far famed Maryland line, and shared with kindred spirits the same eventful struggle of the Revolutionary war. His only daughter inherits the same spirit, which is perpetuated in her sons, who will no doubt do the needful for their country whenever the hour of peril demands it. But, as I was saying, sir, that was the prosperous day of Ireland; working people were paid in nothing but gold and silver. I never saw a bank note at that time. When a person would go into the rooms where the cloth merchants were paying the weavers for their webs, he would see the tables covered with piles of gold and silver. I speak from experience, for that was the business I learned—to buy linen and get it bleached. Workers of all descriptions were paid in nothing but specie; nothing else was seen or thought of among them; and Ireland never prospered better, nor saw better days, before nor since, while under the English dominion. No, sir, it's all nonsense talking about the presence of hard money, or a dearth of bank notes with pretty pictures on them to amuse the vision, causing cheap labor, and poverty, and pauperism, among the masses in poor Ireland; would to Heaven her children, of generous impulses, experienced none of them! No, Mr. Chairman, it is circumstances akin to our own well-beloved monopolies here, in the land of freedom, that have caused them.

Gentlemen should press no such errors upon our senses; for history and experience, and the thousands of exiles who leave those countries of oppression, and constant rumor dinging it in our ears, disprove the fallacy. We see the true causes, and read of them, and hear of them, every day; and many of us have felt them too sensitively to be mistaken. We talk about slavery! I declare it this moment, most solemnly, as an eye-witness, in the face of the world, that the Irish are greater slaves, through the oppressive circumstances that are inflicted on them by the British ascendency, than the veriest slaves on the earth: for slaves are merely slaves, but the Irish are slaves, and forced to swallow, withal, the bitter cup under the elevated name of freemen. There's the thorn that is ever rankling in the vivid imaginations of the children of the "loved Isle." Who will gainsay it? Is it not holy truth? No, no; it's mere idle wind, pairing low wages in Europe and hard money together. I will tell gentlemen, though it ought to be unnecessary, they ought to know better, surely. It is extreme poverty in the masses, and overgrown riches in the few—the exclusives. A state of things that is kept up by aristocratic circumstances, of the same character and nature as our monopolies, our vested rights, that we hug so closely, and that would bring about the same species of despotism, if permitted. But this same simple, plain matter, of separating the Government from the banks, that we are discussing, makes an inroad, and the first one, upon those loved privileges that we have been cherishing and guarding so tenaciously. The people understand it; and will do so better every day, notwithstanding the endless variety of obstacles that are thrown before their eyes. But I forgot to mention that, at the time I speak of, the Bank of Ireland, established in 1783, with a capital of £500,000, or £600,000, (somewhere about $2,500,000,) had not got into full blow—$2,500,000, with a population of six or seven millions at that day, and the United States, at the present time, several hundred millions of bank capital, with a population of only something more than double the amount! Beside, another distinction: the Irish capital had a hare-money character; and ours is paper upon paper, in beautiful variety. But when I visited Ireland, some years after my arrival here, the scene was changed; fifty banks dashing away; £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 (upward of $20,000,000) paper in circulation, depreciated, of course; guineas 10 per cent., and wages 20 per cent. at least lower than when I left it. The notes in circulation there at present, are said to be about $40,000,000. The inquiry, sir, will now be, have rates of wages in that country kept pace with the increase of paper money? No such thing; the reverse is the fact. It is known that labor, of late, is not much more than half the rate it was during the more prosperous period I have alluded to. Well, has prosperity kept pace with increase of bank paper? No, alas! no. Every ship that arrives brings continued details of distress and starvation, and increasing poverty and misery. I do wish that gentlemen would not suffer their imaginations to be carried away by this paper fantasy—a mere bubble. We must come to reality at last, and subject paper to use, as far as it may be susceptible of it, instead of abuse.

No; the causes of low wages in Ireland are British land monopoly, sustained by laws of primogeniture and entailment, keeping the lands in large estates, instead of being in the hands of the people; corn-laws to keep grain dear, that these same landlords may exact the high rents from their tenants; bank monopolies, in variety; colony monopolies; union of church and state, and its concomitant—the tythe system—that wrests from the producer the tenth part of the fruits of his industry—his labor; a national debt of one thousand millions sterling, and consequent inordinate and endless taxation; extreme disparity in rank, engendered by these flagrant impositions on equal rights, and a variety of other causes incidental to these; and a standing army of one hundred thousand men, to dragoon the people into submission to these monstrous oppressions.

These, sir, are the real causes of the poverty, and pauperism, and low wages, in Ireland—quoting the memorable remark of the great and good Andrew Jackson—"making the rich richer, and the poor poorer." And I do believe, that if the most determined Federal gentleman on this floor would just take an excursion across the Atlantic for his amusement, and pass through Ireland, from north to south, stopping now and then, and looking about him, and conversing with the unsophisticated of her people, he would return an uncompromising Democrat, and never attempt to harness hard money and low wages together again.

Will gentlemen explain to us the causes of the low wages, and of poverty so extreme that they could barely exist, of the weaker sex in the city of brotherly love, and that of the empire State, about whose miserable condition the philanthropist, Mathew Carey, interested himself so perseveringly the last few years of his life? about those thousands of females who have to work themselves almost blind at their needle from daylight until one, and two, and three o'clock in the morning—who have to lead this wretched life for 25 cents a day, and as low sometimes, it has been stated, as 12½ cents; supporting their families and keeping in life on this miserable pittance. Is it a specie currency that causes this extreme misery? Will no gentleman answer? I have not the newspapers before me; but every one may remember the deep commiseration that was excited by the heart-rending details of the desperate labors and miseries these thousands of oppressed, desponding, despairing females had to undergo in these cities during the late winters.

We see that the low wages in Ireland are caused by the oppressive circumstances the people labor under; monopoly; monopoly is the blighting cause; monopoly of land, and of the fat of the land; monopoly of money, monopoly of labor, monopoly of power, monopoly of rank, monopoly of privilege, monopoly of every thing but pure elastic air and limpid water; and, thank God, their oppressors cannot deprive the single-hearted inhabitants of the Emerald Isle of these choicest of nature's luxuries; and the same causes, under various modifications, produce the same effects in every country in Europe. The representations of this or that currency, in the oppressed countries of the old world, cannot deceive us about the true causes of the low pittance of wages that the workers must put up with. It is labor lost. They who come from those countries understand them too well, to their sorrow; they have felt them, and seen them, and tasted them through the bitter cup of oppression. These tables of low wages need not be exhibited to the honest German, or the hardy Swiss, or the volatile Frenchman, or the plodding, persevering Englishman, or the prudent Scot, or the open-hearted Irishman, who have sought an asylum in the land of liberty and equal rights. I repeat it, they cannot be figured out of their senses, or led astray by these tables of low wages; they understand the real causes too well for that; for it is they who have felt them. I say, once more, it is labor lost.

Gentlemen need not be uneasy about low wages; in our own country we working folks have some notion of taking the bit in our teeth, and regulating at the polls the banking monopolies, and such other exclusive privilege monopolies and fallacies as tend toward arriving at the monopolist desideratum of the standard of European wages.

This bugbear of low wages is thrown away upon men who live by the sweat of their brow. They understand the matter. As long as the land they labor on is in the hands of the people, and not held in large overgrown estates by a privileged few, as in Europe, there is no danger of these low wages, the offspring of aristocratic circumstances. While the high-spirited American freeman can take the choice of working for another, or for himself; of tilling his own acres or another man's acres, just as he pleases; of wearing his shoes, or going barefooted (by the way I am indebted for this idea to a hard-fisted constituent and neighbor of mine who wanted to try a farmer for a Congressman, and who will remember it if he should read this,) there is no danger of the low wages, which those who have become all of a sudden so sensitively alive to the interests of the working man, would wish us to believe they are afraid of. We have been diving into these mysteries, and are beginning to understand them. There is no danger of these dire prognostics of low wages being realized, when the unsophisticated producer, who is content to live by the labor of his hands, can buy his 80 or 160 acres of the people's domain, in which he has an inheritance, and sit down in peace and independence under "his own vine and his own fig tree."

Much has been said in the speeches of gentlemen during these debates, as connected with this bill, about industrial interests, and about consideration and sympathy for the poor man, for the laborer—the working man; and some even condescend to call them the bone, and muscle, and sinew, of the country; which is all very fine, certainly; but, as the working people do not wish to draw invidious distinctions between themselves and the non-producers, and are beginning to take into consideration their own value and importance, they would as soon not be bespattered quite so extravagantly with these very gracious professions and flattering acknowledgments. I speak understandingly, for I have come from among them; therefore, I would respectfully suggest just to let them alone—let them manage their affairs in their own way. The laborers, and manufacturers, and mechanics, and farmers, are the industrials—the workers, the producers; they want no particular sympathy nor consideration; they want, simply, justice and equal rights with their fellow-citizens.

As to poor men, we have no poor men—in the West at least; for those who may be poor in worldly goods, are rich withal in independent feeling, in industry, in the proud spirit and consciousness of being American freemen. I repeat, they do not consider themselves the objects of peculiar consideration or sympathy; they are above it. These industrials, these producers, whether they live in log cabins, or frame, or brick, or stone houses, know that they are the bees of the hive; that through their labor comes the raw material and the fabric—the manufactured article. They know that the doctor, and the divine, and the lawyer, and the merchant, and the banker, and the shaver, and the speculator, and the dandy, and the would-be exclusives of every description—that all the non-producers live by them. In a word, they know that they are the solid basis on which the superstructure rests; that they are the health and strength of the Republic; that they are, emphatically, the people. Therefore, they ask not this consideration, this overweening love, that has showed itself all at once; they will not have it. But, Mr. Chairman, I will tell gentlemen what they do want; and I think I know their desires, for I am one of themselves; I am a farmer, and have the honor to represent essentially an agricultural population, with a due proportion of mechanics, and some manufacturers, as well as plenty of the good old-fashioned household manufacturers, among the farmers. They speak their will through me. They want this bill to be passed into a law, that the avails of the public lands—the lands which belong to the whole people—and the revenue from foreign merchandise, which is ultimately paid by the consumers, may not assist banks in their speculations and partial expansions and contractions, and oppressive mismanagement; a bill that will keep a little more of the precious metals, which is the unsophisticated currency of nations, the product of labor itself, in circulation: that the working man may command into his hard hand the hard dollar and the hard eagle, that he has earned by hard work. They want the duties on imports to be paid in cash down at once, without waiting for the expiration of the compromise tariff; and, if it were in order, I would offer an amendment to this bill to that effect. For they think that the importers and British agents have enjoyed the advantage of duty credits, over our manufacturers and mechanics, and our farmers, who have to pay the cash down for their land, quite long enough. And they want the duties more equalized, and reinstated upon silks and such other articles as may be required to ensure a sufficient revenue to defray the public expenses, and render any other resort unnecessary.

And, Mr. Chairman, I will tell gentlemen further, what these working constituents of mine do not want, that there may be no mistake hereafter, and from its being involved in the success of this bill. They do not want a National Bank and its aristocratic tendencies, with its branch banks, and its patronage, and hosts of presidents, and cashiers, and clerks; and army of borrowers; and brokers, and shavers, and speculators, and exclusives, and other leeches that will fatten upon the labors of the producers; and its derangements of our economy, through its expansions and contractions and scheming to control the Government and perpetuate its power; and its connection and sympathies and entanglements with foreign interests and policy, to retard and paralyze free government. They understand perfectly well the nature and tendencies of such an institution, for they have been operated on to their heart's content in that way. I believe, sir, this is, as far as I have described, what the working people do, and do not want; and if we, their representatives, do not do their will in these respects, they may take it into their heads, and tell us a little more of their minds, and enforce it through the quiet, but irresistible operation of that talisman of simple mechanism, invented by our patriotic forefathers—Heaven bless them for it!—the ballot box; an operation that may prostrate the aspirations and dissipate the inspiring day dreams of some of us honorables, without our consent, just by way of whispering in our ears what we are, and who made us, and not to forget ourselves.

No, sir, this sudden, overweening love for the working men—the lower classes, some still foolishly term them—displayed through pretensions of log cabins and hard cider, and the blandishments and coquetry of perfumed gloves, and ribands, and medals, and gilded banners, and other tawdry aristocratic tinsel and deception, cannot delude the free and right thinking tiller of the land. Ploughs and harrows, and log chains, and the other rural appliances of industry, could not mix with such gewgaw trash; the union would be too unnatural. A log cabin is garnished with no such trumpery; its embellishments consist of petticoats, and gowns, and coats, and trousers, hanging on its walls, and feather beds, and piles of linen as white as snow, and warm blankets, manufactured by its industrious inmates from their own flax and the fleeces of their own sheep. No, no; you must give the working man reality and common sense—and why? Because he knows what it is to get a living. He has not the privilege of making bank notes at pleasure. He will not have a President who will not "show his hand," to speak in lawyer parlance; who demands the confidence of the people, without telling them openly and frankly what he means; who will not tell them what important measure he will or will not support, but refers them to past professions with two faces; and permits himself to be kept un-the surveillance of a committee, who speak and think for him what they please.

My constituents want no such man for their President. They want the man who has told them his mind frankly and plainly upon all the great interests of the country; whose talents, and patriotism, and purity of purpose, have been tried, and not found wanting; and who sees and converses without demur with any body, Democrat or Whig, and speaks his mind manly and openly without disguise. He is the man they want for President.

As a friend, sir, to our own manufactures, I am particularly pleased with the 19th section of this bill, because it provides for the collection of our revenues in gold and silver only; a measure that will incidentally be more favorable to the manufacturer by lessening, measurably, the undue facilities that have hitherto been afforded the importers of foreign merchandise, in paying the duties in bank notes that could be made at pleasure. Excepting cash duties, which will go into effect at the expiration of the compromise tariff, I do not know any act that would benefit our manufacturers more than this one of exacting the import duties in specie. In truth, receiving the duties in bank notes is giving a species of additional credit on the duties, and so far unjust to our own fabrics and products. When I look at it in all its bearings, severing the public moneys from bank control is not merely an act of prudence and propriety, but an act of justice to the working community which was called for imperatively, to keep a sufficiency of coin in circulation for their use, that they may be no longer subjected to the fluctuating value of bank paper. And to Southern gentlemen I would respectfully suggest that, as this bill will conserve the interests of our manufactures, they have an additional interest in its passage; for the day is approaching when they may not be able to sell a bale of cotton to England. She is at this monent putting forth all her energies in cherishing and promoting the cotton culture in her East India possessions. The world has felt her indomitable perseverance of purpose, where she thinks her interest is concerned: and how seldom has she been unsuccessful in enforcing her views, whether of aggrandizement, or power, or ambition, or been fastidious about the means or policy she would use in pushing every obstacle out of her way! Do her colored regiments in Canada and the East and West demonstrate this, or not? This cotton project has of late been the theme of debate in her Parliament, and of consultation in her cabinet. I will exhibit one indication among the many I have seen lately on the subject. It is from the Liberator of the 6th of March last: "A Bombay paper of October 10th says, 'we understand that the court of directors have engaged twelve Americans to proceed to this country, for the purpose of improving the cultivation and clearing of cotton, and that they may be shortly expected to arrive in Bombay.' "

The moment the British Government determined (although in shameless, glaring contrast to the grinding oppression inflicted on her Irish subjects) on the act of emancipation in her West India colonies, to stand in contradistinction to the institution in our Southern States, that same moment did she determine on the cotton culture in her East India possessions through the labor of her hundred millions of slaves in that quarter of the world; for slaves they are virtually, to all intents and purposes. The conception of both projects was simultaneous, connected with, and grew out of each other. The motive of this double stroke of policy is so obvious, that comment or elucidation seems unnecessary. I only ask Southern gentlemen, and the whole people of this Union, who appreciate its value, and love their country, to bear it in mind for their future guidance, and as a precious commentary on the supposed magnanimity and humanity of a government that has been held up to our vision by Republican representatives on the floor of this hall, I am sorry to say, as a model of wisdom and greatness, for our imitation. If it had been presented to us as a model of reckless selfishness, it might have been more applicable. But railing is not argument, and that there are worthy men belonging to that Government, there is no doubt. I speak of the tendencies of its policy. To the pure patriotism of Southern gentlemen I need not appeal, for that stands pre-eminent; but I would point to their interests, which are involved in this measure as far as it will be doing justice to our own manufacturers.

I will now, Mr. Chairman, as briefly as I can, endeavor to show the more remote, the original, great moving cause that has brought the country into its present untoward monetary situation, and rendered the present bill necessary, and which I alluded to in the commencement; and a right understanding of which will assist the people in getting out of the dilemma, and likewise assist in avoiding such evils in future.

How happy it is, sir, for a people to have the power, the faculty, of governing themselves, and doing it wisely and justly, according to the great principle of free government! We, as a people, have had such a power placed in our hands, for which we should be thankful, but have we been exercising it wisely and justly? that is the question. I fear we have not. We have got ourselves into trouble, almost inexplicable, for want of reflection —from mere wanton thoughtlessness we might say. But, happily, it is not too late to begin; and that beginning must be to inquire where we have erred. It has been by a wrong estimate, an unjust exercise of the legitimate power of the people, as a whole, in conferring that power upon parts of ourselves called corporations. Because we must consider ourselves only as a whole—(the people of a State, I mean—Congress can only act under the Federal Constitution) —in the exercise of free government; and if we confer our power as a whole—as one and indivisible—upon a part of that whole, we are not exercising the power of free government rightfully.

This is obvious; and this we have been doing, and for which we have been and are being justly punished. Let us consider—what is free government? The power of governing freely, certainly, whether exercised by a man in his own proper person, or by a body of men associated together for that purpose. But the latter, in doing so, must act always as a whole only, and never confer the power of that whole virtually upon a part; for if they do, they are no longer free: that we have done, and there is the error we have committed. We diverted ourselves of that power, and frittered it away upon parts of ourselves, called corporations, which was strikingly exemplified when we conferred our power in the form of a charter upon the United States Bank, irredeemable for 20 years—not to resume our power for that period, although the people of any one of those 20 years had the same power that we had when granting the privilege. Hence, the question arises, if the people of this day do this, have the people of a future day the power to rectify it, to resume their power again? Certainly; but always in a just manner to those concerned; for justice is the chief attribute of power. Unquestionably they have; for if they have not, they are not governing themselves—there is an end to their free government. This is, unfortunately, the position of the American people at this moment. We have given up to a part of ourselves powers above the Constitution itself. If I were disposed to indulge in bitterness of spirit, I might call this ungrateful to that Almighty power that permitted us the inestimable blessing of exercising the power of self government as a people. It appears to me, Mr. Chairman, that our money distractions have been permitted through this wrong exercise of the power of the people in the collective capacity, as associated together for free government, from the Revolution to the present day. But before I proceed to show that this is the case, I will endeavor to explain and elucidate as little as may answer the purpose, of the nature, extent, and exercise of this power.

The legitimate power of the people is one and indivisible; they cannot divest themselves of it, for they are only holding it for posterity; they cannot confer it on a part, because it belongs only to the whole; it cannot be, but as a whole—it is always the same. It is the same in the people of one period, as in those of another period. The people of 1840, '50, or 1900, will have the same power as those of the present day. It exists in us of to-day, as it did in those of twenty years ago—always one and indivisible in the character of Government, and this is but just and reasonable; no Republic can be permanent upon any other basis; we cannot be a free people upon any other candition; a people associated together, every law, every act, emanates from the whole as one only. It was this great principle, felt, but not as perfectly understood as it yet will be, that released us from the dominion of Britain. It was this great principle that induced us to set up for ourselves—to become a free people; to attempt (what the nations of the old world would fondly believe is only an experiment) to govern ourselves in our own way, according to the principles of truth and justice. From this legitimate power of the people emanate the Constitutions of the States, which they alter and amend, or change and build up, to any extent that may be necessary or desirable, whenver they please, at any period of time. And why is this? Because the power of the people, as a whole, is always the same—it is always as one. Withal, the atoms which compose this power of self government are constantly changing; some die, some are born, some go beyond seas, some come from beyond seas; but still the legitimate power of the people, as a whole, is the same. Were the people of 1820 more infallible than we of 1840? or are we of 1840 more infallible than those of 1860 may be? or is our power as a people greater than theirs will be? Will they not have the power and right to relieve themselves from any act of ours that may involve their welfare? Is this very bill that we are going to pass, to remain unmodified or unrepealed at a subsequent time, if it should be deemed necessary? If the advocates of a United States Bank were the majority, and they should establish one, and it should become corrupt and oppressive, and trench upon and endanger our liberties, as a former one has done, would not justice to ourselves demand its abolishment? Do we assume to ourselves the power of inflicting evils on posterity, and that they shall be irremediable; that our descendants shall not rid themselves of them, even if they hazard the most sacred of all their rights, their liberties? And shall we do this under the sanction and hallowed name of free government? Why it is a mere mockery, unworthy an intelligent people. It is the worst kind of despotism—despotism under the mask of liberty. Was it for this our forefathers of the Revolution, through that sacred instrument, the Declaration of Independence, pledged "their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor?" Is the power of governing ourselves, as rational beings should, which we wrested from Britain through the price of blood, which belongs to us as a whole only, to be lost, frittered away, by conferring it upon parts of that whole, under partial privileges of contracts, and charters, and vested rights, erecting petty monarchies in our midst? In assuming such power, and doing such acts, I, for one, believe that we are incurring a fearful responsibility to that Omnipotence that liberated us from oppression, and permitted us to enjoy the blessings that belong to free government.

The Constitution, the instrument which prescribes the action through which we are to govern ourselves, we alter and amend, whenever we think it necessary; nay, take it to pieces, and remodel it altogether, if entirely advisable, although I am one of those who think the framework should never be touched, unless imperiously demanded; and shall we confer our power upon a part of ourselves; erect a species of monarchy under the guise of a bank charter; place it above that Constitution; consider it untouchable, unalterable, no matter now dangerous to our liberties, or corrupt it may become; make a creature greater than the creator? and this we have been doing from the hour that Alexander Hamilton, by his funding system, made the first inroad upon the legitimate power of the people, until the present day. This is the rock we have split upon: this injustice, this violation of our power, by conferring upon a part what belongs only to the whole—making creatures, and permitting them to be superior to ourselves—is the cause of all our monetary miseries from the foundation of the Government to this moment.

We know that the Constitution of the United States says, that no State shall make a law impairing the obligation of contracts. Now, if this means contracts formed between man and man, or contracts formed wherein the government of a State is a party of the same character as simply between man and man, where both have the power, it is right; but if it means that the power of the people as a whole (as one) through their representatives in one Legislature, can confer that power on a part, as in the case of charters, or vested rights, or exclusive privileges of any kind, for a specified time, to be irresumable during that time by a subsequent Legislature, or, in other words, by the people through the exercise of their power as a whole, it is unjust; it is a gross violation of the legitimate power of the people; an outrage upon the great principle of free government, and ought to be amended immediately. For, as I have said before, the power of the people in their collective capacity belongs only to the whole, and cannot be conferred upon a part of themselves. This power, this sacred right of self-government, will be the same in the people of ten years hence as it is in us of to-day—it was, is, and ever will be, the same.

Yes, sir; the great error we have committed, and for which we are now suffering, is that of conferring the power which belongs only to the whole, upon a part or parts of that whole for a given time, and making it irresumable during that period, as in charters to banks, &c. inflicting evils, perhaps, upon posterity, and saying they shall not relieve themselves from them—depriving the people of an element of their sovereignty. Could any act be more unreasonable or unjust, or fatally adverse to the great principle of free government? the supreme, the sovereign power being in the people at all times—always one and indivisible. As I have already said, was it not this great principle that carried us through the Revolution?

Lawyers say that a contract is not binding unless both parties have the power to make it. Have the people of this day, or of this generation, the right or the power to contract away the liberties of the people of another day—another generation? Will any freeman, any right-thinking man, entertain for a moment the slightest approach toward such a suicidal idea? It is this dire admission that keeps the people of the old world laboring and struggling on under the wretched oppressions that are inflicted on them.

But I must not be misunderstood. I do not wish to leave any thing open to the cavils of the disingenuous. I therefore say, plainly, that the obligation of contracts, as between man and man, I respect as much as any other in the community. But I say, equally as plainly, that the people of one day, in their sovereign capacity, can confer no power on a part of themselves that may involve that sovereignty, but what the people of another day may resume at pleasure, doing perfect justice at the same time to all concerned.

However, Mr. Chairman, I will endeavor to illustrate my observations in the way of a supposition or two. Gentlemen have supposed considerably during these debates, and I hope I will be permitted to do some little in the same way.

Suppose a man had indulged in chewing tobacco for some years, but, believing that it was injuring his constitution, abandoned it, and the palate should remonstrate against being deprived of the particular privilege it had enjoyed so long, and demand its continuance, what would the will say? "I know that some years ago, at your own importunity, I gratified you with a taste of tobacco, and have continued it ever since; but I perceive that, in doing so, I am disordering the stomach, and consequently doing injustice to my whole system, therefore I will indulge you no longer."

Or suppose the thing called a dandy should take it into its head to wear gilt-rimmed spectacles, fancying they would make it look more grave, and dignified, and consequential, but, after wearing them sometime, it discovered its mistake and threw them aside; whereupon the eyes would be dissatisfied, and demand a prolongation of what they now thought proper to term a privilege, what would the creature reply, if it could reason at all? Probably something like this: "No, no, my lads; I find, if I continue to wear spectacles, though it may please you, it will render my whole person ridiculous, and ultimately injure yourselves and weaken your powers of vision; therefore, in future, you must content yourselves with the enjoyment of equal rights with your fellow senses."

And, once more, suppose a man had been in the habit of drinking to excess for years stimulants of one or various kinds—hard cider itself sometimes, perhaps; but, during a sober interval, reflecting that he was destroying his constitution and ruining his affairs, and cruelly distressing his family, he should form a determination to gratify his depraved taste no longer, and the taste demanded a continuance of the practice as a right, a privilege that, through its own importunity, it had been inadvertently conceded it should enjoy for a long time—what would the man say and do? "This will not do any longer, my friend; we must reform; in justice to myself, I will resume my power, which you have attempted to usurp, and which is the same now that it was on the day I thoughtlessly placed a part of it at your disposal. These excesses produce such expansions and contractions in my brain, like over and under doses of bank notes in other quarters, and such painful oppressions and revulsions in my stomach, through which my being is sustained, that it will end in convulsions which will prostrate the whole fabric, including yourself, even unto dissolution. I have been deceived and misled, and my confidence abused, and I resume my power."

So it is, Mr. Chairman with the body politic—confer its powers upon a part, to be exercised independently, irresponsibly, and the machine, the whole system, becomes disordered and deranged; the favored, the privileged part is selfish—"feels power and forgets right"—in proportion to the power conferred upon it, it infringes upon and weakens the other parts. In a well-regulated machine, you cannot increase the power of one part without weakening the others. The power of the people, in their collective capacity, always the same, is the will of the man. The depraved, vitiated taste was near mastering the whole man; and charters, vested rights, and exclusive privileges, through the action of banks, have been near mastering the whole people. The struggle is going on yet, and it is, virtually, as much a struggle for liberty and independence as was that of the Revolution, with this difference, however, that the Revolutionary contest was an effort to release ourselves from the thraldom of a foreign power, (for Britain had become so to us, from her tyranny and oppression,) and acquire the power of free government, of governing ourselves; and the present contest is to release us from a thraldom caused by ourselves; it is for a resumption of the power which, although belonging to us as a whole, we unwisely and unjustly conferred upon a part, in the form of unrepealable bank charters. This is the nature of the present conflict, whether we shall govern ourselves as a whole people, associated together for that purpose, or by a part of ourselves—a delusive paper money association, affiliated with a power of the same character in a foreign country. This is the real issue—the vitally important question which we are about to decide—liberty or despotism.

These remarks, sir, involve this question, as they were intended to do; would the United States Bank, which, I think, Congress had not the power to charter, under the Constitution, or the State banks, have inflicted on the people the adverse circumstances they did, if they had known that they could not do it with impunity—might be abolished whenever the people found that they were no longer useful or abused the confidence reposed in them, or no longer answered the purposes for which they were chartered? Such is the question these remarks involve.

This, sir, may be called ultraism, or radicalism, or agrarianism, or any other ism, that the opponents of free government, who hold the doctrine that the people are not fit to be trusted with their own liberties, may please. But is it not truth? Is it not justice? If the people are not capable of governing themselves, what part of them is? There is the question. But I trust that the people will ponder upon these reflections that I have laid before their representatives for that purpose and decide the great, the vital question of their legitimate power being always "one and indivisible"—whether they shall govern themselves as a whole, or be governed by a part of themselves through corporations.

If those hallowed forms that adorn the walls of your rotundo could spring into life, and pass into this hall at this moment, what language would their great minds dictate? Thy reign is done, thou grovelling paper despot—'twas we who gave this people liberty.

There is one thing, sir, that surprises me greatly at present, and that is, to see the attempts and pretences that are made to make people believe that these are the worst times we have ever experienced, and that produce is to be so cheap that it will be for the asking, and wages so low that nobody will work, and that the Government has caused it all, although there is not a word of truth in the whole of it. Why, such stuff is an insult to the people's understandings, just as if they were fools, or had lost their memories and their senses. I will give you, sir, a few recollections upon these matters, for I have no time at present to recur to books and newspapers and hunt up reminiscences upon this subject, but if I were at home, I might recur to the recollections of my neighbors, and they could tell you what I will: I remember reading in Niles's Register and other papers that wheat in Ohio was as low as 25 to 20, and even 12½ cents a bushel, and corn 10 cents, and whiskey 15 cents a gallon, and flour, at one time, only $1 a barrel at Pittsburg, and that it required a bushel to a bushel and a half of wheat to buy a pound of coffee, and four or five for a pound of tea—this was about 1820 or 1821. And what caused this? bank expansions and contrtionacs, and panics and revulsions, and breakings and swindlings, and consequent robbings of the working man's hard earnings. I came into Ohio some dozen years ago, and I remember, in my own day, seeing corn at 25 to 18¾ cents, and wheat from 50 down as low in some instances as 37½ cents, if I recollect right, and oats as low as 15 to 12½ cents, and that in store goods too at from 25 to 60 per cent. profit. I remember, likewise, hearing frequently, after my arrival, that some time before, wheat was a drug at 31¼ to 25 cents a bushel; that the farmers would have to hawk it about from store to store to get it disposed of. Do these gentry, who now pretend to love the hardfisted working folks almost to adoration—although they are so widely apart in sympathies and pursuits—remember any of these matters and their causes? Well, if they don't or won't, we do; and we remember, too, that Martin Van Buren, whom Andrew Jackson sent minister to England for that purpose among others, made an arrangement, with little hesitation, for a participation in the trade to her West India colonies, that assisted to raise the price of breadstuffs in our west at once—a desideratum that the preceding Administration had attempted in vain. Yes sir, if the wireworkers who affect to love log cabins and hard cider so intensely cannot remember these matters, we can and do—let them bear this remark in mind. Yes, sir, only pass this bill, so that the public revenue, consisting of twenty-five millions of dollars, or whatever it may amount to, may be kept in circulation in honest hard gold and silver, that the workers may have it for every day use; and make the duties on foreign merchandise payable in cash down upon the nail, that the merchant and British agent may have no advantage over the farmer and manufacturer; and let the producers sell more and buy less; manufacture more and use more of their own fabrics, and less of foreign ones, and place banking within the entire control of the people, and then see if the West and the whole Union do not rise faster in prosperity, and virtue, and happiness.

I am sick, and tired, and disgusted, with these vile wretched attempts that are incessantly kept up to mislead the people; and I do say, to the people's Representatives on this floor, and to my constituents, and to the whole American people, and I say it fearlessly, that that man who wilfully misleads the people from their true and just interests, or deceives, or imposes upon them false doctrines—whether in the halls of Congress, or in the halls of the State Legislatures—in the county meeting or in township meeting—in public conversation or in private conversation—through the press or at the polls—or in any way whatsoever, in act word, or deed—it is a grave accusation, but it is a true one—that man is virtually guilty of treason against free government, against the liberties and happiness of mankind in the United States and all over the world; and not merely at present, but extends it to the future, by retarding the progress of free principles, the onward march of human rights, of truth, and justice—that man is the enemy of his fellowman, in the broadest sense of the word.

While the name of the true patriot, who loves and serves his country, will be cherished in the memories of posterity, that of the man who misleads the people will be precipitated down, down, down through the never-ending night of dark oblivion.

SPEECH OF MR. W. O. BUTLER,

OF KENTUCKY.

In the House of Representatives, June, 11, 1840—In Committee of the Whole, in reply to Mr. BIDDLE and Mr. HUNT, on the appropriation for surpressing hostilities in Florida.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: That I have not occupied this floor sooner, is an evidence of the reluctance I feel, in occupying it at all; a reluctance which is greaty increased from the reflection that the session is drawing to a close, and that I can hope to say nothing likely to compensate the country for the time I shall necessarily occupy. The consideration would certainly induce me to decline saying any thing on the present occasion, were I not satisfied, that the session is to end, as it began, in speechmaking.

Be this as it may, sir, I have now undergone what all will admit to be a reasonable novitiate in silence, and intend as brief a discussion of the Florida war question as I may find convenient. That this war is beginning to excite a deep, and a thrilling interest in the community, is not a matter of surprise; it has desolated our frontiers with a most unsparing hand for years; and although it in no degree threatens the general safety of the nation, it is but too well calculated to appeal to the sympathy of every heart not locked up against the voice of sorrow. It is moreover, sir, a war whose termination still lies hid, far in the dark inscrutable future. Like every other transaction of the times, this war has been seized on by the Opposition party, in and out of this House, for the purpose of being moulded into political capital. It has been roundly asserted, that its operations have been such, as to reflect indelible disgrace upon the Administration under which it has been carried on. As a friend and a supporter of that administration, have felt myself called upon to examine into the truth of this charge; and after having done so, I take it upon myself to say, in the presence of those who have made it, that it has no foundation in truth. I intend to re-examine it, in the presence of this committee, where the various laws, and most of the facts in relation to it, are within our reach; and where the touchstone of truth may be readily applied. I congratulate the country, sir, that this hour has at last arrived. I congratulate the Opposition, that they are no longer compelled to yelp and snap at the shadow of this war; that they may now do that, as a matter of right, which they have heretofore only attempted by way of stealth; and I now call upon them, one and all, to make good their charges; not not by round and bold assertion, but by proof and argument. It would have evinced much more confidence in the truth and justice of their charges, had they waited for this hour. It would have been much more creditable to themselves, and infinitely more just to all concerned, had they imitated the notable example of Tam O'Shanter's wife, and nursed their wrath until the present time. But I am aware that this Opposition never condescends to act upon any but high and prudential considerations; I, therefore, take it for granted that some such consideration must have influenced their course in relation to this war. I presume, sir, they found their patriot wrath too hot for nursing, and that they have been simply hoisting their safety-valves in advance, as the only means to prevent explosion. Certain it is, sir, that we have had many and most portentous sounds from their escape-pipes in this hall. I congratulate them that their long agony is now over, and that they may work off their surplus steam at their leisure, and in the natural way.

Before I proceed, however, to an examination into the operations of this war, permit me to reply to the gentlemen who have preceded me as to the alleged causes which induced it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. OGLE,] in his celebrated "clear the kitchen speech," told us that it was brought on by the infamous conduct of the Government in swindling these Indians out of their lands; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUNT] added to this, a charge in relation to the wife of Osceola, which is appropriately registered in the Abolition Almanac of the present year. I admit that these gentlemen are quite as near the truth as is usual in these party times; they are only one remove from it. It is not that these Indians have been cheated out of their lands by the Government (for I am well convinced a fairer treaty never was made with an Indian tride,) but it is to this charge, falsely made, and widely circulated, and particularly among those Indians themselves, that this war is to be attributed, more than to any other cause. Unfortunately for the honor, the peace, and the prosperity of the country, there is, and ever has been, a party among us (not a large one, I trust, sir,) who never yet was known to approve of any one act of their own Government; who never yet was found acting with their own country, either in peace or in war; the same party which held back the arms of our gallant fathers in the Revolutionary struggle; which hung a dead weight upon our eagle's wings in the last war; and which is how busy in sowing the seeds of disunion throughout the land. This party, sir, has made its appearance among us at different periods of our history, and in various guises, but ever in that guise best calculated to strike at the honor and security of the nation. For some time past it has been carrying on a most insidious warfare, alternately and conjointly under the red and black banner. It has taken under its holy keeping the red man of the wild, and the Southern slave, and has been inciting the one to rebellion, and both to war, by every means in its power. And yet so strange a thing is man, that the members of this same party meekly fold their arms and call upon the world to say whether they are not the true, nay the peculiar followers of the Prince of Peace. That there may be among them some blind, deluded zealots, who fondly dream they are engaged in the service of the Most High, while they are lighting the torch of civil discord in the land, and bathing it in blood, is barely possible; but that their leaders, and many of their rank and file, will, in the end, be found to be either the hired or the willing tools of foreign powers, striking at the integrity of this Union, I have many and strong reasons to apprehend. Crowned heads throughout the world begin to sit tremblingly on their thrones. The spirit of inquiry is abroad in every land; liberal principles are every where on the rapid march, and our free institutions afford the only light held out for their guidance! Put out that light, and liberty is lost to the world! The problem of man's capacity for self-government is fatally solved, and the feudal ages come back upon us with all their gloom and all their chains. It is not then strange that crowned heads should seize upon the only means in their power to remove the only obstacle in their way. America, true to herself, may laugh at the world in arms; to divide and conquer us is the only hope. And I repeat it, sir, this saintly brood of hypocrites, these exclusive friends of the red man and the black, but who would neither shed their blood nor spend their money for the salvation of both races, are, in my opinion, designed as the entering wedge for the rending asunder this great, this glorious, this holy confederacy; cemented together by all that is sacred in the past, by all that is worth living for in time to come.

As a further pretence for intermeddling with Indian affairs, it has been said that one of the chief purposes of the late Administration was the destruction of the Indian race; and we have been invoked by the orators, and the poets, and the papers of a party, both foreign and domestic, to unite with them in weeping over the fate of a once great and potent nation—now a feeble and oppressed tribe, cheated out of their lands, and driven from the graves of their fathers into bitter exile by the iron hand of tyranny. Notwithstanding they were encouraged to sell their lands, and to emigrate as the only means to save them from utter extermination: and, notwithstanding, while remaining among us, they are daily dipping their insatiate hands in the innocent blood of our women and our children: for them this party has no sympathy; it is treasured up for our enemies alone.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, when the gallant old man who was at the head of the late Administration saw Florida in flames, and the hearthstones of her peaceful and unoffending citizens drenched with their own blood, that he flew to their assistance, and saved them from destruction. Its is also true, that, in doing so, he shed much Indian blood; ay, sir, and shed it without remorse. But that his, or the policy of the Government, in purchasing the Indian lands, and removing them beyond the Mississippi, has a tendency, or was designed, to destroy them, is utterly untrue. I repeat it, sir, nothing else can save them from speedy extermination. All history, and tradition, and experience, attest the fact that these two races cannot live in close contiguity with each other; that the contact has still been fatal to the Indian race. True it is, sir, that portions of that race, like the strong man in the temple, have often brought a common ruin upon their own and the heads of all within their reach; but, as a nation, they have been compelled, with diminished numbers, to plunge deeper and deeper in their genial wild, leaving behind them smoking ruins and a bloody trail.

What, let me ask, sir, would be the fate of the Seminole tribe, in a few years, hemmed in, and pressed on all sides as it is, by a daily increasing white population? It would be that of a belted tree, putting forth its sickly leaves for a season, dropping its sapless branches, one by one, and speedily mingling with the dust. The reason is a most obvious one; our customs are at continual war with each other: the Indian lives by the chase—lives mainly on the forest game. The farms and fences of the white man circumscribe and limit the range of the deer and the elk, and the hum of civilization frightens them away. The Indian follows of his own accord, or is compelled by the whites, after having turned his idle arms upon those who have broken in upon his habits, without having changed his nature. Give him his native wild—the lofty mountain and the deep dark dell: the rushing river and the quiet lake; give him the rifle and the forest game; you give him all he requires—all he is capable of enjoying. You leave untouched and uncontaminated all that is worth preserving in his nature; and I acknowledge he has many fine and lofty traits of character. Take his weapons from his hand, and replace them with the plough and the hoe, and you make him a tame dispirited slave, or a bitter and an unrelenting enemy. If this be true, sir, was it not a wise and a humane policy, to give them a distant country of their own, where they may preserve and enjoy their own proper and peculiar customs, unchecked and uncontrolled by the warring usages of civilization? That the condition of those who have complied with their treaty stipulations, and removed beyond the Mississippi, is greatly improved, we are not only told by their own agents, but by the concurrent testimony of all who have visited them in their new homes. I have deemed it proper to say thus much in defence of the policy of the Government, and in refutation of the unjust and illiberal charges made against the late Administration. But I am well aware, sir, that the fate of the Indian has but little weight with those who are affecting to weep over it. It is used merely as a mask, to cloak another and a much more important measure—one which it is not quite prudent to proclaim on the house tops. They would be content to witness a war of extermination between the Indians and whites of the South, so it did not reach their borders, or touch their purses, provided it should prevent the settlement of Florida by slaveholders, and its formation into slave States. That, sir, is the key to the whole mystery. Florida, in its present condition, is too well suited to their purposes to be lost without a struggle, which costs them nothing, however much blood and misery it may cost others. Florida, in its present condition, is the fit, the natural, and the well-selected theatre for abolition operations; the only one on which it can ever hope even to commence its nefarious schemes; and the Florida war, its first, its natural, and its bitter fruit. Look at it, sir, surrounded on all sides by slaves and slaveholders, occupied by a savage tribe, easily excited to war, owning many slaves, and having among them many free negroes, in daily communication with those of the whites, at all times disposed to excite them to rebel against, and desert from their owners; and to secrete and protect them when they do so, of their own accord. Stretching far toward the Bahamas, and reaching almost to Jamaica, lately a slave State, and now a scene of manumitted misery—owned by a foreign and a rival power, united and affiliated with the Abolitionists in our own country—it is a most convenient spot for all the numerous agents of this society, to meet and complot in safety, against the peace and security of the American people. Do not imagine, sir, for a moment, that considerations of so vital a character as these have been overlooked or disregarded, by either the people of Florida or the Abolition party. That they are both thrillingly alive to their true condition, will be seen from an extract taken from the Antislavery Almanac of the present year. The article from which this extract is made is under the following appropriate head: "Will you admit Florida as a slave State?" After denouncing the Government and the war in the most reckless and unmeasured terms, and quoting from the Louisville Journal, in support of their charges, they proceed to give the reasons why the people of Florida desire the removal of the Indians.

"At a public meeting of the citizens of Tallahassee and vicinity, June 8, 1839, it was 'unanimously resolved, that the Seminole Indians and the inhabitants of Florida cannot maintain peace and live in the same country, and if any treaty shall be ratified, locating these Indians in Florida, it will be a paper treaty only.' They also resolved, 'That the peninsula of Florida is the last place in the limits of the United States where the Indians should be permitted to remain, for obvious reasons:' 1 and 2, 'They are accessible to our enemies, and would be guides to them in war;' 3, 'If located in Florida, all the runaway slaves will find refuge and protection with them;' 4, 'The contiguity of emancipated colored people of the West Indies, would, in a war with some foreign power, place Florida, and, in fact, the whole of our Southern States, in jeopardy.'"

What are those reasons? The people of Florida wished the removal of the Indians because their lives and their property were in imminent and constant danger from their contiguity; and these are adopted by the Abolitionists as insuperable objections against their removal. I confess, sir, they are of the most satisfactory and conclusive character. It is quite natural that the people of Florida should feel a deep solicitude in the preservation of their lives and their property. But the Abolitionists have decreed that they shall loose their slaves, even at the expense of life itself. I know there are some of that party who will recoil with much seeming horror at the very shadow of such a catastrophe. Yes, sir, there are men in the world who will coolly and quietly lay a train that they, and all others who pretend to think at all, must know will ignite of itself, or be fired by the hands of another, and who, when the thunder of the explosion bursts upon them, will exclaim against the wickedness of the deed, and thank Heaven that they at least were free from such a sin. This, sir, is the case with many. But there are others who have laid aside even this thin and flimsy robe of caution and hypocrisy, and who come out boldly, and in print, and tell us they have weighed the whole matter, and are prepared to carry out their vile schemes, even at the expense of the Union itself. Let every American read the following extract from their proceedings, and then let any man who prizes his character and standing as a patriot dare defend them:

"W. L. Garrison, from the Business Committee, reported a resolution declaring that, as Abolitionists, we are bound to carry out our principles, no matter at what expense to our sect or party, to the Constitution, or to the Union."

This paragraph wants no comment. I will not even say of its author, as the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] once said of a distinguished colleague, [Mr. WEBSTER,] who in debate said he would not vote for a certain war measure, then under consideration, even if the enemy were then thundering at the Capitol, "that he had but one more step to take, and that was to join the enemy." I will not do the author of that paragraph the injustice to doubt that he has already taken that important step.

No one, not even the Abolitionists themselves, can deny that the course openly pursued by that party has a direct tendency to excite discontent among both the Indians and the negroes. Have they not both had their supposed wrongs and oppressions depicted to them with all the force and fervor which ingenuity and falsehood united could command; and what other method could they have resorted to more likely to produce the results which have followed? Does any one doubt that such means, acting on such bodies of ignorant and illiterate men, even if no such evil was designed, could fail to excite both Indians and negroes to revenge; and is it not equally natural that two such classes of men, living in the same region and in habits of daily intercourse, should unite together for the purpose of effecting a common redress? That they did so unite before the commencement of the war, and have continued to act in perfect concert, I will now show you from the report of Major General Jesup, who was then engaged in the prosecution of the war; from page 10, I make the following extract:

"Having been apprized, by prisoners taken in the preceding campaign, of an arrangement entered into previous to the war, between the Indians and the slaves, that, so soon as hostilities should commence, the latter were to join them, and take up arms, I informed the Indians that all their negroes must be separated from them and sent out of the country."

Again, in a letter from Volusia, he says:

"This, you may be assured, is a negro, not an Indian war, and if it be not speedily put down, the South will feel the effects of it on their slave population before the end of the next season."—Ex. Doc. 78, 3d vol. 2d session, 25th Congress.

An intelligent gentleman, now in this city, long and still an inhabitant of Florida, in a note to me, says: "That the Indians were instigated to a violation of the treaty at Payne's landing by the negroes among them, there is no doubt." As a proof that the Abolitionists have been instigating them to this course, and that foreigners have been aiding them in it, the same gentleman says:

"During the course of the war, a communication existed, with boats, between the Bahamas, where some of the fugitive slaves had transported themselves for greater security; and a brig has been running, under the charge of a devoted patron of free negroes, from St. John's to St. Domingo."

That the people in Florida are alive to these facts will be seen from the following extract from the Floridian:

Extract of a letter from a gentleman in East Florida to his friend in New York.

"If you observe the papers you will see what is doing in Congress towards our admission as a State. We have two parties—one for and one against it. One is for a division, to form ultimately two States; the other, to come in whole immediately. In the present and prospective state of things, it is decidedly better to come in as one State; for, if the Abolitionists get the ascendency, we can never come in. The Union would be dissolved in the attempt, and dissolved it assuredly will be, if they increase; and, with their increase, persevere in the incendiary efforts we see them daily making to excite discontent and revolt among our slaves. The modes by which they essay to do this are, some of them, as base, and baser, than any thing else that can be named, excepting always, and forever, the cause they are engaged in. I could particularize these, but shall content myself with the one fact of their making instruments of negroes, who have (perhaps by the generosity of their former owners) been emancipated, and are suffered to remain amongst us. The intercourse with these free negroes is not difficult. By means of other free negroes occasionally touching at our ports, and finding ingress to our towns and cities; these are bribed to the work, and furnished with incendiary tracts, artfully contrived, for the furtherance of their hellish purposes."

The following extracts from their constitution will show their plan of operations. Among the means to be resorted to, are the following: "To open correspondence with the Abolitionists throughout the world, and encourage them in the prosecution of their objects." And again: "That our friends, both white and colored, in Canada, the West Indies, South America, and other countries, be affectionately invited to form auxiliary societies, and contribute to the funds of the society." Do you think, sir, all this brotherly love has been thrown away? No, sir, the Indians and the negroes have been appealed to, and they have gone to war; the islands have been invoked in the most fraternal terms, and the islands have lent their aid. What impression these facts may have upon others, I am not prepared to say. If any shall still doubt that the spirit of Abolition has been one of the causes which produced, and is now protracting, this war, I leave them to the enjoyment of that opinion; convinced, as I am, that time is maturing and multiplying facts that will force even the willing skeptic to become an unwilling believer.

I proceed, in the next place, sir, to an examination of the manner in which this war has been been conducted. I have before said that the Opposition in this House has charged the operations of the Florida war to be such as to reflect indelible disgrace upon the administration under which it has been carried on. But, strange to tell, no part of that foul attaint is to attach either to the generals who conducted the various campaigns, or to the soldiers who fought the different battles. It would not be quite politic, at this interesting conjuncture, to assail so numerous and so influential a body of men, that might rouse the honest indignation of their numerous friends, and of the country at large. That gentlemen have no intention of doing, and I acquit them from any such design. Had success crowned our arms, had victory perched on our standard, who would have worn the plucked laurels? By the united voice of the world, they would have graced the brows of our generals and their companions in arms. But, sir, victory and defeat are the very opposites of each other; and their effects should, of course, be of a corresponding character. Each new victory is but a fresh blast from the trumpet of the nation's fame; and, therefore, we join in the all hail to our friends who have won it. But, sir, it is most desirable and convenient to find a scape-goat for those same friends when overtaken by defeat and disaster; and if that scape-goat should chance to prove an enemy, or a political opponent, it is looked upon as a God-send, that, not to profit by, would be condemned by all as a species of political impiety.

Each year, Mr. Chairman, seems to demand a fresh victim. Last year the Secretary of the Treasury was singled out for party immolation. I need not tell you, sir, how signal a failure it proved; I need not remind you with what recoil that measure fell on the heads of those who attempted to use it. Where now, sir, is the mighty product of that mighty effort? where is that celebrated report which cost its authors so much labor and the nation so much money? I mean, sir, the Swartwout report. Last year it was the political text book of the Whig party, and was flourished from all the stumps and horse block in the country; where is it now, sir? it must have lost favor even with its friends; it has rarely been alluded to even in this House; it has scarcely raised a bubble or a ripple in this great boiling caldron into which every one is throwing his bitterest things:

"Liver of misbelieving Jew, Gall of goat, and sprigs of yew."

Sir, it has been solemnly tried and fairly condemned by the American people, and from their verdict there is no appeal. Unwarned by the past, another victim is bound to the horns of the political altar. The Secretary of War is singled out for the sacrifice. Sir, it requires no Chaldean knowledge of the stars to foretell his doom. A child might cast his horoscope. Mr. Chairman, it was said of yore that the holiness of the altar sanctified the offering—that was true of one altar only, the altar of the Most High. Some altars are so base in themselves as to desecrate all that touches them. Such, mainly, are the altars of man; peculiarly such, sir, are the party altars of this day. I much fear that no acceptable incense can ever rise from them. I much fear that when the smoke of the sacrifice is over and the fervor of the worshipper subsided, when conscience and posterity come to sit in honest judgment on our best acts, when the gilding and drapery are torn off, and our motives laid bare, that all which we are now offering under the specious and holy names of patriotism and country, will be found to be little more than sordid ministerings to party and to self. I had thought there was still left one common ground an which even the parties in this House might meet, and, for a time, lay down their weapons of party strife. I had thought that when our banner was on the breeze, and our eagle spreading his wings for the stoop, that one spirit, the spirit of our fathers, would be in every breast. Nor will I, even now, permit myself to doubt that were this a war of foreign aggression, or one calculated to rouse the spirit of the nation, by endangering its liberty, we would all prove true in the trial hour.

But the Florida war has been treated as a matter of trivial moment. A few naked and wandering savages are said to have sacked our borders and foiled our armies; and the Secretary of War is held responsible for all the blood and all the treasure that have been lavished on that war. I will not stop now, sir, to cast up the merchant part of this charge; I will not, when speaking of the blood of my countrymen, pause to weigh it against gold. This is a proper, but a separate subject for inquiry. Let it be made. Submit the accounts and expenditures of this war to a proper committee, and let us have a full examination; not an ex parte one, upon select items culled out for present use, and at the close of the session, when it is well known that no one has the time or the inclination to examine them. We are now examining the operations of the war; not the quartermasters' or the commissaries' accounts. Show me that the Secretary of War has been remiss or derelict in his duty; show me that he has betrayed or neglected the high trust committed to his keeping—that he has suffered the blood of Florida to flow when he had the power to close her wounds; and I will aid you in the infliction of any punishment you may dare to name—I will aid you in branding him with a stigma that shall resist the effacing fingers of time for ever. But, before we proceed to condemn or to punish him, let us understand distinctly the offences with which he is charged; and let him have a chance to defend himself, at least by his friend on this floor. This, however, sir, is no part of Whig tactics. They have an instinctive horror of every thing like specification; it has a tendency to cramp their genius and unfeather the wings of their imagination. Sweeping charges and bold and bitter denuciations are much more easily made, and much more difficult of detection; and, therefore, generally resorted to. But, sir, I feel myself prepared to meet gentlemen, even on their own ground, and to satisfy all, who do not wish to close their eyes against truth, that even these general charges cannot be true, and exist only in the fertile imagination of those by whom they have been made. Have gentlemen condescended to inquire into the duties of the Secretary of War; the means that have been placed at his disposal by Government, and the manner in which he has employed them? Have they examined into the character and number of the enemy we have been contending with? And above all, have they duly weighed the character of the climate, and the impracticable nature of the country which has been the theatre of this war? If they have, and know enough of the science of war, to appreciate and apply such information, then they are, in some degree, qualified to commence the delicate and difficult task of military criticism; then they are, in some degree at least, prepared to do justice to the Secretary of War, and to the unfortunate army who are throwing away their lives and reputations in that most unfortunate war. And let me tell you, sir, if you proceed to condemn the one or the other, without making these essential inquiries, you are but acting the part of common stabbers in the dark, and just as likely to kill the brave man as the coward; and let me also tell you that the eyes of the American people are upon you, a just and intelligent and a liberal people, one with whom success is not the only test of merit, and if there is a wretch on earth more contemptible in their eyes than all others, it is he who, not having courage to win laurels of his own, shall stretch forth his timid trembling hand to pilfer them from a brave man's brow.

What, then, are the legitimate and appropriate duties of the Secretary of War? and in what manner has he discharged those duties? His is a general superintendence over all that belongs to the science and the art of war; to see that the best and most appropriate means, whether of men or munitions, are furnished for carrying it on. Where it consists of many parts, and is waged in different regions, he is necessarily compelled to give a general outline of the whole, so as to insure the harmonious action of the different parts; but when the war is confined to a single, and that a wild and unexplored region, as Florida, all detail is necessarily left to the skill and discretion of the commanding general. On the selection of a general for such a service much depends, and for that selection the Secretary is properly responsible. In which of these important duties has the Secretary of War failed? and who, if any, is the delinquent Secretary? for there have been several Secretaries since the commencement of this disastrous war.

It is far from my intention to enter into a minute account of the Florida war; this would require more time and more labor than I am willing to bestow upon the subject at this time. My main object is to defend the Government from what I believe to be a most unjust and wanton attack. There may have been neglect, there may have been mismanagement, in many of the operations of this war. It would, indeed, be strange, sir, were it otherwise, when we consider the materials that have necessarily been employed in its prosecution. If the commanding generals have been properly furnished with men and munitions, they, and they alone, are responsible for the proper use of them. In making the inquiry which I propose, I shall necessarily be compelled to speak of the officers of the army, who have been engaged in this war; and, in doing so, I may find it necessary, in some degree, to compare their merits, or more properly, their fitness for this service. If so, it will not be to detract from them. That justice may be done to all, and injustice to none, it is essential to keep in view, not only the officers connected with the different periods of the war, but also the particular Administration then in power.

As General Clinch, who commanded the first, and General Scott the second campaign, have made accommon cause against the Government, I will first state their charge, and then proceed to meet it. In justice to these gentlemen, permit me, however, to say that the commencement of this war was well calculated to operate prejudicially on those who had charge of it. It was not until various generals and numerous forces had failed to bring it to an end, that we began to appreciate the many difficulties to be encountered, and the true causes of failure. That there was a general disappointment throughout the country, from the President down, when campaign after campaign ended without closing this war, is certain. The consequence was, that a court of inquiry was ordered to investigate the causes which prevented General Scott from ending the war. Instead of defending himself by assigning the true reasons, General Scott, in turn, attacked the Government. His interrogatory to Clinch, a witness on his trial, and the answer of Clinch, place the subject in a clear and distinct point of view; and I will beg leave to read them to the committee:

"Question by the Court. What were the causes, in your opinion, that prevented the subjection of the hostile Seminoles in the campaign conducted by Major General Scott in Florida, in 1836?

"Answer. In reply to that question, I am compelled to state that I am of the opinion that the failures of and the disasters attending the operations in Florida, were mainly to be attributed to the want of energy and military forecast in the late head of the War Department; and, in failing to order a larger force, and a greater quantity of military supplies, &c. into that country in 1835, and early in the year 1836. In illustration of this opinion, and to show, that the late Secretary of War was not entirely uninformed as to the state of things in Florida, I beg leave to submit to the court extracts from several letters addressed the adjutant general of the army by the officer then commanding in Florida. When, at last, the late honorable Secretary awoke from his dreams of political preferment, and turned his attention to bleeding and suffering Florida, it was too late, owing to the peculiar nature of the country, to effect a great deal before the hot and sickly months set in; hence, in a great measure, may be attributed the failure, as it has been termed, of the campaign conducted by Major General Scott in Florida.

"[The extracts alluded to in this answer were here read to the court, and accompany these proceedings, document No. 151,]"

Now, sir, here is a distinct charge, and of an important character. Let us examine into its truth. The witness, General Clinch, was the officer in command at the time of the alleged delinquency. That he was an intelligent and a meritorious officer, every way worthy of the high trust, none will deny. The Government relied upon him with implicit confidence as to what was proper and necessary to be done, and the force and other means requisite for the service. Was not this a just and proper reliance? Who was half so well qualified to give all the necessary information as General Clinch, who was immediately on the scene of action, and had special charge of the military operations in Florida? Certainly no one. I will now proceed to show you that all the requisitions of General Clinch were met, and more than met, by the War Department, as soon as they were made. If I do this, I shall feel satisfied that I have succeeded in warding from the Administration all pretence of censure, let it fall where it may. That the requisitions of General Clinch were so met, will manifestly appear from the Adjutant General's report, containing a summary of all the tranctions of that period between General Clinch and the War Department, from which I will read the following extract:

"In consequence of the state of affairs, as reported by the commanding officer of Fort King, on the 27th October, 1834, and the officer of the Commissary's department charged with duties connected with the removal of the Indians, and also on the report of the Indian agent, it was deemed necessary to increase the military force stationed in Florida. Accordingly, orders, dated November 24, were issued, directing three companies of artillery to take post at Fort Brooke, Tampa bay, and the company stationed at Fort Marion, St. Augustine, to join the garrison at Fort King, then consisting of one company of infantry. The same order assigned Brevet Brigadier General Clinch to the command of the troops in Florida, an officer of much experience, and being well acquainted with the Indian habits and character. He was also required to co-operate with the Indian agent in all proper measures relative to the contemplated removal of the Seminole Indians.

"On a requisition of General Clinch, received in February, 1835, for six additional companies to strengthen his command, four companies of artillery, under Brevet Lieutenant Colonel Fanning, of the 4th regiment, were, on the 14th of February, 1835, ordered from Fort Monroe to Fort King, with authority, at the same time, to draw in the company of infantry at Key West. The number of companies in Florida was now increased to ten; of which number six were concentrated at Fort King, three at Fort Brooke, as before stated, and one stationed at Key West.

"On the 12th of October, Lieutenant Harris, of the artillery, disbursing agent for the Seminoles, recommended that the force in Florida should be increased; but as no additional requisition for that purpose had been received from General Clinch, it was not considered proper to direct this measure. On the 15th of the month, the two companies of artillery stationed at Forts Morgan and Pickens, near Mobile and Pensacola, were placed under his orders.

"On the 21st of October, a letter, dated the 8th, was received from General Clinch, in which he suggested the propriety of being authorized to call into the service one hundred and fifty mounted volunteers, to aid in the removal of the Indians, and to suppress any difficulties which might occur. But as this force was required to aid in the removal of the Indians, and to prevent difficulties which were anticipated, and not to repress hostilities which had commenced, or which were then impending, General Clinch was informed, in answer, on the 22d October, that there was no appropriation authorizing the measure, and that the President, under existing circumstances, did not consider that the case came under the constitutional power to call into service an additional force for the defence of the country. But he was authorized to order two more companies, viz: those at Forts Wood and Pike, to join him, which, with the two companies placed at his disposal on the 5th of October, made four companies of regular troops, in lieu of the mounted men. On the 30th of the same month orders were given by the Navy Department to Commodore Dallas, to direct one of the vessels of the squadron to co-operate with General Clinch in his endeavors to effect the removal of the Seminoles.

"In a letter received on the 31st of October, General Clinch requested that three companies of regular troops might be added to his command. He was apprised, however, by previous orders, that four had already been placed at his disposal.

"In his communication from St. Augustine, dated 29th November, received on the 9th of December, General Clinch reported that, should he find it necessary for the protection of the frontier settlements, he would assume the responsibility of calling out at least one hundred mounted men, believing that the measure would be sanctioned by the President and Secretary of War. This approval was communicated to him on the same day; and, in addition to it, a letter was addressed to the Governor of Florida, requesting him to place at the disposal of General Clinch any militia force that officer might require. Of this, General Clinch was informed. He was also informed that, at the request of General Hernandez, orders would be given, through the Ordnance Department, to issue five hundred muskets and the necessary equipments to the militia."

A few comments on this report will place this matter in a light that none can fail to see and understand it. It is true that General Clinch required six companies in February, 1835, and that five only were then placed at his disposal. I will first explain the reason why this company was at that moment withheld, and then show that a change in our relations with the Seminoles rendered it unnecessary. It will be recollected that our regular army is but a small one; that we have an immense frontier to guard, and much public property requiring, at all times, to be protected; that we had a prospect of an immediate war with the Creek Indians, five times as numerous as the Seminoles; and, more than all these, we had strong reason to apprehend a war with France. Of course, it was both prudent and proper to hold what regular force we had in the best possible condition and at the most suitable points, to meet whatever contingencies might arise. These would have been sufficient reasons to justify the Government in sending the five, instead of the six, companies required by General Clinch, even had that number been necessary. But, sir, I will now proceed to prove to you that General Clinch had as many men as he wanted, and that he himself thought so. You will remark, in the extract from the Adjutant General's report, that the company stationed at Key West was one of those placed at the disposal of General Clinch on the 14th July, 1835, and this company was not called for until about nine months afterward; for it was one of the two companies under the command of Major Dade in the battle of the 28th of December, 1835, and then on the march to join the command of General Clinch for the first time. Now, sir, if it be true that the Government is justly chargeable with neglect in failing to supply General Clinch with an adequate force, how can that gentleman answer to the country for his failure to use even the force he had? But I will not, for a moment, leave him in so awkward a condition. He did not call for the Key West company because he had enough without it. A new treaty was made with the Indians, settling all pretence of difficulty and putting an end to all prospects of a war, on the 3d of April, 1835. It is in the following words:

"We, the undersigned, chiefs and sub-chiefs of the Seminole tribe of Indians, do hereby, for ourselves and for our people, voluntarily acknowledge the validity of the treaty between the United States and the Seminole nation of Indians, concluded at Payne's landing, on the Ocklawahau river, on the 9th day of May, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two; and the treaty between the United States and the Seminole nation of Indians, made and concluded at Fort Gibson, on the twenty-eighth day March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, by Montfort Stokes, Henry L. Ellsworth, and John H. Schermerhorn, commissioners on the part of the United States, and the delegates of the said Seminole nation of Indians, on the part of the said nation; and we, the said chiefs and sub-chiefs, do, for ourselves and our people, freely and fully assent to the above recited articles in all their provisions. Done in council at the Seminole agency, this twenty-third day of April, eighteen hundred and thirty-five."

Now, sir, had the war commenced previous to this treaty, and could it be shown that the failure to furnish one company that Gen. Clinch had required operated prejudicially on that war, I will own, to that extent, the Government might have been censurable, but for the fact that it was thought the toops were more wanted in other places. General Clinch and his friends choose to forget this treaty, and still recur to his first demand for troops, although the necessity for complying with that demand had been destroyed by the formation of the treaty. If war was expected previously, no war came, and no injury whatever ensued. Let us, then, take a fresh start from the date of this treaty, and see why it is that the Government was not prepared to prosecute this war when it actually came, which was on the 28th of December, 1835. Simply, sir, because the Indians, to all appearance, were preparing to emigrate peaceably, and there was no apprehension of a war. General Call, the then Governor of Florida, in a letter to Secretary Cass, says: "This war came with the suddenness of light." There were but two occurrences from April, the date of the treaty, until the middle of November, to create the slightest apprehension of such an event. In June there was a quarrel between some four or five whites and about as many Indians, which resulted in the death of one of the Indians and the wounding of three of the whites. The Indian were promptly surrendered by the tribe, and dismissed by the civil authorities. On the 11th of August, Private Dalton was killed by the Indians, in relation to which I make the following extract from General Clinch's letter of the 12th of August:

"The causes of this murder are stated to have been a determination, on the part of the Indians, to revenge the death of a relation of theirs who was killed in a rencontre between the whites and Indians, which I reported to the General in-Chief in my letter of the 30th June last. The Indians now say that, having accomplished their purposes of revenge by the murder of a white man, they are now satisfied."

No intimation is here given that there is the least danger of a war up to this time. On the 3d of the same month Lieutenant Harris, the disbursing agent, in a letter to Adjutant General Jones, says: "The present prospects for emigrating are promising." It will be seen, from an examination of the Adjutant General's report, above referred to, that, from the time of the treaty, in April, until the commencement of the war, in December, General Clinch had more force placed at his disposal than he required, by one company of regulars and five hundred Florida militia. How, then, can either General Clinch or General Scott say that the Secretary of War was in fault for not having provided more efficiently for the war before its commencement? Had General Scott been in command all the time, instead of General Clinch, would he have been better prepared? How would he have made preparation? By making requisitions for men and means, as a matter of course. Why, then, if they were necessary, did not General Clinch demand them? I leave these gentlemen to settle this delicate matter between them as they may find it most convenient, and turn my attention to General Scott, and to an examination of the course pursued by the Government in relation to him and his command in Florida. General Scott was in the city of Washington when the report of Clinch's and Dade's battles reached there, which was between the 16th and 20th of February, 1836. On the first intelligence General Eustace, then in Charleston, South Carolina, was ordered to join General Clinch with reinforcements; but information soon after arrived which induced the belief that a junction between the Creeks and Seminoles was contemplated, and that it might become necessary to call into the service such a number of militia as would amount to a major general's command, in which event the command would have devolved on him, as General Clinch is only a general by brevet. It was, therefore, deemed proper to order General Scott to assume the command, not that any fault had been found with General Clinch. On the contrary, all that had been done by him at that time was much to his credit; and, as I have shown, it was the intention of the Government to have retained him in command after his battle until the second report, of which I have before spoken, reached Washington. Neither General Clinch, nor any other officer in the service, had a right to take umbrage at being placed under the command of General Scott under such circumstances.

To show that General Scott had unlimited control as to the proper means for carrying on this war, I will read the following extract from the order placing him in command of the Florida army, dated on the 21st January, 1836:

"It is impracticable here to prescribe the amount of force which ought to be carried into the fields; that must depend upon the actual circumstances which you may find existing when you reach the scene of operations. It is, of course, desirable that no unnecessary force should be employed, as the expense may thereby be greatly increased; still I would not have hesitate for a moment in calling out such a number of the militia as will enable you, with promptitude and certainty, to put an immediate termination to these difficulties. The horrors of such a warfare are too great to run any risk in its immediate termination. The subject is, therefore, committed entirely to your own discretion."

If he employed too few or too many troops, that fault was his, and not the fault of the Government. The following extract from this order will also show that he was equally unlimited in other means necessary for carrying on the war:

"Whatever expenditures may be rendered necessary you will be pleased to direct, and the proper staff officers under your command will be furnished with such funds as may be required to meet them."

If there was either waste or want in his army, that fault was his own. His attention is particularly directed to the waste common in such armies as his, and he is exhorted to the strictest economy, as will appear from the following extract from the same general order, placing him in command:

"I have also to request that you will give the necessary orders for the preservation and accountability of public property. There is upon these occasions, too often, so great a waste, particularly where a militia force is brought into the field, that great circumspection should be used."

I have been thus particular in giving the orders of General Scott because they were substantially continued to all his successors, and because Gen. Scott is the hero of the Whig party in this House; and, in order to sustain him, it has been deemed proper to assail not only the Government and the Secretary of War, but many others of the best and most meritorious officers in the service. And yet, sir, when the opposition in this House will take the pains to inquire minutely into the Florida operations, I feel confident that none of them will lose by a comparison with those of General Scott, either in ability or economy, the want of which is charged upon all others.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUNT] has said that General Scott was ordered into the Florida service that he might be killed out of the way of a political rival. I will not degrade the country by answering such a charge, but turn that gentleman over to his own constituents. He has also said that the service was, in itself, too small a matter to give employment to so distinguished a general; and that a militia major, with five hundred men, ought to close the war in a month. I will only say, in reply to the latter part of the statement, that Major General Scott, with five thousand men such as the gentleman from New York, would not close it in five years, and General Scott will not thank the gentleman from New York for placing him in so false a position; for it will be seen from the official report that General Scott, who, I have shown, had unlimited control of men and measures to carry on this war, had actually in the field 4,763 men, after leaving a sufficiency to garrison his various posts, and this number is, no doubt, largely over an average of the forces employed during the war. One word as to the indignity said to be offered to General Scott by placing him on so petty a service. Whenever a general has become too dignified to serve his country in open war of any kind, particularly when it is the only war then going on, it would seem to me that the country had but little farther use for his services; and I feel assured that General Scott will not thank the gentleman from New York for placing him in this position. I am certain he would never assume such a one for himself. Having answered the gentleman from New York thus far, I will proceed with the reasons assigned by General Scott, in his defence before the court of inquiry, why he failed to end the Seminole war in 1836, so far only as those reasons are calculated to operate unjustly on the Government and upon his brother officers. I will take occasion to say, that I have no doubt that General Scott did all in his power to end the war, and so the court of inquiry expressly found. Whether he pursued the best measures to achieve that end, is a matter on which there is a great diversity of opinion.

The second cause is, "the unexpected intrusion of General Gaines." This was not an act of the Government, and was, no doubt, induced, on the part of General Gaines, by the most patriotic feeling. His movement was made soon after the defeat of Major Dade, and when much consternation and alarm prevailed throughout the South; for it was strongly apprehended that the Creeks would unite with the Seminoles, and that the war would become a general one. It is known to this committee that General Gaines entered the Indian country with about one thousand Louisiana volunteers and regulars; that he found the great body of the Indians on the Withlacoochie; had several skirmishes with them; fortified his camp, and sent an express on the 28th, and another on the 29th of February, with letters directed to General Clinch, or the officer commanding at Fort Drane, informing him that his camp was surrounded by about 1,500 Indians, and asking a reinforcement and provisions, saying, at the same time, that he would make no sortie or attack on the Indians until he received an answer; and expressing an opinion that a combined operation might close this war. General Clinch forwarded this letter to General Scott, then at Picolata, where it reached on the 1st day of March at daylight. I will extract a single sentence from his reply to Clinch, which will show the spirit in which he received it:

"Even if you had sufficient stores on hand, and means of transportation, I should, under the circumstances, command you to send no subsistence to him, unless to prevent starvation; but you have neither. Let him, therefore, in time, extricate himself from the embrrassment he has placed himself in, by marching upon Volusia, where, I have no reason to doubt, that twenty thousand rations, sent there on the 27th ultimo, have safely arrived. As he appears to have a retreat open to him, or is in no peril to prevent his taking that step, you will, of course, make no detachment or move to join him."

Clinch, however, disobeyed the order, and joined Gaines on the 6th of March, with about five hundred men and provisions. He found the Indians still there, and in the act of making a treaty, which was broken up by his firing on them. Why did not General Scott send all the forces he could collect to the aid of General Gaines? is an inquiry often made; and there has been much speculation as to what would have been the result of such a co-operation. The reply of Scott, above referred to, gives us some reason to fear that the private griefs of these gentlemen have been permitted to mingle with their public duties. It is a matter of much regret that these gallant men, who won their laurels and shed their blood on the same battlefield, should have been, for the last fifteen years, at a continual war, growing out of a question of rank, which was finally settled by Mr. Adams, somewhat in the style which the lion settled the dispute among the beasts, not by taking the command of the army himself, to which they both aspired, but by giving it to General Macomb. It may be true that General Gaines, in some degree, interfered with the plan on which General Scott intended to prosecute his campaign; or even that he defeated that plan. If so, it was twice defeated; for it certainly defeated itself, when General Scott attempted to carry it into execution. What was that famous plan, to which its author adhered with such pertinacity? It was to operate on a base line of about one hundred and thirty miles in length, terminating at Tampa Bay and Fort Drane, and to advance into an unexplored and distant Indian country, and, withal, the most difficult in the world, in three heavy columns, from those two points and Volusia; and relying for success on the mutual co-operation of these columns. The consequence was, that after a ten days' march in the swamps and hammocks, they all returned to Tampa Bay, without ever having seen each other, although it is said that some of the columns heard the cannon of others. No doubt the Indians did the same thing, and moved off accordingly. To dismiss this subject, so far as General Gaines is connected with it, I will only add the opinion of Clinch, who was a witness before the court of inquiry, and who says, in speaking of the troops of Gaines:

"I thought, myself, that the addition of those troops strengthened the column I commanded very much; but I believe the troop composing the right wing, independent of that number, could have performed the rout they did. It was rendered stronger than was originally the intention of General Scott. I, myself, think they were an acquisition, as they were experienced regulars, and gallant and efficient volunteers from Louisiana."

Although many think General Scott would have ended the war by a prompt and hearty co-operation with General Gaines; and although I regret extremely he did not attempt it, yet I feel bound to say, that I think it by no means probable; for every subsequent attempt to bring these Indians to a general battle, proves that they will fight only when it suits them, and that is when it does not suit us; when they choose to retire, they cannot be overtaken.

General Scott assigns several other reasons for the failure of his campaign, which I will briefly notice, as they are calculated to affect the Administration, as well as the military character of General Jackson. One is, that his orders were imperative "to reduce the enemy to unconditional submission." And this the General construes to mean, "to hold no parley, no negotiation; not even to say, as the price of surrender, that kind treatment might be expected," &c. The above extract from General Scott's defence goes to prove the excited state of his mind at the time; for no man in his sober senses could ever construe such an order to mean that a conquered enemy, or one offering to surrender, should not receive kind treatment. That he did not so act upon it, is manifest from the fact that almost the only time he ever had a glimpse of the Indians, he sent them a white flag, inviting a parley; and the Indians promised to meet him the next morning, but bad dreams, or some other cause, prevented them; for in the morning they were all missing. In fact, sir, had I not been told otherwise, I should have thought that the main object of all the display of his three great columns, and their thundering and drumming, was, in part, designed to convince the Indians that resistance would be folly, and they had better surreader at once. But General Scott assigns as a reason why he kept his army so long in large masses, that General Jackson "never detached against Indians," and gives some cramped expression of his, as proven by Colonel Lindsay, on which to establish it as an iron rule of General Jackson's, never to detach in an Indian country, (which is certainly not correct,) and then says: "the court will please bear in mind the official relation that subsisted in January, 1836, between Gen. Jackson, Col. Lindsay, and myself." If we are to understand from this that he considered himself bound to follow a supposed rule of Gen. Jackson's, because he was his official superior, I will only say that the same relation existed between them after a ten days' campaign, when he admits that he began to detach freely. This same official relation certainly existed on the 21 of April, only seven days after General Scott commenced his campaign, when he detached Major Cooper, the gentleman at my right, with 340 men, to locate himself in the heart of the Indian country, for what purpose it is hard to say, unless it was to prove to the world that a Georgia major, with such a force, could hold in check an enemy which had compelled General Gaines to fortify and ask for help. And this, sir, he did in most gallant style for the space of 14 days, when he also was relieved by General Clinch, who seems to have been a kind of general helper on all such occasions. The only other reason assigned by General Scott why he did not conquer the Indians, on which I shall comment, is this, "insufficiency of hard bread and bacon." He admits, however, that he had a full supply of flour and pork. I think my friend from Louisiana [Judge CHINN] could tell us of an army, under the command of General Winchester, in the last war, who, for a space near twice as long as General Scott's whole campaign, had no bread of any kind, and not flour enough to thicken their soup; and when their soup was made, it had not a greasy spot upon it. General Scott's campaign ended in the spring of 1836, without achieving any thing of moment. Although I am inclined to think he is not well calculated for Indian fighting, yet I do not doubt, in the slightest degree, that he is in every way worthy of the high character he possesses as a soldier and a commander. I only regret that his, and the course of his friends in relation to other officers, certainly his equal in every point of view, has compelled me to say much more of General Scott than I could otherwise permit myself to do. There is, however, one important transaction in his campaign that I would like to hear his friends explain; and that is, why he left the Withlacoochie, where he found part, and where it is now certain the great body of the Indians then were, with his own column of 1,963 men and eight days' rations without having examined one-fourth part of the cove in which they have been found on so many occasions? It is certain he left Fort Drane on the 26th of March, with 18 rations, and arrived at Tampa, on his return, on the 10th of April.

General Call succeeded to the command of the Florida army some time in July, 1836. He is the only commander of that army whose previous services and standing at the time of his appointment did not, in the estimation of the community, fully entitle him to the office; and yet, he had probably been in as many battles as any one of them, and seen as much service as most of them. He was with General Jackson in the Indian war of 1812, with him at Pensacola in 1814, at New Orleans in 1815, and the Seminole campaign of 1818; and he had resided nearly 20 years in Florida, and knew more of the Indians and the country than almost any man in it. But it is said he was also with General Clinch in the battle of the Withlacoochie on the 31st December, 1835, in command of the Florida militia; and, from the general report of that battle, it is strongly insinuated that both he and his Floridians lost credit, if they had any to lose. That is all true. The only question is, whether that report is true. I have never seen the official report of that battle made to the commander-in-chief by General Clinch, and have purposely avoided saying any thing in relation to the battle itself, that I might present, in a single view, what I had to say of General Call. The following extract from the report of General Macomb, furnishes the charge made against General Call and the Florida troops:

"On the 29th of December, General Clinch, with six companies of regular troops, amounting to about two hundred men, proceeded from Fort King toward the Withlacoochie, to attack the Seminoles, who were in force on the left bank of that river. In this expedition he was joined by Governor Call, with between four hundred and five hundred volunteers of Florida.

"On the 31st of December, General Clinch, with the regular troops under his command, crossed the Withlacoochie. He was here attacked by a large body of Indians, and, after a spirited engagement, the Indians were finally defeated, and fled into the hammocks. In this affair, it will appear that the regular troops bore the brunt of the action. Out of the two hundred troops who crossed the river with General Clinch, fifty-seven were killed or wounded, including four officers. Of the four or five hundred volunteers who had joined General Clinch with a view of aiding in subduing the Indians, only twenty-seven men and three officers took part in the action. Why so many remained out of the action, is not explained. Had the same zeal and bravery been displayed by the whole force as was evinced by the regular troops, there is little doubt but that the war would have been terminated with the battle of the Withlacoochie."

General Call, in a letter to General Macomb, gives the most conclusive reasons why so few of the Florida troops were engaged. I will read the following extract from that letter:

"On our arrival, the army was suddenly brought to a halt; and we were greatly surprised at finding a deep and rapid river, presenting a most formidable impediment to our farther advance into the country, instead of a fordable stream over which we might pass with scarce any delay, which the information of our guides had led us to expect. On the opposite side an Indian canoe was discovered, and was brought across by two men who swam over for it. The regulars immediately commenced crossing; and, although they only amounted to about two hundred and sixty, it was nearly noon before they had effected the passage. In the meantime, the volunteers had been engaged in driving over their horses; and a raft of green poles had been constructed, on which some of the saddles were carried over; but it was so heavy, and sunk so deep in the water, that it was of but very little service. So soon as the regulars were over, the volunteers commenced crossing in the canoe, which, under the best management, would carry only from five to seven persons, two of whom were generally found necessary to carry the boat back again; and it required bailing every trip, to prevent it filling with water. It is to be remembered that the volunteers had to take their saddles and saddlebags with them in the canoe: and therefore could not cross with the same rapidity as the regulars, who marched in with their knapsacks on their backs. When the action commenced, not more than thirty or forty of the volunteers had crossed the river, of whom a large number were officers. Some of them had swam over; and being unable to carry their guns with them, were in a defenceless situation until supplied from the opposite side. They marched boldly into the fight, and behaved with as much intrepidity as any men on that field. They formed a line extending from the river bank nearly to the left flank of the regulars; and it was owing to their position, and the gallantry with which they fought, that the regulars were not surrounded and cut off by the enemy. During the fight, the volunteers continued to cross as fast as possible, and join in the action. Many attempted to swim the river, but, in every instance, I believe it was found impossible to cross in that manner without getting their arms wet, and their ammunition destroyed. At one time I ordered the whole force to mount and charge the river; but it was found impracticable, from the cause just mentioned, and the order was countermanded. Some swam nearly over, carrying their guns above the water; but, from exhaustion, were compelled to drop them."

On the reception of General Call's letter, from which the above extract is made, General Macomb returned the following letter:

"HEAD QUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Washington, Aug. 21, 1837.

"SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 3d instant, on the subject of that part of my annual report made to the Secretary of War last year, which gives an account of the operations of the army in Florida against the Seminoles, especially in reference to the affair of the Withlacoochie; in which report, you think that injustice has been done to the Florida volunteers then under your command.

"The report to which you allude was based on the official information which had been received by me; and had I been furnished with so detailed a statement of the affair of the 31st December, 1835, with the explanations, as that which you now present in the communication above referred to, it would have afforded me the greatest satisfaction to have reiterated the praise you bestow on the Florida volunteers who followed you on that occasion to the banks of the Withlacoochie. It was far from any intention on my part to do injustice to the patriotic volunteers who so promptly rallied under your standard on the signal of danger; but, as before observed, I had no means of stating why they did not cross the river at the moment of the attack on the regulars, who were in position on its opposite bank. I will cause your communication to be put on file in the Adjutant General's office, and besides, with this letter, give it publicity through the public prints, that the world may, by means of your statement, be made more fully acquainted with the part the Florida volunteers took in the battle of the Withlacoochie.

"With respectful considerations,

"I am, sir, your most obedient servant,
"ALEX. MACOMB,
"Major General, commanding in chief.

"To his Excellency, R. K. CALL, Governor of Florida."

Why is it that General Clinch, in his original report, failed to give an explanation so essential to the reputation of a brother soldier? And why is it that he has permitted the letter of General Call, and the answer of General Macomb, to be spread before the world for the last three years, without notice?

It gives me much pleasure, Mr. Chairman, to say that the battle of the 31st of December, 1836, fought mainly by the command of General Clinch, was one of much gallantry, and that the commanding general, on that occasion, plucked the only laurels that have ever been won in Florida, as far as the reputation of a soldier depends upon the plaudits of the world. I am only at a loss to know why he has failed to do justice to a man quite as brave as himself—yes, sir, as brave as any man.

Mr. Chairman, the delicate attitude in which the conduct of General Call is left by the different reports made of this battle, induces me to relate an anecdote of that gentleman, which, I think, will convince every one that he never intentionally kept out of a battle when duty required him to be in it. In the night fight at New Orleans, on the 28th of December, 1814, there were some moments of confusion, and great peril. At one time, it was ascertained that some of our friends were firing on the rear of the 44th regiment, to which Call (then a lieutenant) belonged; at the same moment, a report prevailed that General Coffee, who had gone on in advance, was firing on its front. Sir, it was one of those moments which leaves a burning spot upon the memory for ever—one in which all that brave men can do, is to perish without a struggle. At this momentous crisis, Lieutenant Call sprang from the ranks, and advanced in the face of a heavy fire, until he saw, by the flash of their own guns, the uniform of the British soldiers, which enabled the 44th, by forcing the front, to get clear of the fire in the rear. Sir, I repeat it, that man never shunned a battle. Of all the generals who have commanded in Florida, there is no one who has more just cause of complaint than General Call, and yet I know that no wrong was intended him.

Some time about the 10th of October, he commenced his march to the Indian country, with about thirteen hundred men, most of them from Tennessee; and General Jackson then President, believed that army could and would conquer all the Indians in the country. General Call was in high spirits, and thought to close the war in a short time, as all others have thought who have been in command there, both before and since; but like all others, he was disappointed. This same Withlacoochie again rolled its dark, deep waters between him and the foe; and after a skirmish across it, he was compelled to return to Fort Drane, after going to a point at which he had previously arranged for the establishing of a depot of provisions, but which had failed by the sinking of a steamboat at the mouth of the Withlacoochie. The report of this campaign reached General Jackson in a most unfavorable form, and he at once superseded General Call in the command. In the meantime, General Call returned, and fought three battles, in all of which he acquitted himself much to his credit, and to the satisfaction of the President. In his different operations in Florida, his army killed fifty-six Indians.

The treatment received by General Call shows conclusively that General Jackson did not, in the slightest degree, permit his feelings to interfere with his duty, for there were few men in the world he prized higher than General Call; and finally justice was done him.

I will conclude what I have to say of General Call by reading an extract of a letter to the War Department from General Jesup, by whom he was superseded:

"As an act of justice to Governor Call, I take occasion to say (and I stake my professional reputation on the correctness of the remark) that no man could, under the circumstances in which he was placed, have done more than he has done. He had the summer, it is said in the public prints, to prepare for a winter campaign; but he could not establish posts without force to defend them; and it is to be observed that he entered upon his command under circumstances of embarrassment, which did not exist when the campaign of last year commenced. He found the country exhausted, and not only all the positions occupied during the campaign abandoned, but the whole country, from the Suwannee to the Atlantic, except Tampay Bay and St. Augustine, occupied by the enemy. His plan of the campaign was admirable; but there were circumstances which he could not control, that prevented its execution."

General Jesup assumed the command in Florida about the 4th of December, 1836. Exceptions have been taken by the gentlemen who have preceded me as to the manner in which he got into this command; this is a matter purely personal to himself and General Scott, in which I do not intend to intermeddle; the only important matter for this committee to know is how he acquitted himself when the command was given to him. If we compare his success with that of others, there can be but one opinion on this point.

He was actively employed from the time he took the command, until he was relieved in July, 1838; and during that time he scoured the whole country from the Appalachicola to Cape Sable, embracing nearly six degrees of latitude. In his various campaigns, he captured and killed about twenty-four hundred Indians and negroes, computing those who surrendered voluntarily; in which number were embraced about six hundred warriors. His success was at least five times as great as all the other generals' together, who have figured in this war; and that he acquitted himself to the entire satisfaction of the Government, if not the nation, will be perceived by the letter of the Secretary of War, which I will now read to the committee:

"DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 7, 1838.

"SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 6th instant, containing a summary account of your operations in Florida. The Department is aware of the obstacles to your complete success, presented by the face of the country, the nature of the climate, and the character of the enemy, and fully appreciates your untiring efforts to carry out all its views, and to remove the Seminoles to their new homes in the West. You have accomplished all that could be expected, under peculiar and difficult circumstances in which you were placed, from a zealous, active, and energetic officer; and, in withdrawing you from Florida, the Department was actuated by no want of confidence in your zeal or ability to carry on the war to a successful issue, but from a belief that you might now return to the performance of the appropriate duties of your Department, without injury to the public service.

"Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

"J. R. POINSETT.

"Major General THOMAS S. JESUP, Washington City."

Under such circumstances, it was but reasonable to hope that, on his return to his family, he might, after all his toils and dangers, have been permitted to rest in quiet. He did not ask for fame in this war; he expected none. He had, in more fortunate fields, and in better days of the Republic, won reputation enough to satisfy the ambition of a moderate man—a reputation that those who are now trying to grind him into the earth, are bound to acknowledge, even through their gnashing teeth.

Like General Gaines, he had the misfortune to derange one of General Scott's splendid plans of an Indian campaign. True, he succeeded in seizing the Indians, and preventing a war with the Creek nation, but not on a scientific plan; and that has called down the heavy vengeance of General Scott's friends on this floor. I regret this attack particularly, because it is made by a gentleman whose virtues and talents I hold in high esteem. I mean the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BIDDLE;) but no consideration of this character shall prevent me from doing justice to a countryman and a friend. I will, however, attempt to do it with all the decorum which the circumstances of the case will permit. I regret that I did not hear many things that the gentleman said in his address to this committee. There were, however, several distinct charges of a highly dishonorable character, to which I call the attention of the committee; and the first is, that, in the capture and detention of the celebrated chief Osceola, General Jesup disgraced our flag, and violated a law held sacred by the whole world, civilized and savage; and he read a most chaste and beautiful extract from a letter of General Jesup himself, to prove how eloquently even the perpetrator of so foul a deed could speak of the offence itself. I regret that I have not the extract before me; I would use it for a very different purpose; it would go far to prove that he who could utter such a sentiment, in such a way, could never be guilty of the infamy of the deed which he depicted. But to the truth of the charge. The circumstances of the case, as far as I can understand them, seem to be these: Osceola was one of the chiefs who had signed the treaty in April, 1835, confirming the treaty of Payne's Landing, and the treaty at Fort Gibson, being the treaties by which the Seminoles agreed to exchange their lands and emigrate beyond the Mississippi. In violation of these treaties, he commenced the war in December of that year, by killing Charley Amathla, and forcing away Micanopy, the chief of the tribe, both of whom were friendly, and disposed to emigrate.

In relation to the violation of the flag, I condense the following statement from the report of General Jesup, called for by a resolution of the Senate, many of the important facts of which I have heard from General Call and others. While at Fort King, he was informed that some of the Indians wished to come in and hold a treaty with him. He informed them distinctly that he had no power to treat; that they had agreed to emigrate, and must go; that if they wished to come in for that purpose, to use a white flag, which would secure them while in the act of coming in. From the Indians by whom this communication was made, he then learned that Osceola was hostile to the emigration. The Indians began to come in accordingly, and, among the rest, Osceola; but, before the arrival of Osceola, however, General Jesup received the following information, on which he placed implicit reliance, and which was strengthened by the information he had before received, that Osceola was unfriendly. I give his own words:

"On the 20th, John Cavallo, a sub chief, a hostage who had violated his parole in May of last year, came into St. Augustine with a message from Powell and Coe Hajo, stating that they had encamped near the fort, and desired to see General Hernandez. Several negroes came in on the same day; from them I learned that the Indians had but a short time previous killed a white man; that they did not intend to leave the country; that they were desirous of obtaining powder and clothing; and, as some of the negroes expressed it, they had 'come for no good;' and that, when they set out for St. Augustine, a party of Miccasukeys and Tallahassees had started from their camps for the Alachua frontier, to steal horses and drive off cattle."

If this information was true, will any gentleman say that General Jesup was wrong in seizing a man who had brought on the war in the first instance by murder and deception, and in direct violation of a treaty signed by himself, merely because he covered his intended treachery by a flag allowed to him for the sole purpose of protecting him while in the act of coming in? Suppose he had reached the fort unmolested, and for the purpose of emigrating, what would have been the result? If I am correctly informed, the Indians were all, while in the act of preparing for emigration, supplied with rations, and so guarded as to prevent their returning to the woods. So he would have been substantially a prisoner the moment he reached the fort, if he had not been arrested on the way; but, in addition to this, General Jesup justified himself on the following grounds. He says:

"The Indians, by their chiefs, had surrendered to me by capitulation at Fort Dade, in March, 1837; and, in addition, Powell had, in May of that year, gone in to Lieutenant Colonel Harney, at Fort Mellon, and had received subsistence to take his band to Tampa Bay. Coe Hajo had received subsistence for his band for the same purpose. The former, in violation of his plighted faith, not only failed to go in himself, but prevented Coe Hajo, by force and threats, from fulfilling his engagement which he was attempting faithfully to do. He also attempted to kill Yoholo-Hajo, an unarmed herald or messenger, whom, in a period of peace, I had sent to communicate with Coe-Hajo and Nocose Yoholo.

"As I had informed the chiefs at Fort King that I would hold no communication with the Seminoles unless they should determine to emigrate; as I had permitted no Indian to come in for any other purpose but to remain; as they were all prisoners of war, or hostages, who had violated their parole; as many of them had violated the truce entered into at Fort King, by occupying the country east of the St. John, by allowing predatory parties to go to the frontier, and by killing at least one white man; and, as the white flag had been allowed for no other purpose than to enable them to communicate and come in without danger of attack from our parties, it became my duty to secure them on being satisfied of the fact that they intended to return to their fastnesses. I accordingly required General Hernandez to seize them, and take them to St. Augustine; but, notwithstanding their character as prisoners and hostages who had violated their parole, and who, according to the laws of war, as recognised by civilized nations, had forfeited their lives, I directed that they should be treated with very kindness, and have every accommodation consistent with their security."

Now, sir, place this transaction on the worst footing that the circumstances will properly authorize, and what does it amount to? that in his zeal to serve his country in a matter involving the lives of many, and the peace of the nation, he has been possibly mistaken as to what his duty really required of him; for can any one believe for a moment that such a man as General Jesup would risk his fair fame in a transaction where he could gain nothing, had a doubt rested on his mind as to the propriety of the act? No, sir, he has done too much to elevate the flag of this nation in war, ever to tarnish it in peace or war. Again: the same gentleman has, in one of General Jesup's letters, found something in praise of the regular army, and not very complimentary to the militia—a thing quite common with most of the officers of the army who have seen much service, and, after uniting these facts, he has come to the strange conclusion that General Jesup has been guilty of protracting the Florida war, for the purpose of rendering a regular army necessary. I hope, sir, this is not designed to eke out Mr. Poinsett's army bill; I am certain it was not intended as an addition to that of General Harrison, although they are but twin brothers.

If all the other officers of the Florida army had succeeded half as well in advancing that war as General Jesup did in protracting it, the war would long since have ended.

I think the gentleman, however, got somewhat ashamed of this charge, as he concluded by saying he did not assert that it was true; he only thought it might be inferred from the facts. One word more as to what General Jesup said in dispraise of the militia. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania has read all his letters in the volume that he used before this committee, he will find this remarkable fact, that he (General Jesup) was so much more the favorite of these same militia than General Scott, that he became the mediator between them and that general, after he had so abused them as to destroy his usefulness as the commander of the Florida army, which was mainly composed of militia.

The same gentleman has found another letter of General Jesup's, in which he spoke of the "huckstering policy of certain members of Congress." That the people will say many worse things of us than that, when we get home, I have no doubt. But the officers of the army and the people are different persons, and moreover there is a law of the land, we are told, which makes it a high offence in an officer of the army, to speak in terms disrespectful of Congress. That is true, sir, and that consideration should have restrained the gentleman when he was pouring out the hot vials of his wrath, for the third time, on the naked head of one who cannot retaliate without a breach of law.

I regret extremely that I have been compelled to say as much on so unpleasant a subject; but as the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was mainly an attack upon General Jesup, I could not say less.

Gen. Taylor succeeded Gen. Jesup in the command, and as I have heard no complaint against him, I presume there is none. Fortunately for himself, sir, he is a Whig, and fortunately for the country, he is a soldier of the highest order; and if age has not tamed him too much, he is an officer well calculated for the service in which he has been engaged. He is now relieved from the service, and I understand that the army under his command has killed about one hundred and fifty Indians, during his many and arduous campaigns. Such, in part, sir, have been the results of the war in Florida, and yet it is not ended; and now I ask emphatically whose is the fault? Not the Government's, for I repeat it, the best means of the country have been lavished on it; nor do I believe there has been either neglect or cowardice on the part of the army. True, they have won but few victories, which deserve the name, and still fewer laurels; but does this prove that they have not at all times performed all their duties promptly and to the best of their ability. It is not in the battle alone that the soldier is tried. Many a bold heart that has beat more proudly at each successive blast of the trumpet, has faltered and failed on the weary march. Toil and sickness, and cold and hunger, watching with the stars and rising and marching with the sun, threading brakes, and wading swamps day after day and month after month, where nothing but dishonor is to be expected, better prove a soldier's worth than twenty battles, for they demand and call out his highest virtues, his fortitude and his patriotism. Still I hear a party in this House again and again exclaim, "You have all the means of this Government in your hands; and we demand of you why this war is not ended." Take back three-fourths of the means that have been constantly employed, and produce the foe, and, my word for it, the war will be ended in an hour; but, sir, unless the enemy can be found, how idle is your command to conquer him; you had as well bid your army smooth down the ruffled mane of the deep, or bind the restless wings of the wind, or pluck a star from the coronal of night, as conquer a foe that they cannot find. Can you do it, gentlemen? But that I fear Florida might want protection in the mean time, I should like to see this war committed to your charge. I should like to see you, and all such as you, wading and toiling through the Florida swamps, just long enough to teach you that patriotism and numbers cannot always command success.

I should like particularly well, sir, to see my little friend from Indiana, who has doggerelized this war in such fine style, returning safely from a six months' campaign, with his cheek a little embrowned with toil, and his head a little better filled with discretion and experience, and then hear him give his account of a Florida campaign. Not, sir, from his chamber window, nor in dishabille at night, but in true old soldier style, in a tavern hall, with his knapsack throwe off and a bottle before him. I think he would then be much better qualified to give us an account of the "remains of the Florida war." I think he would then tell us that hundreds have fallen in open battle; that many more have sunk under the accumulated weight of sickness and fatigue; that many have returned wearing the sallow of disease upon their cheeks, and the quickened seeds of death within their hearts, and that thousands yet remain to follow in their footsteps to be overtaken by their fate. I think, sir, he would not a second time break an idle jest at the expense of that ill fated army, between the very ribs of death. I say to all who believe this war can be ended with ease, go and learn your folly, and quit swaggering about it. If you can end it, and fail to do so, I tell you to your beards, you have not one drop of patriot blood in your veins.

I proceed, in the next place, sir, to examine the Senate bill for the armed occupation of Florida, as the one designed for the permanent defence of the country; and the only one, in my opinion, which will end this war. But, before I proceed to examine its provisions, I will say a word or two as to the plan of those who pppose it. Among them are many for whose opinions I have the highest respect; and at their head I place General Taylor. It is said his plan is to cover the country with troops, and thereby put an end to this war at once. This is easily said, but difficult to be done. The Indian territory, as I understand it, contains about 45,000 square miles; and about one third of it is composed of almost impervious hammocks, swamps, and everglades, and interspersed with many ponds and lakes. How, sir, is such a country to be covered with troops? And how are the Indians to be dislodged from it, or conquered in it? Send an army with a man to every square mile; let it pass over every acre of ground; and still, from the character of the country, each acre may contain a dozen lurking savages; for I am told there are many places into which no human eye can pierce ten feet. A large army will always announce its own advance; and never move or halt, but under the keen eye of an Indian scout, who, in a few hours after nightfall, will convey intelligence of its movements farther than such an army has travelled in the preceding day, or can travel in the next. Such an army, acting as such, never will find an Indian, unless he wishes to be found; and, should it chance to stumble on him, it will be only to see and lose sight of him. If he is pursued, it will be a contest between a blood horse and a terrapin. But the plan, of course, will be to divide this army into small bodies. Subdivide it a hundred fold; beat and explore a hundred of these brakes and hammocks at once; and, still, there are a thousand others, where the Indian may conceal himself with equal safety. While you are beating the bushes in one, he is in quiet possession of the next, or picking up your stragglers in the rear; and, when your search is completed, and you have abandoned it, he, as a matter of course, takes quiet possession. Moreover, sir, such an army, thus divided, and in such a country, could not be provisioned. The Indians know this fact, and they also know that no sensible nation will long keep such an army in vain pursuit; and their plan will, of course, be, what it ever has been, to hide and dodge from swamp to swamp until our troops, worn down with disease and fatigue, and hopeless of success, shall have been withdrawn from the field. Then, sir, they will return to their old haunts, to commence their work of murder and devastation anew. It is useless, however, to predicate opposition to this bill on such premises as these. Neither party in this House is prepared to vote for an army of one-fourth the size of that of which I have spoken, nor is General Taylor to be understood as recommending such a one. It was both natural and proper, while he was in the command of the Florida army, that he should want as many troops as he could use with any hope of success. But, sir, if those Indians have resolved to defend the country to the last, as I am induced to believe they have, and the country contains within itself the spontaneous means of support that I am informed it does, I feel well convinced in my own mind that the ordinary course and means of war will be found unavailing to end it in any reasonable time.

How, then, I am asked, is it to be closed, or is it never to be ended? Yes, sir, I trust it is, but not in a day. It is to be the work of time, and to be performed by the hands of a peculiar race of men: a race once common in the West, but one which, from the disuse of the rifle, and long habits of peace, is now nearly extinct—a race, sir, familiar with the unwritten science of Indian warfare, with frames capable of enduring its hardships and privations, and courage to turn it against the savage in his own domain.

In order to do this, he must become a tenant of that domain, and grow familiar with all its minute localities. What is the object of the bill now under consideration? It is designed to hold out inducements to the boldest spirits of the land, to occupy that country which is the theatre of the war, and to commence this necessary training. At the very threshold we are met with the usual objection of the times, that it will be a prodigal waste of public money. In matters of this kind, sir, I confess that I am by no means a rigid economist. I would defend the country at any price; nay, sir, bankrupt posterity for a hundred years to come, to save the lives of our citizens; it is the best use of a nation's wealth, and a tax that the people are proud to pay, although some of those who represent them may slander them by doubting it.

But, sir, I deny that it will be an extravagant plan; my only fear is, that the inducements held out to settlers will prove insufficient; if in the end, however, they should turn out to be ample, with me it will never be a source of regret; for, in my estimation, there is no man half so well entitled to a full and fair portion of the public domain, as he who has perilled his life in its conquest or defence. If one-half of the number contemplated by this bill, can be induced to settle within the limits and on the conditions proposed, I shall have no apprehension of its complete success, and, if they do not, why nothing will be lost. It has been urged against the bill, that the settlers, when there, are required to do nothing, and are to be fed for one year in the bargain. Unless the feeding of our army has been greatly improved since I was in the habit of drawing rations, I fear it will prove a very slight temptation to lure men from the haunts of civilization, and induce them to become residents of the wilderness, where they have nothing to expect but hardship and danger. None will go but men of courage and enterprise, and the idea that such men will remain idle, with arms in their hands, and the foe within their reach, is a reflection upon the character of the country refuted by every leaf and line of its history. It must also be borne in mind, that the settler is to derive no kind of advantage from his settlement until the war is ended; and if he is to be acted on by interest alone, that alone will prompt him to lend all his energies to bring it to a close. But, sir, had they no interest at stake, place such a body of men in such a situation, with arms in their hands, and let one cry of murder reach their ears, and I defy you to keep them from the contest. You had as well tell me that the passengers in a sinking ship would not lend their aid to keep it above the waves, because they were not part of the regular crew.

Gentlemen who have argued this question in the other House, and some who have argued in advance here, have been brushing up their classic lore, and the experience of distant countries and past ages has been invoked to our aid. We have been pointed to the wars of the Pontine marshes, of the Scythians, and the Maroons, as affording lights and guides. This, sir, is a severe satire on the age and the country in which we live. There is, unfortunately, a proneness but too prevalent among us to slight and underrate whatever is properly and peculiarly American, and to give a fictitious value to every thing that may be had for picking up beyond the seas, and not worth even that trouble. We have had a century of Indian wars of our own, and, to me, there is nothing half so much like an Indian war as a war with Indians. To close up such a volume of experience, and to grope our way into the dark ages, and search among the missile wars of other countries for examples to conduct a rifle-war with the American Indians of this day, is to turn our backs upon the full blaze of the tropic sun, and crawl into Symmes's polar world in search of light.

But, sir, it is urged that this a most peculiar war; that all former wars have had an end, but this bids fair to be eternal. It is certainly true that all our former wars have had an end, but it is equally true that many of them were even longer than this, and none ever carried on in such a country; and it is also true that they were all waged at a most prodigal waste of blood, and ended mainly by the very means proposed in this bill—by sending the rifle and the plough together. True, sir, many a strong hand that held that plough fell nerveless from its task, and the fresh furrow was often filled with the warm blood of him who made it; but still the work went on; more rifles came to guard, and more fortunate hands to hold it. How was Kentucky settled? How was the savage conquered in the entire West? By the very means proposed in this bill—by holding out inducements to the actual settler. True, sir, Virginia gave no lands to the first settlers in Kentucky, but she sold them so low as to make it tantamount to a gift; and the rich lands of Kentucky were of themselves inducement enough to enlist the enterprise of the older States in rescuing such a land from the savage marauder. But let us inquire for a moment into the particular manner in which this country was settled. Kentucky was first approached by the route of the Cumberland gap, and the first settlements made at Boonesborough and Howardsburg. Block-houses and slight stockades were immediately erected, sufficient to afford temporary cover and protection to the differeni families of the emigrants; as new settlers came, they were increased in size and number, and so located as to afford mutual assistance and protection and they soon extended, in a circular line, from Maysville to Louisville, leaving the Ohio between these two points, and all the country north of this line an entire wilderness, and the theatre of a bloody strife.

Beyond this cordon of stations an Indian was rarely known to venture, and still more rarely suffered to return. This chain was daily drawn closer, and the theatre of war lessened, as new block-houses were advanced into the contested field. The Indians, in the end, were fairly crowded out, and the whole country occupied. Upon establishing one of those posts, the first thing to be done was to clear and plant the ground in the immediate vicinity of the station, and to extend those clearings as fast as prudence would permit. In the mean time, the silent scout commenced his reconnoissance, and the adjacent country was explored. The young and active followed in his footsteps, venturing daily, deeper, and deeper in the woods. As their knowledge of the country and their skill with the rifle increased, confidence in themselves and the spirit of enterprise grew upon them; and, and, no longer content with the security of the block-house, they learned to mark his foot prints, and trace the Indian to his secret lair. The savage soon began to feel that he had an equal in the white, and found him a superior in the end. The war that ensued was mainly one of small parties, often a combat of single individuals, and of course calling out all the courage, skill, and prowess, of the combatants, and giving to after times many a wild and bloody legend, where, though truth may be often lost in ficiton, fiction will as often fall short of truth.

Occasionally these stations were surrounded by large parties of Indians, and the settlers cut off from the woods, their chief means of subsistence. Relief, or speedy famine, was then the inevitable fate of all within. And how was that relief to come? One only way, sir. That deadly living circle must be passed! That wily foe must be outwiled. And often, in the middle of the night, with no eye upon him but the eye of God, and perhaps the keen eye of the foe, the hunter dressed him in his Indian garb, and stole forth silent as the spirit of the hour. Sometimes he failed; and his story lives in the traditions of the times. Often, the very boldness of the attempt insured its success, and daylight found him threading the vast and gloomy woods alone. Would, sir, I could draw you a picture of this man; for in doing so, I would but give you a portrait of my own countrymen, at the period of which I am speaking. I would paint him out to you in the gray mist of the dawn, when he has paused to make his first reconnoissance, with his trusty rifle in his hand, and standing by a tree not larger than himself, still doubtful of his fate, and yet prepared to meet whatever may betide. Every nerve and every muscle braced, all his senses roused, and waiting on his judgment and his will; his keen and practised eye roving quickly, not hurriedly, around, and often resting on the route he had come, to see if any dared follow on his track, and saying, in language stronger that words, it was a dangerous way for any single man to tread. Such men as these are not to be found in every land, and no where but with much and severe discipline. From such the Indian soon turned away, but was not permitted to depart alone; his footprint in the dew was the signal for pursuit, and he who had been hunting others, had now in turn to run for life. Do not imagine they intended to catch him. There was then no reward for catching Indian warriors with loaded rifles in their hands. The world had not yet become so Christianized as to think it wrong to kill in battle or pursuit, one whose hands were reeking with Christian blood of every age and sex. Nor was it thought either humane or politic to throw away the lives of our bold backwood soldiery, in vain attempts to capture an Indian warrior, whose education and religion united in teaching him to die with his weapons in his hands, and not with fetters on his arms—one who, even when wounded, and all hopes of escape at an end, would send his last bullet to the heart of any who would offer him life on condition of surrender; and die in the proud belief that such an act would place him at the head of his warrior tribe in another world, where he might commence his trade of death anew. In those days of primitive simplicity, it was thought no disgrace to kill an Indian enemy; it was even thought an act of merit. Had a dog, sir, even a bloodhound, killed an Indian in those simple days, I do not think he would have been hung for it. I am certain he would not while Scott and Shelby held the pardoning power. Indian fighters then ranked among the patriots of the land, for that land had none but patriots in it. Those days must come back again, sir, or the Indians will thrash you with their ramrods. Your soldiers never will fight your battles with spirit or success while you treat them as murderers, and pay them but half the hire of slaves. A soldier is never rewarded for his perils and privations but by the full measure of his country's gratitude. I am most forcibly reminded, sir, how these same gallant men, of whom I have been speaking, have been rewarded by their country. They were mainly instrumental in conquering that large and rich national domain of which we hear so much in this hall, as a thousand nameless graves scattered through Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois, and the battle fields of Wayne, and Harmer, and St. Clair, attest. The survivors asked to be placed on the same footing of the Revolutionary soldiers, and they were told on this floor, that these early wars in the West were mere private affairs. In one sense they were, for we had but little help to fight them. They were, however, just such wars as that now going on in Florida; just such as we are likely to have about the pine logs in Maine, and just such as was our late war with Great Britain. That was a war for "free trade and sailor's rights." Kentucky had no ships upon the sea, no sailors chained in dungeons on the deep; but that every sail struck by the hand of violence was a national disgrace, and every sailor's plaint thrilled through the whole American heart, she might have folded her arms in safety, and let the tide roll on; it would not have stained her borders; hers was no longer a scathed and a red frontier. What was her course? Her sons were found wherever your eagle dared fly. They were not restrained by lines of States or the nation, while thousands, for whose violated rights that war was waged, were tamely looking on, or plotting treason with the foe. But I feel that I am wandering from the subject under consideration, and that I have already occupied this committee too long.

A very few words as to the Senate bill which has been reported to this House for raising three battalions for the immediate protection of Florida. This bill does not propose to increase the regular army, which is now deficient near or quite four thousand in number; it is designed to make up this deficiency by recruiting men especially for the Florida service, and, in consequence of the unusual severity of that service, it is proposed to give the recruits a bounty in lands. I see no possible objection to the bill, and deem some such bill indispensable; for, as much as I think of the armed occupation bill, I know it will not answer alone. Florida demands, and must have, certain and immediate relief.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that I may have omitted much that would contribute to sustain the different positions I have assumed; and I also feel that I may have said some things that I perhaps had as well have left unsaid. If I have said any thing that is calculated to wound any one on this floor, I shall regret it extremely. For, although I cannot but look upon the Opposition as pursuing the most ruinous and reckless course that ever marred a nation's hopes, yet, I have not found it necessary to impute to any member on this floor impure or improper motives; I am willing to attribute much of that which I cannot but condemn, to the excitement and phrensy of the times; and from that excitement I plead no exemption. I would, however, sir, most unwillingly add to the bitterness of such a contest; one over which every patriot of every party must mourn; and one which, I trust, is even now fast hurrying to its climax. In this I may be deceived. I know that I am a sanguine man, and much disposed to look on the sunniest side of even the darkest things; yet, amid all the wild and threatening elements which I see thickening around me, I look with undiminished confidence to the future—a confidence based on the wisdom, the patriotism, and the firmness of the people. Politicans may warp and passion and prejudice mislead them for a time, but, having no reason to do wrong, they will, in the end, do right.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot permit myself to sit down without returning my grateful and heartfelt thanks to this committee and to every member of it, for their courtesy and attention—a courtesy and attention dear at all times and to all, but peculiarly so to one who is making a first speech in Congress.

SPEECH OF MR. GALBRAITH,

OF PENNSYLVANIA.

In the House of Representatives, June 12, 1840—In Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, on the bill from the Senate entitled, "A bill to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue."

Mr. GALBRAITH addressed the committee in substance as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Although desirous, as I confess, of giving my reasons at length for the vote I intend to give in favor of the bill under consideration, and consequently against the motion pending to strike out its enacting clause; yet, admonished by the advanced period in the session to which we have arrived, and the amount of important public business yet to be considered and passed upon, I shall abridge the remarks I had intended presenting, as much as the importance of the questions involved will justify. This bill is regarded on all sides as involving great national principles, and affecting, to some extent, the interests and the financial affairs of this vast country; and is therefore entitled to full discussion and consideration. It has been attacked with great ability and ardor by its opposers; and I feel called upon and willing to share a portion of the responsibility, however humble, of sustaining it before the country.

For the purpose of condensing and simplifying, as much as possible, the views I have taken of the subject, crude and imperfect as they may be, I shall consider it under the following heads of inquiry, viz:

1st. The origin of the measure, and what circumstances gave rise to its recommendation by the Executive, in his message to Congress, in September, 1837, at its special session, and continued in his annual messages since.

2d. What the bill is, and what are its provisions.

3d. What it is not.

4th. The objections raised and urged against it, including any substitute, or other plan proposed of securing the objects contemplated by it.

5th. The means employed to defeat its adoption.

I propose, sir, in pursuance of this division, to consider in the first place, the origin of the measure, and the circumstances under which it was suggested by the President to Congress.

I had not supposed it necessary, in considering this branch of the subject, to travel further back than the period at which the measure was first recommended by the Executive, and the state of our national affairs at that time, with the existing circumstances. A gentleman from New York [Mr. MARVIN] opposed to the bill, had sought to trace in the late administration of President Jackson, in what he chose to call the war upon the United States Bank, the creation of new banks, and urging and advising them to extend their issues, and increasing the debts of the country, the causes which led to the necessity for a change in relation to the depositories of the public money. I shall reserve a reply to the charge thus made against that administration, until I come to consider another branch of the subject in the order proposed; and pass on for the present, according to the course marked out, as before indicated.

By the act of Congress of the 23d June, 1836, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to select and employ as the depositories of the money of the United States, the State, District, and Territorial banks, under the regulations prescribed by law. The surplus, over five millions in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1837, was directed by the same law to be deposited with the States; one fourth on the 1st Janury, 1837, and one fourth quarter yearly afterwards. In pursuance of this latter provision, the portions of the surplus revenue directed to be deposited with the States on the 1st of January, April, and July, amounting to upwards of $28,000,000, had been so deposited. By the 5th section of that act, it is provided "that no bank shall be selected or continued as a place of deposite of the public money, which shall not redeem its notes and bills on demand in specie," &c. In May, 1837, the State, District, and Territorial banks, generally, and almost simultaneously, suspended specie payments; after which, the State banks could not be selected or continued as depositories, but in positive violation of the act of Congress. The United States Bank had expired as a national institution on the 4th of March, 1836, by the limitation of the act of Congress of the 10th of April, 1816, by which it was authorized and chartered. Under these circumstances, the President of the United States felt it his duty to convene Congress in a special session in September, 1837, to whom he communicated, as the Constitution required, a full statement of the facts connected with the depositories of the public money, and recommended to the consideration of Congress, the plan of disconnection of the revenues of the Government entirely from the affairs or dealings of banks of issue, and the safekeeping of them by the agents and officers of the Government secured upon individual responsibility—the measure proposed in detail in the bill now under consideration. It is somewhat surprising that such a proposition, under such circumstances, should have been made the foundation for violent and bitter denunciation and party warfare, without the proposition of any other mode by which the inconvenience and embarrassment resulting to the country and the Government from such a disaster as had occurred, could be better avoided. Patriotism and a pure desire for the public welfare and the happiness and prosperity of the country, it was fair to expect, would have prompted an anxiety to suggest some mode of relieving from the existing embarrassments, either by way of amendment of that recommended by the President, pointing out its defects, or a substitute which should effect the purpose and objects of the Government better; but instead of this, instead of meeting in the spirit of candor, the suggestion submitted, it was made the subject of party clamor and sweeping denunciation in the partisan papers, and by political orators, from one end of the country to the other, not stopping even at the grossest misrepresentation of the character and effects of the measure, and without even exhibiting or publishing to their readers or hearers that were its provisions. It was denounced in no measured terms as the "odious Sub-Treasury scheme," by every village politician of the Opposition, without stating, and often without even knowing himself, what it was. I have no recollection of ever having seen a newspaper of the Opposition, sufficiently candid to publish the bill itself. What was your Executive to do under the circumstance? What could he do? The United States Bank had expired by its own limitation by law, and the people by their representatives elected in reference to that very subject, had solemnly declared that it "ought not to be rechartered," the justice and policy of which sentence, I shall consider hereafter. The State banks had, by their own voluntary act of suspension of specie payments, rendered it illegal, and in direct violation of the act of Congress, which authorized their selection, to continue them as the depositories. The deposite with the States, although in form a deposite, was regarded, by a large portion of the people, and intended by most of those who had advocated its policy, as a distribution, a gift, that would never be recalled; and to entrust the mere custody of money wanted for national purposes, with them, under such views, would be absurd and disastrous. I repeat the question then, what was your Executive to do? He recommended the policy of prescribing by law the selection and appointment of agents and officers, subject to such sureties, restrictions, and penalties as Congress might consider necessary for the security of the deposite, and faithful performance of the trust. In accordance with the principles of this recommendation, the bill has been prepared with its details—is now before us as the Representatives of the people, for our deliberation, not as partisans, but as statesmen; and this brings me to consider,

Secondly. What is the bill, and what are its provisions?

It is entitle "a bill to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer and disbursement of the public revenue," and its provisions throughout fully meet and correspond with its title. The four first sections establish the Treasury and give it locality; to wit: the Treasury Building at Washington, the Mint at Philadelphia, the Branch Mint at New Orleans, the Custom-House at New York and Boston, and offices or buildings to be provided at Charleston, in South Carolina, and at St. Louis, Missouri, and constitutes the Treasurer of the United States, the Treasurer of the Mint and Branch Mint, depositaries; and the fifth section provides for the appointment of four receivers, general at the other four places designated. The sixth section requires all collectors and receivers of public money to keep it safely without loaning or using in any way. The seventh and eighth sections provide for bonds and additional security. The ninth, tenth and eleventh prescribe the mode of transfer and other matters of detail. The twelfth and thirteenth sections provide for examination and inspection of the books to be kept by the collectors and receivers. The fourteenth, fifteenth and sixteenth sections are matters of detail, providing for withdrawing balances, and requiring marshals and attorneys to pay over money in their hands, &c. The seventeenth section requires each receiver and collector to keep an account of the kind of money received, to be subject to the examinations and inspections prescribed in the twelfth and thirteenth, and thus affording, by the combination of the two provisions, a valuable check upon the collectors, receivers and depositories, and makes the loan or use in any way of the public money prohibited in the sixth section a felony, to be punished by imprisonment not less than two nor more than five years; thus furnishing a security in addition to the individual bonds and sureties provided for in the seventh and eighth sections, of the strongest possible character. The nineteenth section, commonly called the specie clause, requires one fourth of the revenue to be collected and paid in specie after the last of June, 1840; one half after the last of June, 1841; three-fourths after the last of June, 1842; and the whole after the last of June, 1843; thus gradually requiring the whole revenue to be collected in the legal currency as established by the Constitution. The twentieth section requires all disbursing officers to pay out to the creditors of the United States, embracing soldiers, sailors, pensioners and workmen, &c. the same as received, and in case of violation of that or the preceding section, to be reported to the President and removed, and also to Congress; imposing another powerful guard to the faithful discharge of duty. The twenty-first and twenty-second sections are matters of detail, securing the disbursement of the same funds as received, and preserving uniformity in the collection and disbursement of the different branches of revenue. The twenty-third section provides for regulations so as to require immediate presentation of drafts, to avoid their circulation as money. The four succeeding sections are matters of detail in relation to salaries, expenses, &c. and the twenty-eighth and last section repeals former acts, and parts of acts, conflicting with the provisions of this bill. This, sir, is a faithful summary of the bill before us; and I have been thus minute in detailing its provisions, because I well know the unceasing efforts that have been made to conceal and misrepresent them. The only material change proposed in our financial system by this bill, is in relation to the safekeeping of the public money, those provisions relating to the collection, transfer and disbursement, proposing no more than a recognition by law of the practice which has uniformly obtained since the organization of the Government, adapted to the change in the custody of the revenues. It has been put forth by the opponents of the measure, that its friends claimed for it the merit of an immediate relief bill—that it would immediately produce an increase of money and relieve the alleged distress throughout the country. This is put forth, no doubt, for the purpose of claiming credit for prophesy of disappointment, when it shall be found that even after its passage, every broken speculator is not restored to luxury and his squandered fortune, and every imprudent debtor is not at once released from his indebtedness. No such merit is claimed for it by its friends. They claim nothing more for it than what appears upon its face and indicated by its title, and the incidental salutary effect upon the circulating medium, which it is calculated gradually to produce. The measure is clearly and undoubtedly constitutional—it is simple and unentangled with multiplied forms and complicated machinery: places the safekeeping of the public money on the same basis as its collection and disbursement, and indeed every other operation and transaction of the Government, upon the principle of individual responsibility, in the same manner as in our State and county treasuries; and indeed that of every municipality known to our institutions, excepting the single instance of the United States Treasury under the act of 10th April, 1816, and that of the 23d June, 1836, and agreeably to the first legislation of Congress under the Constitution, and its early adopted practice—in accordance with the law and practice of almost every other country in Europe and in the world. The first act of Congress on the subject of the collection of duties, &c. under the Constitution, was that of the 31st July, 1789, and in its 30th section required that they should be "received in gold and silver coin only," &c. and indicated no other depositories than individuals. The act of 25th February, 1791, incorporating the first United States Bank, made its bills or notes payable on demand in gold and silver coin, receivable in all payments to the United States, but did not constitute it a depository. It was only by the practice of the Treasury Department that it was made so, at the discretion of the head of that Department. No other than individual depositories were created by law until the incorporation of the late United States Bank by the act of 10th April, 1816, by the sixteenth section of which, the deposites were to be made in that bank, subject, however, to a different direction by the Secretary of the Treasury. Why should a different description or character of agents be employed for the safekeeping of the public money, than for its collection or any other branch of the public service? I apprehend no good reason can be assigned. By the provision of the nineteenth section of the bill, a gradual demand for specie will be created, by which the currency will be improved and purified by moderate and regular gradations, and extravagant and irregular emissions of bank paper checked and corrected, and excessive importations of foreign fabrics to some extent restrained, and our own manufactures encouraged and promoted. So far as it shall operate upon the currency, its operation will be a wholesome one, purifying and rendering it better, instead of inflating and depreciating its value. These are some of the incidental benefits which I believe will result from the adoption of this measure.

The principle of individual responsibility introduced in the several provisions of this bill, I regard as of the utmost importance in securing the faithful discharge of the duties imposed by it. Individual obligation is imposed in all its combined forms and checks; bonds binding the persons and property of the agents and their sureties, examinations and inspections of the books and entries required to be kept by the officers, and penalties in the criminal courts for violations of any of its rigid provisions. Thus person, property, character, honor, and every thing held dear in this world, are pledged for the security of the public revenue.

I proceed to consider thirdly what the bill is not.

1st. It is not a bank—a Government Bank, as has been contended here. What is a bank, as now understood in this country, and what are its functions? In order to constitute a bank as understood here since their first existence in this country, there must be the exercise of four distinct functions. 1st. Offices of deposite—2d. of discount—3d. of loan—and, 4th. of manufacturing and issuing paper money. The last, the power of manufacturing and circulating paper money, is the all important and essential function, which with us has given to banks all their power for good or evil; and enabled them to enter into all the business of society—to raise and depress the price of all the property, productions, and labor throughout the country at brief intervals, and extend to every contract between debtor and creditor from one end of the country to the other. Where is this function to be found in the bill upon your table? It is no where. It is said to exist in the power of drawing drafts by the Treasurer upon the depositories in favor of the creditors of the United States. If so, we have always, in the practice of the Treasury Department, had a Government bank in full operation, without having ever made the discovery until the discussion of this bill; because, as before observed, those provisions are merely a recognition of what has always been the practice under all Administrations since the first organization of this Government, and that effectually restrained by the twenty-third section of the bill, which is intended to prevent the circulation of the Treasury drafts as representatives of money. I am aware that institutions called banks, such as that of Venice, Amsterdam, and Hamburg, possessed not the power of manufacturing paper money, and were merely offices of deposite, loan, and discount; but where is to be found in this bill either the functions of loan or discount, necessary to constitute even such a bank? The powers of loan and discount exist no where in the bill, except through the medium of distorted imagination. According to one gentleman, [Mr. BARNARD,] these drafts may be of a denomination as low as one dollar, when they might enter into the circulation and form a popular currency; and if of a large denomination, they might and would form a part of the mercantile currency. If this were true, it would sweep away at one brush all the clamor which has been raised about "one currency for the Government and another for the people," upon which I shall submit a remark or two before I conclude; but as before remarked, this bill originates no Treasury drafts—it only proposes to legislate upon what has always been the practice of the Department, without which it could not have performed its necessary functions; and no bank powers or bank facilities have been found in that practice heretofore, nor can they now. But, with an implied concession, that the bill now under consideration does not confer any bank power, it is contended that it is a substratum upon which future Congresses may erect a bank—a stock upon which may hereafter be engrafted the scion of another monster. This objection comes from a strange quarter—from those who are unceasing in their praises of banks and eulogists of what they call the "credit system," and I should rather suspect the real objection is, that it would effectually defeat any project of a National or Government Bank, by defeating all appearance of a necessity for such an institution. It is a sufficient answer, however, to the objection, that it does not now exist; and it is not for us to suppose that those who are to succeed us will be less scrutinizing and watchful against insidious encroachments of power than ourselves.

2d. I would remark in the next place, this measure is not the Treasury note bill; but totally distinct and separate from it. Efforts I know have been made, to consider it as the same, and many have been induced to believe that Treasury notes are the notes of the Independent Treasury. The issue of Treasury notes is a mere temporary expedient, rendered necessary under any mode of deposite, by the deficiency of present funds in the Treasury to meet its demands, restrained and limited of course to a single operation; and I hope the occasion will never again occur; whereas the measure now under consideration is designed and intended as a permanent system to be engrafted as one of the settled institutions of the Government, and to endure throughout all time to come, as long as the Constitution itself shall stand.

I propose now to consider in order,

4th. The objections raised and urged against this measure, including any substitute or other plan proposed of securing the objects contemplated by it.

I would first inquire what substitute or better plan has been proposed by those opposed to this measure? It is somewhat remarkable, that notwithstanding the deep, bitter, unceasing denunciations against it, no distinct proposition has been submitted either to the people or to their representatives, by those who have so denounced it; at least, I have not been able, with much anxious search, to discover any such. Much, it is true, has been said of the excellences of the United States Bank, and occasionally a referrence to the State banks in sympathetic strains of eloquence and praise in comparison with the "odious Sub-Treasury;" but still, no distinct avowal of either, or any thing else, as the proposed substitute for it, which the party opposed will stand by and defend. I have carefully looked over the report of the minority of the Committee of Ways and Means, signed by two of the most experienced and talented gentlemen of the Opposition in this House, or perhaps this country, (Messrs. SERGEANT and POPE,) then, and now members, presented in March, 1838, to be found in the 3d vol. Reports of Com. of the House, Doc. No. 634. This is the most labored document I have been able to find against this measure, and was intended to embody in the most formidable array, the objections existing against it, forming, as it were, the official political text book, to which the country might look for the true standard of opposition faith against this measure. Yet in that whole document is not to be found a proposition as a substitute, or a project of a better plan. Much eulogy, it is true, is bestowed upon the United States Bank, then expired, but no projection of a new one or any thing in its stead. I have looked over the many able speeches delivered in both ends of the Capitol for the last two years against this measure, but have looked in vain for the distinct avowal of a substitute. I have perused the Opposition journals which teemed with bitter denunciation against the Independent Treasury scheme during the same period, without being able to discover any other scheme distinctly proposed. A great convention of all the wise and aged statesmen in the nation, if we are to believe their own account of it, assembled at Harrisburg in December last, for the express purpose of taking into consideration the pernicious measures of this Administration, of which this was denounced as the chief. They talked loud and long of its corruptions and extravagance—dealt largely in general clamor and denunciation; yet, although there were among them the most talented and experienced of the Opposition—gentlemen who had been long in office and capable of pointing out all the errors and iniquities of any administration if there were any, that great body closed its labors without specifying pointing out, much less proving, a single item of mal-administration or corruption—without declaring to their countrymen any one principle of policy by which they should be guided in the new administration which they asked to introduce; and without disclosing any plan or scheme for the examination and deliberation of the people, by which the alleged ruin and distress by which the country was visited might be avoided. Sir, I ask, what is the conclusion—the necessary irresistible conclusion every honest man is bound to draw from all this? I answer, that the conclusion of every honest and candid mind must be, that there was no corruption or mal-administration to be detected—that they had no common principles which they would, or dare announce to the world—that they had devised no fiscal plan which they dare contrast with the Independent Treasury; but all must be swallowed upon the general destitution of principle "akin to generous confidence."

Again, another vast national assemblage of wise and aged young men was convened at Baltimore in May last, numbering, according to their own account, from twenty to fifty thousand of hard fisted distressed bankers, brokers, and counter men from all the Eastern cities, bearing with them city log cabins, cider barrels and coon skins, for the avowed purpose of passing judgment upon the proceedings at Harrisburg five months before, and pronouncing them good, and condeming the present Administration. They were met by the grave legislators from both ends of this Capitol, who were to impart to the thronging multitude the vast accumulation of wrongs and mal-practices of the Administration, and disclose the rich stores of relief for an alleged suffering community, gathered by five months hard study and sifting research and investigation into all the affairs at the seat of Government. They met, with badges, music, and banners, mottoes and inscriptions, parade and shows of all fancies and devices; and what were the mighty developments of corruption of the Administration there poured out? what the great lofty principles announced? and what the healing plans of relief revealed? I hold in my hand the National Intelligencer of the 7th May, containing the principal proceedings of that assemblage as recorded by its own friends, and refer to the principal prominent speeches there delivered. It is there stated that the first speaker was Mr. Clay, who "commenced by a reference to the northwest wind, which blew almost a gale, and compared it happily to the popular voice of the immense multitude who were present," &c. and then proceeds to talk in general terms of "ravages," "revolutions," "broken hopes," "wide spread ruin," "William H. Harrison," &c. in vague, windy declamation, but nothing defined or specified either of evil or remedy. Then followed Mr. Webster, who talks of "change," "and breezes and change," William H. Harrison," and victory to last half a century, &c. "All agree, continued Mr. WEBSTER, that we have hard times, and many, he amusingly remarked, supposed the remedy to be hard cider," &c. but as undefined as to the evil or how this great political remedy was to be applied, as the grave orator who preceded him. Next on the sacred rostrum was my grave colleague and learned counsellor from the city of Philadelphia, long identified with the legal and political history of our State; I will quote from the record, where it is said, "Mr. JOHN SERGEANT of Pennsylvania succeeded Mr. WEBSTER upon the rostrum. What have you come here for? said Mr. SERGEANT. I will answer. To bring back to the people, and through the log cabins of the country, the neglected and lost Constitution." Log cabins!! and lost Constitution!!! The people! Log cabins!! and lost Constitution!!! Good Heavens! how or where did my colleague come to think or know any thing about the people and log cabins? And what does he mean by the lost Constitution? Does he mean the Constitution of the State of Pennsylvania? I remember that a few years since the people of that State decided that her Constitution should receive some Republican amendments; and my colleague (Mr. SERGEANT) was elected as a delegate to the convention, was chosen to preside over that body, and exerted his talents to defeat the expressed will of the people of that State in reference to those amendments. The amendments however prevailed, and were adopted by the people. But I cannot for my life discern how a national meeting at Baltimore could interfere with that question.

He could not have meant that. The sentence is to me totally unintelligible—it is, perhaps, too deep for my comprehension; and yet I cannot presume that he meant nothing, nor can I suppose that he had applied to himself too much of the remedy indicated by the wise statesman who had immediately preceded him. I think, however, I have a glimpse of his meaning. There are many of his political friends, who have considered the Bank and the Constitution as synonymous terms, and have got so much in the habit of using the word Constitution, when the Bank was the idea impressed upon the mind, if indeed any very well defined idea was attached to it at all. With this meaning attached to the term Constitution, I can understand him, and am forcibly reminded of a fable I recollect reading when a boy, of a cat and the rats. I give the substance from recollection, not having read it for many years. It was somewhat as follows: A wary, sly cat, having lived for some time upon a family of rats in her neighborhood, had produced rather a scarcity. The little animals, finding their number gradually diminishing, became somewhat shy, and she concluded she must either starve or resort to some stratagem to supply herself with her accustomed plunder. She suspended herself by the hind legs upon a pin in the wall, with her head hanging down, pretending to be dead. The rats, seeing her in this attitude, collected all around her, rejoicing at the death of their old enemy, when suddenly she let herself down in their midst, and made sad havoc among them. When the supply she had thus obtained had become exhausted, she resorted to another artifice, and rolled herself all over in flour, and concealed herself in a meal tub. Some of the rats perceiving a heap of flour, as they supposed, were disposed to rejoice at their good fortune, and immediately to partake of so pleasant a repast as seemed to be presented to them; but an old rat, who had witnessed all the cat's proceedings, and seen the destruction she had brought upon his race, after looking very steadily at the heap, spoke out to his fellow rats as follows: "Something whispers me there is more than meal in that pile—it may be meal, it is true, but there may be something else under it, we shall not relish quite so well." The application is this: after General Jackson had vetoed the bill for a recharter of the United States Bank, and after the Congress elected upon that question had pronounced the judgment of the people that it should not be rechartered, in the year 1835, an imporiant election occurred in Pennsylvania for Governor and members of the Legislature, in which the Republican party were unfortunately divided. In order to produce a union against the common enemy, some of both divisions of that party presented the danger of a charter of that Bank by the State, should the Opposition succeed through our divisions. Those rising fears were at once calmed by the soothing persuasion of the Opposition that the Bank was dead, and it was nonsense to keep up any alarm on that account—that no further evil could come from that quarter. The Republican party were defeated, and no sooner had the Opposition possessed themselves of the power, than the Bank was sprung upon the people of that State against all their remonstrances, under the specious title of "An act to repeal the State tax on real and personal property, to continue and extend the improvements of the State by railroads and canals, and to charter a State bank to be called the Bank of the United States," and fastened upon them, as is contended, for thirty years. The plunder obtained by that stratagem is probably now pretty well exhausted, and the institution reduced to short commons, and must soon starve, unless by some new artifice, its hungry cravings can be satisfied. Is that new artifice, this city log cabin contrivance, through, or by means of which the bank is to be brought back to the people? I am sorry my colleague is not in his seat to inform me. I take it then, that the "lost Constitution" spoken of by my colleague in his Baltimore speech, is the bank—the cat concealed; the log cabin show is the meal, the deception by which it is covered, and through which it is to be brought back upon the people, and according to Mr. Webster, to be chartered for fifty years. If this be not the meaning, I am totally at a loss to understand the figure.

Gentlemen, here, during the debate, have spoken incidentally in high terms of the United States Bank, yet none have put it distinctly forth as the antagonist to the Independent Treasury. Sir, with all the bitter condemnation which has been poured forth against this measure by those opposed to it here and elsewhere, have we not a right to demand—have the people not a right to demand of them a specification of their charges? A distinct, frank, and open avowal of their principles and of their plan? Whether the United States Bank, State bank, or the States themselves?

As the United States Bank, from what has been said here and elsewhere, appears to be the most approved plan of the Opposition for managing the fiscal affairs of the Government, and no doubt is their only one, if they had frankness enough to say so, I shall first consider that, contrasted with the Independent Treasury.

It has been repeatedly stated, over and over again, with apparent confidence, that the United States Bank had furnished a safe, sound, and uniform currency throughout its whole existence; and this sweeping assumption has been permitted to pass without much remark or contradiction since this debate commenced. Statements, calculations, and figures, have been exhibited in mathematical array, showing plausibly upon paper the excellences and perfections of a National Bank, as were by Law and Patterson in former times, by which the scheme was presented to a superficial glance, as most beautiful, splendid, and incontrovertible, reminding me forcibly of the paper town and western cities during the rage for speculation some years since. It was no uncommon occurrence at that time, to see at one of our comfortable hotels in a flourishing village, a grave, serious, well dressed man, assuming the consequential air and dignity of a wealthy land holder, exhibiting beautiful maps of towns and cities in the West, and lots and squares, parks and retreats, with bays or rivers adjoining, and store houses, churches, and public buildings arranged in the most attracting order, and according to most fashionable taste. He could sit down and make his calculations upon paper—arrange his figures in the most unerring mathematical order, and demonstrate to a crowd of anxious applicants to purchase, that they could pay one or two thousand dollars for a lot, and after making ten, fifteen, or twenty per cent. discount, could still clear from one to ten thousand dollars in a single purchase. The bargains are soon struck—the whole town sold off with all its suitable appendages—the deeds made and delivered and the money paid. The purchasers sell to others at a large advance, and they to others, and they to others again, and while confidence is kept up that the paper lots really represent substantial well located and built up terra firma, the price advances, and all goes on well, until the deed holders come to look for the reality, and either find no land there, or find, instead of a splendid growing town, a wild ague swamp with not a single inhabitant within fifty miles of it; when the whole scheme blows up and the last deed holders are ruined. Now what difference is there between a paper town, or a paper house without reality to represent, and a paper bank or paper money which represents nothing, or not more than a fifth or tenth what it professes to do?

But to the bold and confident assumption that the United States Bank had always furnished a safe, sound, and uniform currency. Sir, I deny it, and propose to give the proof. That the notes of that Bank passed at par at the different points of the United States, if such were admitted to be the fact, is a delusive criterion that it furnished a uniform currency. With the credit of the Government, and its notes taken in payment of all public dues by law, it could scarcely be otherwise—pieces of brown paper with such an endorsement would pass at par also. A much more certain criterion of a sound and uniform currency is the price of any given commodity of general use at a given place. I admit this may be varied by the circumstance of the scarcity or abundance of the article—the demand and supply—but these being equal, if the price of any article of general use, one of the necessaries of life, is very fluctuating, it is conclusive evidence in my judgment, that the currency by which the value is measured, must itself be fickle and unsound. Again: the quantity of the circulating meriod at given periods, is a much safer guide by which to determine its uniformity of value than its passing at par. If its quantity varies greatly in a brief period of time, it may be set down pretty certainly as unsound and irregular; although I again admit that there may be circumstances rendering a greater or less quantity necessary to measure the commodities to be exchanged; but to vary the quantity rapidly, there must be some extraordinary circumstances to retain its value the same. Now let us try the soundness and uniformity of the currency furnished by that Bank by these tests. The United States Bank was chartered on the 10th April, 1816, and went into operation 1st January, 1817, when, according to Mr. Crawford's report, made the 12th February, 1820, and reprinted in January, 1834, the amount of the currency of the United States was $110,000,000, and at the time of his report, within three years, it was reduced to $45,000,000.

The following table is taken from Hazard's Register, exhibiting the price of flour averaged throughout the same years, inclusive, and presents very clearly the effect of the fluctuations produced by the bank upon the necessary article of flour during the same time.

Year.	Price of flour in Philadelphia.
1818	9 96
1820	4 72

It is thus shown that in the commencement of the year 1817, when the quantity of the circulating medium of the United States was one hundred and ten millions of dollars, the price of flour at Philadelphia was eleven dollars and seventy-nine cents per barrel, (in fact, by the monthly prices current for that year, it appears to have been $13 50 per barrel in the month of January, $11 79 being the average for the whole year,) and within three years afterwards the circulation was reduced to forty-five millions of dollars, and the price of flour at the same place was four dollars and seventy-two cents per barrel. The price here is computed in par money, (United States Bank paper if you please,) one dollar of which, in 1820, would purchase as much flour as two dollars and forty-five cents in 1817, if tested by the price of that article, and if tested by the quantity of circulation, as much as two dollars and fifty-five cents in 1817. The effects of its fluctuations upon the price of labor, would be found to be still worse, if we had the advantage of tables to refer to. I give below a table taken from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in January, 1839, 5th vol. Executive Document No. 227, page 687, which exhibits the state of the circulation of the United States Bank itself, for the first three years after that in which it went into operation:

Year.	Circulation.
1818	$8,339,448

The state of the public deposites in the Bank, as contained in the report of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, April, 1832, 4th vol. Rep. Committees, No. 360, at page 279, correspond pretty nearly with the amount of its circulation. By the above table of circulation it will be seen that even with the advantage of the public deposites and the credit of the United States into the bargain, the Bank was either unwilling or unable, not only to regulate the general circulation, of which its notes constituted but the 15th part, but even its own, so as to render it either safe, sound, or uniform. With such enormous fluctuations, both in the quantity of circulation, and in the prices, as shown by the tables above, the assumption of safe, sound, and uniform currency, is utterly ridiculous, under any circumstances that could possibly have existed, even though the paper of the Bank was at par. History has recorded some evidence of the ruinous and distressing effects of this fluctuation upon the business of the country. I picked up the 16th volume of Niles's Register, running through a part of the year 1819, which is full of instructive history upon that subject. I will not take time at present to do more than present a few brief extracts. In that paper of the 10th April, 1819, is an article headed, "MONEY MATTERS—PROSPECTS AHEAD," from which I quote the following: "We have doleful accounts of the commercial distress and scarcity of money in England and France. * * * From all parts of our own country we hear of severe pressure on men in business, a general stagnation in trade, a large reduction in the price of staple articles. Real property is rapidly depreciating in its nominal value, and its rents or profits are exceedingly diminishing." It then proceeds to describe some of the commercial distresses in the country, and states some of the causes, and goes on: "Another cause, in our opinion, has hurried or heaped those ills upon us, in a design to force the people to acquiesce in a national currency of paper—THE CONSUMMATION OF EVILS." The article here has reference to the United States Bank. In the same paper of June 5th, 1819, is the following: "For several months past, the pressure grew heavier and heavier. Great sacrifices of property of every description took place, and many large mercantile houses, as well as honest farmers and mechanics, (dealing in banks and running in debt,) failed. So extensive were those among the merchants of the cities east of Baltimore, that it seemed to be disreputable to stop payment for less than $100,000. The fashionable amount was from $200,000 to $300,000, &c." detailing, in strong and clear terms, the distress, and the ruinous course of the United States Bank. In an article in that paper of June 12th, of the same year, after speaking of similar distresses and the same cause, it is said, "Let us then resist every succedaneum that may give rise to fresh gamblings in paper. It is the laboring people who at last must pay the losses made by them." * * * "All that we have suffered or are now suffering will have to be suffered again, if we yield one inch to the monopolizers." * * * "It is cash payments only, that can defend the people from swindling banks and bankers." In that paper of the 7th August of that year, it is stated that in the three cities of New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, there were 50,000 laborers thrown out of employment, and estimates the loss to the community at $300,000 per month. Running through this valuable work it will be found filled with accounts of failures of banks and merchants—a general distress and suffering, and thousands thrown out of employment, or obliged to labor for a mere pittance; and, in the paper of the 21st of August, is an article headed "Bank of the United States," in which those evils are largely spoken of; and it is further said, "never did an institution exist that more completely blasted the public expectation than this Bank has done." Some time previous to this the president of the Bank, Mr. Jones, had left it, I believe, between two days, and Langdon Cheves had been appointed in his stead. Mr. Cheves, in his exposition to the stockholders of the situation of the Bank, states that "in Philadelphia it was generally expected that the Bank would be obliged to stop payment. Mr. White, cashier of the branch of the United States Bank of Baltimore, in a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, speaks of the distresses of 1819, "a sudden scarcity of money in 1822—numerous and extensive failures in New York, Savannah, Charleston, and New Orleans, in 1825—great convulsions among banks and other institutions in 1826—in the winter of 1827-8, and in 1829-30, and thinks this properly attributed to over trading from over banking." In the fall of 1825, as confirmed by the testimony of the president of the Bank before the Committee of Ways and Means in 1832, the Bank was only saved by a rapid visit of his to New York to seek a gentleman who was preparing to draw specie from the Philadelphia banks to pay the instalments of a new bank in New Orleans, and avert a demand for specie for the use of the British Government in Canada; the fate of the country, so far as its fiscal affairs were concerned, thus hanging suspended upon the success of a midnight visit to New York of a single individual, subject to all casualties, to implore indulgence from a British agent, or a broker for a New Orleans bank! In the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury submitting his reasons for the removal of the deposites in 1833, it is stated that from the 1st of January, 1831, until the 1st of May, 1832, (sixteen months,) the Bank had extended its line of discounts and loans from $42,402,304 24 to the enormous sum of $70,428,070 72, and, as appears by a report of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, made by its chairman, Mr. Tyler, (the Opposition candidate now for Vice President,) in 1834, at pages 320 and 321, $322,199 of that amount were to fifty-nine members of Congress, who were to vote on the question of its recharter, the following session, when its petition for recharter was was presented and pressed. During the very time of this extension of its loans, it refused, as the fiscal agent of the Government, to pay the public debt required of it, although there were deposites of the Government in its possession exceeding the amount required, over $3,000,000, and sought secretly, in violation of a positive provision of the charter, to postpone and purchase the debt, through an arrangement with the house of Baring, Brothers, and Company, in London. In the month of August, 1833, it commenced a system of excessive and uncalled for curtailment, and in two months had contracted its accommodation to the amount of $4,066,146 21, during which time also it had received an increase of public deposites withdrawn from the community to the amount of $2,268,504 11, thus unnecessarily withdrawing from the business of the country in the short space of two months, six millions three hundred and thirty-four thousand six hundred and fifty dollars and thirty-two cents, nearly twice the whole amount of its entire circulation in 1820. The reason urged for this contraction was the near approach of the expiration of its charter, and yet more than a year afterwards, when that reason would be, of course, much stronger, it again expanded, in the course of a few months, nearly twenty millions of dollars. With such enormous and rapid expansions and contractions, whether from necessity or design, can it be possible that the currency furnished by it could be uniform? We have seen from the prices of one of the best articles to test by, that it was the reverse, as, of course, it must have been.

An honorable member from Kentucky (Mr. WHITE) a few days since had urged as an argument against the Independent Treasury, that it was anti-Union; and intimated that as Kentucky could derive no benefit from this Government except that of a United States Bank, she would be for dissolving the Union without it. Let us see what money was furnished for that proud State by the United State Bank—we have some evidence on that subject. In 2d Peters's Reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, page 527, is a case in which the bank is plaintiff against several defendants, the drawer and endorsers of a note for $5,000 discounted at the branch at Lexington, and dated 7th February, 1822. The defence was set out in a special plea, in substance that the consideration of the note was usurious and corrupt, having been obtained for money of the Bank of Kentucky as its nominal value, which was at a discount of forty six per cent. or 100 dollars, worth but 54 dollars—and the transaction forbidden by the 9th section of the fundamental rules of the charter, which forbade it to "take more than at the rate of six per centum per annum for or upon its loans or discounts." These facts were admitted by the pleadings, and the decision was against the bank. Mr. Clay and Mr. Sergeant appear to have been counsel for the bank, and no counsel for the defendants. This was the kind of currency it appears to have furnished to the people of Kentucky—paper at 46 per cent. discount, of a bank which was probably first reduced to that situation by the very operations of the United States Bank itself, for which it sought to recover and probably in many cases not resisted, received in gold and silver, or perhaps property at a great sacrifice the full nominal amount.

It has been urged that the United States Bank would regulate exchange. What do we learn by experience upon that subject? If we look over the rates of exchange and prices of bank notes collected by the Secretary of the Treasury, and submitted to the Senate in May, 1838, Doc. No. 457, extending from 1814 to 1837, it will be seen that the rates of exchange were much more irregular after the United States Bank got fairly into operation than before. I had intended to present a condensed table showing this result conclusively, but found it could not be done without occupying too much space. I quote a paragraph from Mr. Gouge's excellent treatise upon paper money and banking, which is fully sustained by the prices current of the day. After giving a copy of the prices current of country bank notes at Philadelphia through the years 1816, '17, '18, '19 and '20, which show a gradual and regular depreciation through the years 1816, and 1817, he says: "In his speech of January 2, 1815, Mr. Webster said, "the depreciation of the notes of all the banks in any place, is, as far I can learn, general, uniform, and equal." * * * "This equality lasted for some time after it became the custom to give regular quotations of the price of bank paper. It will be seen by inspecting the table, that in May, 1816, the notes of twenty-seven out of thirty-five country banks of Pennsylvania were at a discount of ten per cent. It will also be seen that the discount was diminished with a regularity approximating to uniformity up to May, 1818. In the succeeding July, the United States Bank commenced its curtailment; and then the great confusion in exchanges began." It must necessarily be so, with an institution possessing the credit as well as the funds of the Government—which is alternately expanding and contracting at brief and irregular intervals. It must necessarily deal destruction and ruin at each vibration either way, either upon the debtor or creditor class, and throw all commercial business into confusion and disorder, as history informs us was the case with the late National Bank. The circulation in the United States has been greatly diminishing for the last three years as appears by the annual statements of the Secretary of the Treasury, from $149,000,000 in 1837, to $106,000,000 the present year, and consequently it is proportionately appreciating in value, and if no engine of violence be thrown into it, such as the United States Bank of 1816 proved to be, in a year or two more, with the gradual, moderate and progressive correction provided in this bill, we may expect a state of currency approaching uniformity and regularity in all the affairs of community.

The sweeping argument, if it may be called such, which has been urged against the Independent Treasury, out of which it seems intended to manufacture political capital, is, that it establishes one currency for the Government and another for the people. If there be any weight in this, which I deny, how do gentlemen escape the answer, that it applies as forcibly to a United States Bank, as to the Independent Treasury, upon their own positions? They insist that a United States Bank currency is better than that of the State banks, and that the revenue be collected in it. They do not propose to abolish the State banks; and therefore a large portion of the currency would continue to be the paper of the State banks. The late Bank of the United States sometimes furnished about the 1-15th and at others about 1-5th part of the whole currency. Now, according to such argument, here is 1-5th or 1-15th better currency for the Government, and 14-15ths, or 4-5ths worse currency for the people. But I will not occupy time in answering such objections—who does not know, that the Government and the people are the same? What is collected from one portion of the people with one hand, is immediately paid out to another portion with the other. It is most largely collected from dealing and business men, and most largely paid out to soldiers, sailors, old soldiers and widows of soldiers and laborers in the employment of the Government, who again pay it away to farmers, mechanics, and others for the necessaries of life, and thus is kept in constant circulation like blood throughout the healthy system. If the Government have a sound currency, the people to whom the Government belongs will have a sound currency.

Sir, I have thus briefly and imperfectly presented some of the numerous objections to what may perhaps well be considered as the only, at least the main substitute which the Opposition would or could propose for the measure under consideration, and in doing so, I think I have answered some of the complaints and objections to this. These objections against a United States Bank, of themselves formidable—I think insurmountable—arise, even on the admission, which I do not concede, of the power and the right in this Government to establish such an institution. That great and deep question of constitutional law is involved, and lies behind and rises infinitely higher than any connected with mere expediency or policy, and if rightly decided in the negative, must close up all further inquiry. I do not propose, at present, to go into that great question, further than merely to glance at it. Whenever a National Bank shall be distinctly proposed as an affirmative, I shall endeavor to be prepared, fully to meet and discuss the question of its constitutionality. It is, perhaps, sufficient, until that proposition is distinctly submitted for consideration, that many of the wisest statesmen and soundest political lawyers this country has produced, among whom was the immortal Jefferson, hesitated not to declare their opinion in the strongest and boldest terms that no such power was ever conferred upon this Legislature. They point us to the Constitution itself, in which is found no such power expressly conferred, but contains the positive provision, that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it, to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." They also point us to the proceedings of the convention by which the Constitution was framed, in which it appears that the proposition to confer the power of granting corporate privileges was expressly negatived. They point us again to the provision in the Constitution that "Congress shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin," and tell us with unanswerable force that this power in Congress is fiduciary, a trust that they have no right to delegate; and that the incorporation of a Bank with power to manufacture paper money, is a transfer of that high attribute of sovereignty, and enables the Bank to regulate, not only the value of coin, by determining how much it shall buy, but of every other commodity. I am aware that the Supreme Court of the United States, did decide that the act of 1816 incorporating the Bank of the United States was constitutional. For the decisions of that court, upon pure legal questions, I entertain the highest regard, and hold them as binding and conclusive upon all questions arising under any particular law in existence, so long as it remains; but there the authority of the judiciary ends. When the law expires, or when the legislature contemplate to repeal it, it becomes, so far as such decision is concerned, an open question—a great political question in which the legislative is not bound by the opinion of the judiciary branch of the Government—it is co-ordinate, original, and sovereign. Again, it is not only necessary that the power should exist, but that it should be undisputed, or at least could not be plausibly denied. This will never be the case with that question while the Constitution remains as it is—there will always be a large and respectable portion, if not a majority of the people of this country who never can believe that the Constitution confers upon Congress the power to incorporate a National Bank; and with such decided sentiment against it, it can never enjoy that stability necessary to such an institution, apart from the abstract question upon its merits. But has not this nation decided the question as to a National Bank? We know that when President Jackson vetoed the bill to recharter the United States Bank in 1832, the issue was made to the country, not only in the Presidential election, but in the election of members to this body in the 23d Congress. The subject was submitted to the Committee of Ways and Means in this House, who after full investigation reported certain resolutions for adoption, the first of which was in the following words: "Resolved, That the Bank of the United States ought not to be rechartered;" which, upon long and free discussion was decided by the body, elected as before remarked with distinct reference to that question, in the affirmative, by a vote of 134 to 82, (see the vote on the Journal, 1st session, Twenty-Third Congress, page 483'4) This decision, it is true, related only to the bank then in existence, and justified by history and facts, already briefly referred to, independent of the abstract question of constitutionality, and its justice confirmed by the conduct of the bank soon afterwards, in closing its doors, in direct violation of an express provision of its charter, against a committee appointed by four-fifths of this body, to investigate its affairs; yet it is well known, that the constitutional question entered largely into its consideration, and formed the turning point of the decision against it; so much so, at least, as to deter the introduction of a similar institution, without a new and contrary demonstration by the people themselves. It was certainly very conclusive, so far as related to the then existing bank; and apart from the constitutional objection, have gentlemen furnished any reasons to expect a new institution would be free from the evils and objections resulting from the former one? That it would not produce the same rapid and irregular reduction of the circulation and consequent suffering and distress as that did? and that we would not experience the same ruin, breaking up of banks and business men, the same inordinate fluctuations and reduction of prices which were suffered in 1819 and 1820?

It seems to me, therefore, that any plan connected with the establishment of a National Bank must be regarded as out of the question; and that the Executive was not only justified in so considering it, but that he was bound to do so.

Then what other plan has been proposed or even pointed to in the course of this debate? Much has been incidentally thrown out in sympathy for State banks; but has any one dared to submit the proposition to continue them as the depositories during their suspension of specie payments? I think I am justified in declaring that no one has ventured such a plan for consideration. Has any one proposed to extend the deposites with the States, of money wanted for the public service? I believe no one. This was the hobby of the Opposition party in 1836, when there was a large surplus of public revenue not needed for the public service. The cry was ever and anon, "it is the people's money, and ought to be distributed to the States." It was asked as an absolute distribution; but it was known that the old Roman, then in the Executive chair, would not give his sanction to it as such. To avoid this difficulty it was put in the form of a deposite, and in that form received his reluctant consent and became a law. For this law I voted, under an impression that it was consistent with the wishes of a large majority of my constituents, under the peculiar circumstances of an enormous surplus revenue that might be applied to State purposes, and would not be wanted for the national service for years, I confess, not without great apprehensions of its evil and embarrassing results upon the finances of the country. It was a measure of the Opposition party—claimed as such, and rendered plausible by their ingenuity and unceasing efforts to operate upon public opinion in its favor; but I am now satisfied, as I then feared, that it was one of the most unfortunate financial measures that have been adopted, or even proposed in a long series of years. The sudden transfer of so large sums of money from their natural channels, produced a state of disorder and confusion throughout the whole system, and was one of the principal causes of the suspension of specie payments, which occurred shortly after it went into operation. I take this occasion to say that I have always regretted that vote; the only one while I had the honor of a seat here; and if forgiven for it, promise that I shall never be caught in a Whig popularity trap again. I now believe, that had not the scheme of the deposite with the States been adopted, the State banks would have continued to perform the trust confided to them under the act of 1836, and would not have been forced to a suspension, and the occasion would not have existed for providing a different mode for the custody of the public money. The scheme has had its day, and whatever good purposes it may have served for the States, it has had a most unfortunate effect upon the fiscal concerns of this Government. No one now advocates or proposes that plan. Then, sir, I ask—in the name of my constituents I demand of the party opposed to this measure, having made it a party opposition, what plan or substitute they do propose? I have heard none other even hinted at than what I have already noticed.

Mr. Chairman, I shall now take a brief notice of the charges preferred against the late Administration by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARVIN] which has been repeated by others, in waging war upon the United States Bank, the creation of new State banks, and urging and advising them to extend their circulation, and thus involving the country in debt by excessive importations, &c. The gentleman's position reminded me somewhat of an able counsellor I once saw in the trial of a cause in a county court. He made a statement of his client's case, which was an action for an assault and battery, very fully; according to which a plain case of gross and unprovoked outrage was committed upon his client; but when he came to call his witnesses and produce the proof in support of his statement, every witness either proved nothing at all, or that the plaintiff was the aggressor. He immediately entered a non-suit. Just so with the honorable gentleman—his statement is strong, conclusive, and full, but his witnesses all contradict it, or at least do not support it. As to the war upon the bank, perhaps enough has been already said of the history of that institution, and of its acts, to render any thing further upon that subject unnecessary; but the gentleman has referred to one or two documents which I shall merely notice. In order to show that our excessive imports over exports was attributable to General Jackson's hostility to the United States Bank, he read an article from Hazard's Register, vol. 1, page 427, in one part of which it is said that "at the close of 1830, our accounts were about square with foreign nations, &c." To make this article fit his statement, he dates the war upon the bank at that period (1830.) Now, in the fist place, I think there is some inaccuracy in the conclusion in the article, from its own figures and statements. By the tables presented above this conclusion that "at the close of 1830 our accounts were about equal, &c." it shows an excess of imports over exports, including 1830, of $37,662 950 and an indebtedness by the sale of State stocks, of of more than $26,000,000, and an excess of exports of specie of something short of $3 500,000. How the writer draws the conclusion that we were then about square, is not for me to reconcile. But the gentleman did not tell us that us that the very same article in Hazard's Register, from which he quotes, states the fact "that the United States Bank, and subsequently the Pennsylvania United States Bank, have been the chief channels through which the State stocks have been poured into the London markets." But, again, the gentleman is opposed by what, I suppose, I am at liberty to call his own witnesses, as to the time this alleged war upon the Bank commenced. The stock directors of the Bank, in a memorial, laid upon the table of members in December, 1833, at page 19, answering a charge against them of circulating political speeches, &c. say, "in December, 1831, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the full approbation of the President, had spoken in the most favorable terms of the Bank, and he did not sign his veto message against it until July, 1832, up to which period it was doubtful whether he would veto it, and of course it was unknown whether the Bank would have the least reason to be opposed to his election." The excess of imports would seem, by the article quoted, to have commenced in 1828, before General Jackson was elected at all; but, at all events, not later than 1831, a year or more before THE WAR, according to the testimony of the Bank. But the removal of the deposites did not take place until October, 1833, until which time the United States Bank was the fiscal agent and undisturbed depository of the Government; at which time the excess of imports over exports, according to that article, was about ninety millions of dollars, and an indebtedness by the sale of State stocks, about fifty-five millions. This removal of the deposites did not take place either, until about two months after the Bank commenced its extraordinary curtailment in August, 1833, already referred to. It thus appears that the Bank was the aggressor. and by its agency a large indebtedness, both by an excess of importations and the sale of State stocks, was incurred before any war existed. As to the charge of the creation of new State banks under the direction of that Administration, no evidence has been furnished, and the fact is otherwise. That there has been a great increase of State banks since 1830, both before and after the expiration of the charter of the United States Bank in 1836, 237 before, and 344 since, I am free to acknowledge. I will not now retort the charge, that this forced creation of State banks was the result of the policy opposed to the late and present Administrations, with design to bring about an excessive State bank circulation, and furnish an argument for the creation of a National Bank; but I should like gentlemen to account for the fact, that we find them generally, if not uniformly, chartered by Opposition votes in the State Legislatures, as their journals will show. As to the State banks being urged and advised to excessive circulation, the only evidence referred to is the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Girard bank, of the 26th September, 1833, in which, after stating that the Department had selected that bank to be one of the depositories, he says: "the deposites of the public money will enable you to afford increased facilities to commerce, and to extend your accommodation to individuals, &c." This, it must be recollected, was at the very time, when, as before seen, the United States Bank had withdrawn from circulation from the community upwards of six millions in two months, and the greatest mercantile distress prevailed in consequence, which formed one of the reasons for withdrawing the deposites from its custody, when thus employed to inflict distress upon the country, to enforce its charter by Congress. That the indication should be given, that the depositesproposed to be made with the bank would enable it to afford some relief, under such peculiar circumstances, formed not the slightest reason for an enormous and excessive issue of bank paper. That gentlemen belonging to the Opposition should now so directly change their complaint, from that of denouncing the late Administration as hostile to the credit system, because the Executive was untiring in his recommendations of reform and restraint, to that of charging it with urging and advising them to an excessive circulation, would be truly remarkable, were it not in conformity with the general course of that party. When the Executive recommended measures of restraint and reform upon the banking institutions as far as this Government possessed any power so as to prevent excessive issues, he was a tyrant, despot, and every thing that ingenuity, combined with political rancor, could denominate him; and when, encouraged probably by that very clamor, they disregarded all rules, and run to a boundless and lawless extravagance until they could go no further, and the consequences have come upon the country through a general suspension of specie payments, the lamentation is reversed, and then he is charged with encouragement and urging the banks to expand. Have gentlemen so soon forgotten the general and unceasing clamor about the specie circular? Why did they condemn that measure? Was it not because it was calculated to restrain the issues of the banks, and injure public credit? Surely they cannot have forgotten this so soon. Sir, the country has not forgotten it. The harsh, unwelcome cry of ruin was sounded throughout the country, because credit was restrained and arrested; now the same party make the charge, apparently without blushing, that credit was encouraged and excessively extended. If there was any one man in this country more uniform and consistent than any other in urging and advising and acting whenever it was legitimately in his power, against excessive and extravagant bank issues, that man was the late illustrious executive, ANDREW JACKSON; and if there was any one subject which he more uniformly and steadily reprobated and exposed than another, that subject was excessive bank expansions. No man has said more and done more to expose its evils to the country than he has done. But his administration needs no defence from me, and I will not lessen its merits by attempting it. This country has approved it—the world has admired it, and posterity will praise it, while honesty and wisdom and patriotism have a friend.

It has been objected to the Independent Treasury, that it will increase executive patronage, and place the purse in the hands of the President. This objection has been so fully answered by others; indeed, it is so palpably unfounded, that I do not feel disposed to occupy time to enlarge upon it. That the appointment of some half dozen officers and a few clerks, bound by the most rigorous provisions for their compliance with the law, and subject to the control of Congress as well as the President, at any time, should be supposed to confer more power upon the Executive, so far as the purse is concerned, than a union with one or fifty money corporations, with all their officers, stockholders and clerks, in times of plain common sense and reason, might be calculated to excite to surprise; but in times of high party zeal, when we see that every charge and every objection passes through the alembic of partisan imagination, our suprise ceases. Great pains have also been taken to furnish instances of violation of public trust by individuals tempted with the custody of the public money. No one doubts that men of standing and respectability have sunk under temptations of that sort; but do gentlemen forget, that it is one of the very purposes of this bill to defend against the infirmities of human nature, by placing every possible guard around the trust? The friends of the measure have thrown around it all the guards they could devise, predicated upon the weakness and susceptibility of all to error; if other guards still stronger can be devised by others, if proposed, they will no doubt be accepted.

This measure has been discussed as though it presented the broad question, and proposed the policy of an exclusive metallic currency, as contrasted with a mixed or paper currency. Although several of its supporters have taken some notice of the banking system in this country, and drawn some comparisons between a paper and a specie circulation, in favor of the latter, it was but in reply to those opposed to the bill, who had spoken in unmeasured terms of praise and eulogy upon the credit system, and a bank paper circulation, and had enlarged upon the impracticability and inconvenience of a metallic circulation. They did not and could not have regarded that question as necessarily involved in this bill, further than the conversion of the public deposites into bank paper credits for the use and benefit of banks and their customers—whether the banks, State or national, were entitled to claim the money of the people for the avowed purpose of using it as so much capital drawn from the people by indirect taxation for their benefit. The gentleman from New York, (Mr. MARVIN) complained that some of those who support the bill are in favor of hard money, and others favor a mixed currency, yet all go for the bill. There are, no doubt, many who support this bill, hard money men—who believe the whole system of the manufacture of paper money by corporations, whether created by the General or State Legislature, as unjust and highly injurious—as transferring to irresponsible bodies the high sovereign power of controlling the standard of value, and enabling them, by enlarging and diminishing the quantity of their circulation, to regulate, as well the value of coin, as every thing else, as dangerous and pernicious; who believe, that however this system may suit Great Britain, whose theory is, that a "public debt is a public blessing," where the Government is a consolidated one, extending all over the kingdom, and where the few live in splendor, while the mass are reduced to poverty and wretchedness; it is entirely unsuited to this country with its six and twenty separate sovereignties bound together by a Government of limited and prescribed powers—where a public debt is regarded as an evil, and where the rights of all are equal; yet that the system having been adopted in the States—debts contracted upon its standard, false as it may be, and all the affairs of life somewhat interwoven with it, its sudden destruction would produce great distress and utter ruin to thousands, indeed the entire debtor class throughout the whole country. We are referred to the statement of the condition of the banks in all the States, by which it appears, that the amount of their bills and notes discounted is $462,896 523 the amount of their notes in circulation $106 968,572, and the amount of deposites $75,694,857, which apparently leaves the country indebted to the banks after deducting the amount of their notes in the hands of the people, and deposites made by them, to the amount of $280,231,095; but it is believed that a very large proportion of this apparent indebtedness is due by the officers and stockholders themselves, and thus the debtors and creditors to that amount are the same. What amount of this indebtedness is of this class, there have been no means of ascertaining, still, that there is an indebtedness from the country—the people, to the banks, there is no doubt, and it might be a difficult question with those most opposed to a bank paper circulation, to determine the time and manner of avoiding the evils and inconveniences resulting from the system. Others who support this measure, believe that a mixed currency in this country is necessary, and cannot be dispensed with. There is no inconsistency or irreconcileability in all this, as far as regards this bill. The question of exclusive metallic or mixed currency is not involved in it. It is time enough to consider that question, whenever it shall be presented; and for one, I protest against the issue on this bill being extended beyond its legitimate provisions and necessary results.

It has been objected to this measure, that it has been decided against three times, and still the President has persisted in it. When, sir, I ask, and how has it been decided? It was first recommended to the Twenty-fifth Congress at its special session in 1837. It was then passed by the Senate, and in this House laid upon the table, and during the three sessions of that Congress, it is true, it did not pass this body. The Congress now in session is the first elected by the people in reference to that question, and may be regarded as the first opportunity the people have had to speak through their representatives upon the subject. How the vote may be, is yet to be determined, but I believe it is understood on all sides of the House, that a majority have been elected to pass it into a law, and no belief is entertained by any one that it can be defeated by a fair direct vote. The eyes of the country are upon us—the people have decided the question, and expect to see their representatives carry out their will by its speedy adoption.

I hasten to the last proposition to consider,

5th. The means employed to defeat the adoption of the measure before us.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not undertake to enumerate the countless artifices and ingenious devices resorted to for the purpose of defeating this bill, and rendering it unpopular with the country. That were an endless task—volumes might be written upon it, and months spent in recounting them. My main purpose is, to refer to one or two of those devices which have been directed somewhat particular to me and to the district which I have the honor to represent, and which I feel it a duty I owe as well to myself as to my constituents briefly to notice.

Some time since, I learned that a printed circular letter, signed "JOHN C. CLARK," had found its way very freely among the people in that district, one of which was forwarded to me by a friendly constituent. It is headed, "Letter of the Honorable John C. Clark, New York, to the Whigs and Conservatives of Chenango and elsewhere, on the necessity of efficient political action and organization, in relation to the New Jersey election, and on the expenditures of the Government," the first part dated "January," and the latter part, "March, 1840."

Commencing with the annunciation of the vast importance of the political campaign now opening upon the American people, the letter proceeds:

"The unholy war which the Administration has waged, and is now waging, against the domestic institutions and the currency of the people, has produced not only bankruptcy and ruin to thousands of our industrious and enterprising citizens, but threatens, in the utter destruction of the values of all sorts of property, a general and wide spread desolation. No one can claim exemption from the all pervading calamity * * * * Ruin, in its most appalling aspects, surrounds us on every side. * * * * In all the departments of industry reign the gloom and silence of the grave."

A gloomy poetical picture is drawn in a sort of general cant, without any statement of facts or attempt at specification, of "scenes of political corruption and official profligacy, of contempt of law and order, and of disregard of official and constitutional obligation, of industry paralyzed, of fortunes ruined, of prospects blighted, of hopes crushed, of want and wretchedness, over which the good man! and the Christian patriot! weeps in anguish," &c. After presenting this gloomy picture of the country, and a general tirade of abuse upon the Administration, the writer appeals to the pockets of "those who happily have saved any thing from the general wreck," and adroitly introduces the importance of keeping up, at the Capitol, a spirited and prudently conducted paper, advocating the Republican doctrines of the Opposition! and the just claims of General Harrison," &c. The Madisonian "is such a journal!" &c.; then suggests that this "energetic journal, at this central point," "under the franks of members of Congress for the seven ensuing months," could pervade "every nook and corner of the Union," &c. Then speaks of the "many waste places of the political Zion to be built up," and concludes that part of the letter with an appeal too pointed to be mistaken, in the following words:

"In conclusion, permit me most earnestly to urge upon you the great importance of efficient action, and of enlarged liberality."

Those who support the Administration, of whom I claim to be one, are modestly and courteously spoken of as governed by "ruthless and revolutionary violence of party," and as "pliant and supple slaves of the palace, ever ready to do the bidding of their master," &c.; as acting "by he relentless foree, brute force, of party;" as a "tyrannous Robespierrean majority," &c.; "tools of the Administration;" "minions and slaves of power," rebuked and condemned by "the voice of an insulted and betrayed constituency," &c. This second part of the letter, in relation to the admission of the members elected by the people of New Jersey, against the claims of those appointed by the broad seal of the Governor, in opposition to the votes of the people, I am not permitted to answer in the discussion of this bill; but I shall take some suitable opportunity to do so, to the country, either verbally or by letter, and shall hold myself in readiness, on all proper occasions, to defend and justify my votes on that question, before my constituents, and before a just and enlightened world. To this letter is added, by way of appendix, a table—the same, I believe, which has been introduced, in some shape or other, into the speech of almost every one opposed to this Administration, during this session, and almost every article from that side prepared for the press—giving an exhibit of the expenditures of the Government during the administrations of Mr. Adams, General Jackson, and Mr. Van Buren, of which I shall take a passing notice hereafter.

Now, sir, what is the "unholy war" and what the "domestic institutions" referred to in this letter? and what the object or at least the tendency of the reference? The suggestion of the Independent Treasury, under the circumstances mentioned at the first of my remarks, when those holy institutions, the banks, had voluntarily rendered it unlawful to select or continue them as the depositories, is what is magnified here into an "unholy war;" and the "domestic institutions" are those same banks which failed to comply with the conditions on which alone Congress had directed their selection, but still claimed the exclusive use of the people's money for their customers; and the effect, if not the object of this groundless alarm cry, and inflammatory appeal, is, a combination of those institutions with their army of officers, stockholders, and debtors, with the political action and organization of party in favor of an Opposition candidate for the Presidency, without any open, avowed principles, and enlisting them in the support of a trashy, partisan newspaper, to villify and misrepresent the Administration, and particularly this measure of the people, the circulation of which is to be widened and enlarged by the franks of members of Congress to its subscribers to "every nook and corner of this Union," and to every "waste place in the political Zion." We have a cue to this horror-striking, panic-striking appeal to the banks, in a speech delivered against this bill today by the gentleman's colleague from the Albany district [Mr. BARNARD] the substance of whose remark, was, that banks are harmless, if let alone—that officers, stockholders, and customers of banks are easily managed by addressing their interests, and when once their political influence is enlisted, it is overwhelming and irresistible. This argument was used to show the influence of banks with the Administration, and it would of course be the same against it.

Mr. Chairman, I have received a number of letters from constituents of mine on the subject of this printed letter and other documents of a similar character, a few extracts from some of which, will explain to some extent, my reason for introducing and commenting upon it on this occasion. One letter says:

"Our mails for the last week or ten days have been so overloaded with Federal speeches and pamphlets that the stages are nearly broken down. A large cart had to be sent to ——, and another to ——, loaded with CLARK's letter and DAVIS's speech, and other such stuff as that, franked by four or five different members from other States. * * More than three thousand of these articles have come here now in a short time. Why do these men trouble themselves about your constituents, and not attend honestly to the business of their own? It is like the Northern States meddling with the laws and regulations of the South. I understand that, upon the begging of CLARK's letter, a plan has been adopted here to get each township to subscribe for $10 worth of Madisonians to be franked by the members. Is this the object of the franking privilege, and does the law or the rules of the House allow members to neglect their own business and spend their time in sending newspapers and other trash into other States?"

Another letter says:

"I think you must have a great many friends at Washington, or else I have. I got at the Post Office, a day or two ago, a pamphlet of JOHN C. CLARK of New York, directed to the Whigs and Conservatives of Chenango county, franked by "J. C. CLARK, M. C." A speech of JOHN DAVIS, franked "W. L. BROWN, M. C." [Connecticut,] and a life of General Harrison with a horse and log cabin on it, franked by "R. GARLAND," [Louisiana.] I send you the franks. I thought I was highly honored, or that these men were assisting you, and wanted to make you popular; but when I come to look at my books, I didn't read them much. I found they were too much humbug."

Another letter states the receipt of a speech of Mr. DAVIS, and proceeds:

"I soon found it did not suit me—that it was a Federal speech grossly misrepresenting our Senator BUCHANAN about reducing wages. I had received Mr. BUCHANAN's speech a few days before from you, and had read it with satisfaction; and soon saw that DAVIS was trying to mislead, and turn his own charge as if it had been the argument of Mr. B. I thought there must be some trick about it, having at first supposed I got it from you, and looked at the wrapper and found it was endorsed "J. TRUMBULL, M. C." [of Connecticut.] I thought he might be some fellow you had got to write for you and had cheated you, and send you a piece of the wrapper that you might detect him, &c."

Another asks:

"Do you know J. W. ALLEN, [of Ohio,] whose name I send you as franked upon a Federal speech directed to me? I do not know him, and yet he sent me this trash. If you know him, tell him for me to send it some place else. I do not thank him for his kindness. It is no go at all!"

Another letter mentions the receipt of "John C. Clark's pamphlet" as he calls it, in which he says:

"He speaks of distress and ruin, and begging subscriptions to the Madisonian, and promising to frank it to subscribers. Is that a proper and suitable business for a member of Congress? What does he mean by "Conservatives?" I believe it means those that profess one thing and practise another—pretend to be Democrats, but act with the Federalists; in Scripture style "wolves in sheep's clothing." I thought there must be some roguery about this some how, and send you a piece of the wrapper with the name on it—loads of them are sent here, but people do not read them much, except to condemn them."

I have received several other such communications—I exhibit the franks [holding them out] as sent me, and have no doubt they are genuine as they purport. I am sorry the gentleman from the Chenango district of New York, as well as well as all the other gentlemen referred to are out of their seats, I suppose as good "Christian patriots" "weeping in anguish over political prospects blighted," "of hopes crushed," and still busily engaged forwarding cart loads of speeches, &c. to the "waste places in the political Zion," furnishing food to political souls that sit in the "gloom of darkness and political death." I do not know, however, why the district I have the honor to represent here, should be so peculiarly regarded as a "wast place in the political Zion," as to require to be "illumined with the light" imported all the way from Louisiana, Connecticut, New York, and Ohio. I can assure my friends who have volunteered to aid me in ministering to that supposed "dark region," that there are gentlemen, residents there of the same political creed with them, who would not lose in comparison with the honorable letter writing gentleman himself; and who consider themselves fully competent to sustain their creed by every argument of which it is susceptible, and will certainly not feel very highly complimented by the appellation of "waste place," and "vast region sitting in gloom, &c." given to the region within the sphere of their action—gentlemen for whom I entertain the highest regard, and with whom, it gives me pleasnre to say, although politically opposed, I have always associated on the best terms of personal friendship and confidence. This I say, as they well know, not for the purpose of conciliating political favor, but as a matter of justice. There are in that district three energetic political journals of the same creed, the editor of one of which was a delegate to the great Harrisburg Convention in December last. There are also three banks, close by one of which, the directors and their friends some time since raised a city log cabin, after the manner commenced in this city and followed out by the bankers in other cities—the highest evidence, I presome, in the estimation of some, of the streams of political intelligence and light which flow there. Besides, I have myself not been entirely unmindful of those opposed to me in that district, in supplying a number of them with the most approved speeches, bought at my own expense, in opposition to this very bill, at least up to the time when I learned that others had volunteered that service. I suppose it is not my place to inquire, yet I could scarcely avoid asking, if the gentlemen were here, how the expenses of printing, &c. of such loads of speeches are paid? The speeches I have sent to my constituents have cost me from $2 to $3 per hundred, and at that rate, my kind friends must have expended large sums to enlighten the "dark region" and "waste place" I represent, and I do not know I shall repay them that, beside their entire time devoted to my constituents instead of their own, in sending correct information among them. Perhaps the banks could tell something about this. By some of the envelopes sent to me, I discover there must be clerks employed, as the endorsements are in a different hand writing from the franks, and all that my friends seem to have to do, is, to write their names.

I shall not now enter into any discussion of the propriety or impropriety and indelicacy of an honorable member writing, and having printed for circulation, a circular letter impeaching the conduct and impugning the motives and honor of his fellow-members, applying to their acts and conduct reproachful and disrespectful terms, such as "pliant tools," "minions and slaves of power," "doing the bidding of their master, &c."—designating them either by name or other means by which they may be clearly known, and sending cart loads of such circular, either with or without an "and elsewhere," which like my Lord Littleton's &c. covereth a great deal, into a district represented by one thus designated, even out of his own State. I leave that to be determined by those who are capable of distinguishing between an honorable act and the contrary. It has perhaps one merit; that of novelty. I never knew it done before. I have never done so myself, nor do I believe the intelligent constituency whom I represent, of any party, would justify or even excuse me in thus devoting my time and attention here, nor consider it a part of my public duties; others of course act for themselves, according to their own sense of propriety and duty.

In this letter, and other speeches and documents, with which the country has been flooded, by the untiring efforts of those opposed to this measure and the Administration, its friends have been represented as urging it on the ground that it would reduce the prices of products and wages of labor. As stated in the letter of one of my correspondents in relation to Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Davis, the measure is charged as having the effect of injuring the laboring portion of society—this is rebutted by the friends of the bill, by showing that whatever operation it shall have upon the general currency, is to render it more regular and steady, and consequently affording a greater protection to the working classes and small dealers, who have not the means of anticipating the fluctuations to which an unlimited and unrestrained paper circulation is subject. Those who make the charge, instead of furnishing the proof or argument to sustain it, or to demonstrate any error in the reply to it, turn round and represent their very charges which they themselves have made, as the arguments used by those upon whom they have made them. Is this fair? No honest man will say it is. Sir, I deny that it is either the object or the effect of this bill to injure the wages of labor, but on the contrary to improve and better their condition, by averting the alternate expansions and contractions of bank paper circulation. It is a settled maxim of political economy, proved by long experience, that none suffer so much from the changes in the amount of circulating medium as the laboring men—their wages are the last to rise by an expansion, and among the first to fall by a contraction. The effect of an expansion upon the laboring classes is beautifully and truly illustrated by President Jackson in his last annual message, from which I extract this sentence:

"It is not until the prices of the necessaries of life become so dear that the laboring classes cannot supply their wants out of their wages, that their wages rise, &c."

The effect of the contraction is equally unjust to them—one effect of this measure, as we believe, will be to correct this to some extent at least. That the circulation has been reduced since 1837 by the contractions of the banks upwards of $40,000,000 we have seen—the necessary effect of this is to reduce prices, (and as has been shown, it would have been much worse with a United States Bank,) and this is the ruin and distress which has been presented to the country in such glowing colors—the effect, as the orators and letter writers will have it, of the Independent Treasury, not yet passed law. Why this alarming picture of ruin and general calamity and distress which we find in the letters, speeches, and documents, sent all over the country? Is it for the purpose of producing discontent in the public mind, and inducing the persuasion with the people that they cannot be placed in a worse situation by a change of men and measures, and that they can thus be induced ignorantly and unthinkingly to rush in desperation into a change, without inquiring into the principles of those who urge the induction of an Administration, whose principles are withheld from the public eye, and who rely upon the meritorious grounds alone of a generous confidence? Is it for the same reason, and with the expectation of misleading the people, that the expenses of the Government for the last few years are paraded in almost every speech sent abroad, in unfavorable comparison with those of twelve or fifteen years since? Who does not know, upon a limited reflection and knowledge of our Constitution, that the mere aggregate amount of the expenses of the Government is no evidence of extravagance or profligacy of the Executive branch, nor indeed against any of the branches of the Government? In order to furnish any grounds of charge against the Executive, it is necessary to show one of two things; either that there was no appropriation by law to warrant the expenses, or that there was a waste or injudicious application of the money. Has either been attempted? It is not pretended. For one, I protest against a charge preferred against the Executive, which implies a surrender of the rights and powers of this body, and for the exercise of which the legislature alone is responsible; were the propriety and policy of the legislation by which the expenses were incurred, strictly examined, it could be satisfactorily shown that the great increase of pensions, the improvement of harbors, your ten millions for the Florida war, the payment of the debt of the District of Columbia, and numerous other large items since 1828, were all necessary and proper—and if any one of those who have raised this charge against the President will point out a single appropriation, to which he objects, I shall undertake to show that it was voted for by a majority of their own party friends in this body.

I hasten to conclude—I entertain no doubt of the passage of this bill—the people have decreed it, and it will be done; I believe those who are to come after us will heartily approve it—fully appreciate, and long enjoy the blessings of an Independent Treasury.

SPEECH OF MR. HUBBARD,

OF ALABAMA.

In the House of Representatives, June 27, 1840—On the Independent Treasury bill.

MR. CHAIRMAN: Sinful man has in all ages and at all times been found unwilling to perform his duty, and "earn his bread in the sweat of his face." Scheme after scheme has been tried to throw off the burden from ourselves, and to place it on others; and the few have ever sought to rule and plunder the many. And for this purpose every age has had some strong, deep, and powerful movement, that has, as it were, marked the era, and given a peculiar stamp upon the history of the nations for the time. Kingcraft and priestcraft have each had their day of undisputed plunder. They have tried it singly, and tried united, and they have been compelled to take into copartnership every powerful interest which has grown up in the midst, and which had the same object in view. The first has grounded a claim to power under the pretext of protecting the persons, whilst the other has vainly presumed to save the souls of the multitudes they robbed. Every passion in the human bosom has been appealed to and called into action, to aid them in their purposes. At times they resort to war and conquest; again to the more quiet, but more sure method of plundering their own people; armies are used as instruments in the one, and courts, sheriffs, bailiffs, and tithe-gatherers in the other.

The art of printing having exposed the fraudulent pretensions of kingcraft and priestcraft, these plunderers of nations have united their art with what they have pleased to call the great paper credit system—the art of making mere paper pass as money—and this, sir, may properly enough be termed bankcraft, for it is emphatically the age of corrupt banking, the issuing of paper bills to circulate as money, when in fact and truth those who put them out have no money—the art of making something valuable to support idleness and luxury, out of that which has no value—not making wealth or property by labor, but using paper bills to transfer the wealth and labor of the multitudes to the uses of the few, without labor—sponging up the fruits of toil and industry, and squeezing it out into the lap of luxury, fraud, and chicanery.

No language, sir, is too strong to mark our reprobation of the practice of banking without capital, or above the capital. It is a corrupt system of the present age, where all the ingenuity of the greatest talent has been called into exercise for the purpose of obtaining from property holders and laborers the greatest possible amount of their earnings and possessions, and to let them know as little as possible how it is managed. And, sir, whilst this has been going on, it has also been part of the scheme to excite in the minds of the multitude such an admiration for wealth, and even the appearance of wealth, as to induce them to overlook the means by which it has been obtained; and they therefore the more readily submit to the plunder, without attempting to examine the system.

I propose now to examine the system, and to show beyond question the impossibility of multiplying money by paper bills, and to make such bills circulate instead of real money, and answer its purposes, where there is no real money; or to make them circulate in amounts exceeding the real money of the country, without inflicting certain and inevitable injury upon laborers and holders of property, and the gradual and eventual prostration of both. It may enrich the paper man, but cannot benefit either the laborer, or the man who has property liable for debts, and which can be taken to satisfy executions. I propose now to make this proof; and to give the friends of banks on this floor a fair opportunity of answering, if able, my arguments. I will make my statements so plain and simple, that if I err or mistake, the most common understanding shall see my error.

I therefore take my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. ROGERS,] the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HILL,] who sits by me, and is a bank man, and myself, and suppose that we three set out in life together, under just such laws as we now have, but without banks, and that each had worked for and obtained one dollar, with which we could, by lending it out one year, gain six cents apiece. Now if we should be equally prudent and industrious, we would get along pretty much alike, if no improper interference should take place to give one the advantage. But let Government interfere, and make me a banker, with power to issue three paper dollars out on interest for my one dollar; exempt my private property from paying my corporate debts, whilst their property continued liable for their debts; let me pay my taxes in my paper, and make them pay theirs in specie or in my notes; and, finally, give me the use of their taxes as well as that of the whole community, to lend out again three for one, and put the interest into my own pocket, the gentlemen will soon discover how fast I shall become rich and elevated by corporate power, whilst themselves and the community become poor and degraded by its plundering effects. I turn my dollar into three of paper, and lend for eighteen cents, and I pay my taxes with my own paper; these gentlemen, who were just a little while ago my equals, can now only lend their dollar for six cents, and must pay their taxes in specie, or bow down to me and pay me tribute for my notes to pay their taxes. If they pay specie, it comes into my hands, and I lend out for my private gain three times the amount in my notes. Would the gentlemen quietly look on and bear it in their own cases? If not, how can they make their constituents bear such injustice?

But, sir, this is not all. If it requires five of their six cents interest to support them, and five cents to support me, they would have each one cent left, whilst, from the same dollar, I would have thirteen; I would then, being banker, besides all the advantages from using their taxes and that of the community for my private gain, have thirteen times as much income from my dollar as they, by law, could get for theirs—I would, therefore, in the scale of importance, so far as wealth is concerned, become equal to thirteen such men. Would they like that? I think not. But, sir, bad as this may appear, it is not the worst part of the case; for let any calamity happen to them, by which they cannot meet a debt which falls due, their houses, lands, stock, and implements of trade or husbandry, are levied upon and sold to pay the debt, whilst "a run," as it is called, upon my bank, takes out my dollar to the first one who calls for it with my note, and my private property cannot be touched for my corporate debt; the holders, therefore, of the other two paper bills go unpaid until the people I loaned pay me. If they pay promptly, they frequently have to suffer great losses, in forcing property into the market; if they don't pay promptly, the bills depreciate, and the holders suffer the loss, but I still get my full interest. If they never pay me a cent, the bank breaks, the holders of the bills are swindled, but my private property being exempt from corporate debts, I remain unharmed amidst the pressure and ruin created for my exclusive benefit. The same notes having been in active circulation, may have been the cause of many debts and transfers of property, out of which transactions suits spring up, costs accrue, executions issue, specie be demanded, and a community sacrificed, whilst I am safe and snug, my private property bought, perhaps, with these corporate notes, exempt by privilege from sale. Would the gentleman from Virginia like this? And were he the holder of my bills, in such cases, would he still adhere to the system? Would he be willing to see me grow rich thirteen times as fast as himself and neighbors, upon the same capital, by a privilege conferred upon me, and denied to them? Or would he bear to see me riot upon luxuries which were the fruits of his and their taxes, extorted from their hard earnings by corporate privileges, and the use given to me, whilst I would not even pay my corporate debts? Would he bear the working of the system in all of its enormities, as here described? And would he impose it on his constituents and posterity? I know he will say that he would not, if the system worked as I have stated; but he will deny that it does so operate, and that three to one is too much to issue. Very well, sir; let him have it two to one, and I make seven cents clear to his one cent; and if only one and a half to one, I make four cents to his one; in which I should only be equal to seven such men, or four such men as he, as the case might be. In my opinion, sir, there is no grade of intellect which can successfully overthrow or refute the positions here laid down; and I challenge the gentleman from Virginia, and the whole of the friends of paper issues for circulation as money, to deny their correctness in principle. They may allege that I have over estimated the extent of the evils; but none can truly deny but that the inherent mischief in the system itself is in proportion to the excess of paper issued above the amount of capital held. And, sir, whilst they maintain that three to one is too high an estimate, I allege that it does not exceed the average rate of banking in the United States; and when you consider that this relates to what is called honest banking only, if you will include all sorts, you will find that instead of over estimating the system, I have not even more than hinted at its enormities.

And let me here remark, that the principle is the same, whether the money employed in banking be one dollar, a million, or hundreds of millions; whether the power, privileges, and exemptions are conferred upon one, an hundred, or thousand persons, or whether the banking is done under a charter from a single State, or the United States. The effect upon labor and property is the same, to the extent it is carried on; and to dispute here among ourselves, which is best, or which ought to have the people's taxes to sustain and strengthen them, with the view of protecting our constituents against the mischievous action of the others, would be about as wise on our part as a set of farmers and husbandmen would act, whose flocks and herds had been devoured by wild beasts, and who should quarrel among themselves, whether it was not better to let the lion into the fold, to regulate the bear, the panther, the wolf, and the wildcat. It is true that some of them might argue something like my colleague over the way [Mr. DELLET] in favor of a National Bank, that the lion, by having the choice of food for eight years, (as the bank had from 1816 to 1824) would become so strong and grow so great, that the other beasts would be compelled to keep out of his way; and that by living upon the lean and feeble of the flock, or picking only bones of the lion's carcasses, they would soon become too weak to devour the latter portion, which had the lion's protection, nor for the benefit of the flock, however, but for the benefit of the royal beast.

And, sir, this argument would be fully as sensible as the one so often used by the Whigs, that a National Bank, by giving to it the people's taxes, could regulate not only the appetites of its own stockholders and managers, but also the appetites of the managers and stockholders of every other description of banks, together with the whole brood of shavers, brokers, and dealers in this great paper credit system; and who, without the aliment furnished by the people's taxes, would be compelled either to work or follow some other pursuit, less injurious to the country.

It is my present purpose to establish, by facts that cannot be controverted, that banks and banking, as conducted in the present day, are conducted upon the principles of plundering the great mass of the people. That, in pursuit of this object, they have produced the present embarrassments in the country—that it is the system of false banking of the age, and not our system of Republican Government, which has produced the disorders in our moneyed concerns, so generally and erroneously charged upon Democracy, with the view, as I verily believe, on the part of many persons, to render our people dissatisfied with our form of Government. And, Mr. Chairman, as the late Bank of the United States has been so much an object of admiration with the great Whig party, and as, as a party, they are again trying with all their power, might, and influence, to establish another, I shall also endeavor to show how that great machine was set in motion; how it was conducted; how much its stockholders made out of the people's taxes; and what amount its managers and principal borrowers probably made out of the cotton, flour, tobacco, and other great productions of the country, by means of contractions and expansions.

I consider, Mr. Chairman, that the following facts have been established in this debate beyond question:

First. That for fifty years past banks have constantly been upon the increase, both in England (where for one hundred and fifty years they have had a National Bank to regulate currency) and in the United States, where for forty years of the time we have had a Regulator.

Secondly. That periodical fluctuations in trade, and embarrassment and distress, have been common to both countries.

Thirdly. That when crops of banks, like mushrooms, spring up in either country, and make paper money plenty, men to a great extent abandon industrious pursuits, some expecting to live by trade, and others trying to get along alone upon borrowing paper money, to buy the products of other countries to live upon, and so bring their own in debt.

Fourthly. That bank paper being in such cases always not receivable in foreign countries, where the debts are due, specie is taken from the banks, and carried abroad to pay the debts, and the greater portion of these banks are cut down. The people, then, of the country in debt, are compelled to go to work, and to rely upon their labor and other industrious pursuits, and from the produce of their farms pay off the debts. Having in this manner worked the nation out of debt, (for banks, although they can bring them in debt, never brought them out,) and matters become easy, called good times, those who live by bankcraft get more charters, and raise another crop of banks, which lend out to every body, as before, and get interest upon all the paper they can put off upon the country, until the foreign debt again carries off the specie, and breaks up the banks. That this is the means used by bankcraft to plunder a nation of its labor; that it is carried on in England for the same purpose; that the distress is greater in that country, at this time, where they have a "great regulator," than it is in our country, where they have none; that the people of that country don't charge their distress to a Sub-Treasury, or want of a regulator with us, but all charge it truly to their own banks, and only differ as to which has injured them most, the "great regulator," or the "little robbers," that won't be regulated.

It is also proven here in this debate, that the system is increasing in France, and other countries connected with England in commerce, and is every where subject to the same law of contractions and expansions.

It is impossible to reason upon these facts without being astonished that statesmen who represent the great interests of labor and property, should not at a glance discover that paper money was an invention to obtain the means of the many for the uses of the few; and that it must inevitably devour the substance of the great body of the people, and never ought to be tolerated or allowed, unless upon such principles as would divide out again all that was made in interest to the whole people, to go instead of taxes. If Governments must have banks, and take the people's taxes to bank upon, they have a lawful right to all the profit made upon these taxes; and the giving to any purpose but the whole, is a fraud and violation of the terms upon which we have agreed to associate together.

The French Republic gave the greatest blow to kingcraft and priestcraft, by cutting up the great landed estates, and dividing them out again, which so increased the number, and reduced the sizes, that they were not sufficient to support the noblemen in that style of splendor usual in the surrounding monarchies. The nation therefore began to think earnestly of a more cheap and Democratic form of Government; but Louis Philippe and his ministers, with the sagacity and instincts of men who love power, and fear to lose it, have resorted to corporate privileges as the means of restoring the craft to its former condition, by collecting together in large masses the property of the nation, that it may support the great lords in their ancient splendor, increase the number of their dependants, and with it their power. And shall we, sir, who are the representatives of freemen, bound by our oaths to carry on a Republican Government, and to support the principles of our glorious Revolution; shall we, I say, be guilty of the madness and folly of adopting the same system to benefit the many, which the philosophers and statesmen of France have adopted for their plunder and degradation, and the elevation of the privileged few? Does any man who has examined the system in the least, doubt that it will have this effect? If there is, let him look at another undisputed fact. Is it not proven by information laid upon our tables, that the banks of the United States, together, have in gold and silver only about forty-five millions of dollars, and that they have loaned out upon this sum nearly five hundred and twenty-five millions, upon which the people pay at least six per cent. interest annually, amounting to over thirty-one millions of dollars, being at the rate of seventy-five dollars interest for each hundred dollars of real money? And all this sum is paid out by the working people alone, to save those who have to send or carry money to distant places the trouble of having to carry the specie with them. It has been again and again proven that the paper does not add one cent to the real money on hand; and can any man wonder that so much interest, paid for the use of so little money, should eat up the substance of those who pay it? In fact, it would, in a very short time, consume the property of the great body of the people, were it not that these same paper lenders are like many of the keepers of whiskey shops, the "best customers at their own tap-rooms," and frequently get so rich by borrowing their own money, that they can afford a style of living which makes them unable to pay themselves, and have but the last fashionable excuse left them for their disasters; that is, to turn Whig, and charge it to the Administration. I know, sir, a number of cases of this description.

Having, Mr. Chairman, examined into the system generally, I proceed now to examine into that part of it supported by my colleague [Mr. DELLET] and other gentlemen, as a substitute for this bill—a United States Bank. And I here state, in advance, that all of this clamor about regulating currency, &c. &c. has its origin and foundation in a desire to get hold of the public taxes, that a few, comparatively, may make their private fortunes out of the interest made by lending them out; that it will give a power to the directory to speculate in stocks and property, by making money scarce and plenty at pleasure, and that all of the stockholders will unite with the manufacturers and other great schemes of making the money of the whole support, in extravagance and splendor, the few; and that none of those who appear so solicitous for a National Bank to regulate exchanges, can care any thing about exchanges alone; for if they did, some of them would have proposed a scheme for using the public deposites for this purpose, which could be done at a very low rate, if they were used for this purpose and no other. But this would not give the interest made upon the public money for the private use of stockholders, and nothing but the full use—the banking use—of these taxes, will serve gentlemen, such as the stockholders of the late United States Bank had and enjoyed.

This bank was chartered at a time when the banks in New York, and south and west of that point, were none of them paying specie. It could not, therefore, go into operation without some contrivance to get the specie out of the banks, and it could not make war upon all at once. The managers, therefore, hit upon the plan of uniting with some to plunder the others. They persuaded all to resume specie payments; but, to secure this object, they agreed to lend their credit to such banks in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Richmond, as would resume—about two millions to each New York and Philadelphia, one million to Baltimore, and half a million to Richmond. All south and west of these points were to be plundered. Money soon became very plenty; every thing went up; and the banks South and West thought they could not only resume, but expand. They were soon ripped up, and their specie taken. Then commenced the scenes of ruin and insolvency, fall of prices, and distress throughout the West and South, that has been so feelingly portrayed in the memorials of the different Legislatures, which have been read on this floor, at different periods, from 1817 to 1825, all of which looked to a National Bank as the cause of their embarrassments; some describing its blighting effects as worse than the locusts of Egypt. Every legislative experiment, short of revolution, that a suffering people could adopt, was resorted to. Relief laws, in every form, were tried; old courts and new courts, in Kentucky; taxing branches to keep them out of some States, and property and stay laws in others: and yet no one State, amidst this period of suffering and embarrassment, ever thought of charging the Government with being the cause.

A tariff was gotten up, in 1824, expressly on the ground that the distresses of the country were intolerable, and had never before been equalled. This is the testimony of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] and of his colleague here, [Governor POPE,] who has proposed to charter another National Bank. None of these distinguished men, up to 1825, had found out what produced our difficulties; but when the people of the nation, by hard work, until 1832, had paid off our foreign debts, these same plunderers not only denied being the cause of our debts, but actually set up the claim made by my colleague here, of having paid the public and private debts of the Union, and began again their system of lending and plundering.

We will, however, go upon facts not disputed, and take the testimony of the two Whig witnesses from Kentucky, just named, and fix upon the beginning of the year 1825 as the time when the great regulator, having devoured or subdued the other banks of the country, kindly took the affairs into its hands; and when, according to the poetry of my colleague, the Genius of Plenty appeared in our land, and began to distribute her favors among our people; which was continued until 1832, being a period of eight years, when she became frightened at Gen. Jackson's veto, and let fall her horn, and fled from the land, and, according to the fancy of my colleague, won't come back again until you build her another marble palace, and put the people's taxes into it, that she may again distribute them "ever and anon, to her favorites." But it is woful, Mr. Chairman, to have to relate what, according to Whigery, has happened since that veto; for although the country was then ruined, past all cure, it has been ruined seven times since: First, by the removal of the deposites; second, by the Specie Circular; third, by electing Mr. Van Buren President, and four times more by this bill, which proposes to break off all connection between the Government and banks, and which, sir, has so much alarmed those who want the public taxes to live upon, and who will have to go to work if they cannot get them. This I think is about a fair statement of the condition of things and opinions during the reign of the regulator, and since.

I will now go back and show what the bank made for its stockholders by its charter; what out of the deposites; and what the managers and great borrowers probably made out of planters, farmers, and others, by making money scarce and buying, and then making it plenty and selling. I don't say that the managers did do this, but they have been charged with it, and their loans and discounts have been so made as to lead to this conclusion; and they certainly had the power, and if they did not use it, they might have done so successfully. The first great operation was of the stockjobbing class. It was a scheme of the Bank directors, to raise the price of the stock very high, to sell out for profit. For this purpose, an agent was sent to London, who was directed to provide for the payments of the dividends due upon stock held in England, at that place, at the risk and expense of the Bank. The Government and citizens of the United States did not by this arrangement receive as much dividend on their stock, by the difference in exchange, as foreigners, which carried much of the stock abroad, and it was run up to one hundred and fifty-six dollars per share, of one hundred paid in. The parties, whose views were accomplished by this operation, sold out, and made the rise in price by the speculation. And if they sold the greater part, which is no doubt the true state of the case, made some twelve millions of dollars out of the mere charter of incorporation. It was soon found that the Bank had been so badly managed that the stock again fell to ninety-seven dollars on the share, and those who bought at the high prices found themselves dupes to the amount of fifty-nine dollars upon each share. This mode of making millions, by subscribing for stock and selling it out, is not known to the farmers and working people in the United States, upon whose credit it was got up; and I question whether the constituents of many of us would agree to give them another charter for the same purpose.

I know my colleague will talk of the bonus of one and a half million; but, sir, it is seen here to have been but a mere trifle to give for this "first haul of the great drag net." The great regulator, however, got so much out of repair and credit by this drag, that it could not make but a few dividends until after Mr. Cheves had worked upon it some years, and not then until it had lost to the people upwards of two millions on dividends, that ought and would have been made for the people, but for the stockjobbing affair alluded to. In 1824, however, another set of men began to desire an interest in the public taxes and the stockholders of the National Bank and the manufacturers united to plunder the people, and, according to the language of the gentleman from Philadelphia, [Mr. SERGEANT,] about the law of storms, "when a current was once got up and moving, all similar currents press inwards and upwards, bringing with it all lighter and moveable materials." So with this movement to get the people's taxes—the current was got up for the stockholders of the Bank, the manufacturers come next, and finally States, companies, cities, and districts, all pressed inwards to Congress for money. All were aided by the Bank, because the higher the taxes, the larger the amount of deposites in the Bank to be loaned at interest for stockholders; the higher the taxes upon foreign goods, the higher manufacturers could sell their work; and higher the taxes, the more money to divide out in roads, canals, dry docks, light-houses, and making harbors. And the three great currents, of National Bank, tariff, and internal improvements, having united into one current, which was called the American system, and which set so strong and steady for a while that nearly all the money in the Union was collected and divided out, statesmen abandoned the interests of constituents, to ride upon the storm, which having spent itself, left them a great distance from the path of duty, and makes it now so hard to get back.

But let us now look at the effect. Internal improvement got of the people's money about twenty-five millions of dollars, but few of which will ever return. The Bank got deposites, which they loaned at interest, as they loaned other money, made them between 1817 and 1833, a little upwards of forty-four millions; and no one can tell how much the tariff made to the manufacturers. It is sufficient to state, that from 1816 to 1840, dividing the time into three periods of eight years each, the first would compromise the period agreed upon by all hands as the one when the Bank had no control, being the period of time when it was badly conducted, the next eight years, from 1824 to 1832, when the Bank was vetoed, the Bank had undisputed sway; and had two high tariffs to raise money, and put in its vaults; the next period of eight years, from the veto until the present year, has been filled with Whig lamentations and cries of distress. Now, let us see what it is all about; what facts have they to bellow about. Cotton, tobacco, and flour, in the United States sold for almost double the price between 1816 and 1824, which was given from 1824 to 1832, and sold for greatly more from 1832 to 1840 than from 1824 to 1832. All of the staples were lower in 1831, before the veto of the Bank, than they have been during either of the periods named. This is not all, sir; the tables of prices on our tables, made up from merchants' books in Mobile, Boston, Philadelphia, and Fayetteville, North Carolina, during those periods, not only show these facts, which no one can dispute, but we have proof also negroes were lower, by an average of nearly two hundred dollars per head, during the greater part of the undisputed sway of the Bank and tariffs. But, sir, there are more and better proofs yet behind. Your custom-house books, showing the commerce of the nation, show the same facts. In South Carolina and Georgia, the value of their exports were as follows:

Do	South Carolina,	68 341,842
		$120.978.559
From 1824 to 1832	Georgia,	35,742,052
Do	South Carolina,	63,614,600
Do	Alabama,	11,653,759
		$111,010,408
And from 1832 to 1840,	Georgia,	$68,927,501
Do	South Carolina,	89,000 000

making the exports of Georgia and South Carolina alone, from 1816 to 1824, exceed that of the same States, with Alabama added, from 1824 to to 1832, by nearly ten millions of dollars, and making the exports from the three States in the last period exceed that of the middle period upwards of ninety-five millions; which prove that the Genius of Plenty, of whose kindness my colleague spoke in such eloquent strains, if she did bestow her favors so bountifully, it was only among her bank, tariff and internal improvement favorites. She never got South with her horn, if we are to believe the dry naked tables of facts and figures, presented by merchants' sale books and custom-house returns.

It may be asked, Mr. Chairman, how I account for the present period of great embarrassments? It is plain and easy to a man who has looked on, and disposed to give his mind fair play. The first great period of bank expansions, from 1817 to 1824, made the people extravagant, as they always will be when they can get money abundantly without working for it, and when their families can buy goods abundantly on long credits. This was the harvest of paper money jobbers; but our foreign debt got so large that bank paper ceased to be worth any thing abroad, and specie was demanded; our banks broke, our credit abroad was stopped, and our people had to work the nation out of debt. In 1832, our people had got out of debt, and property began to rise in value, as a natural effect, and credit again returning, it assured the bankers of another harvest, when the United States Bank and all others, began to lend their notes for interest, and with the slight interruption of the panic of 1834, on the removal of the deposites, with the view of getting them back again to the Bank, the regulator and all others strove to see which could extend the credit system farthest, until the people, becoming again extravagant, bought every thing they wanted, instead of working for it, and the debt abroad, becoming great, as before, a run on the banks, suspension of specie payments, a loss of credit abroad was the consequence, and there is no way to get out but for the people to work out as they did from 1824 to 1832. They have been at that since 1837—no banks can help them that could not lend them money at moderate interest, from year to year, and banks cannot do that now; and any disturbance, such as a National Bank, would only make things worse, for it could not start into operation without capital. It cannot get specie otherwise than the late Bank did. It must break up the other banks, and distress the people, who should be indulged as long as possible. Property ought not to be brought down suddenly, as it would be in putting a bank into operation, which would draw the precious metals from every part of the nation, and put them into one heap, compel all of our banks in Alabama to wind up, and ruin our people.

I will now, sir, attempt to show what the managers and borrowers of the late bank and branches probably made out of the flour, tobacco, cotton, and other great articles of production in the country, from 1825 to 1832, for this is the period at which the Bank was in the best condition; the high tariff had filled her vaults with public taxes, and the precious metals, as her returns show. It is well known that many of her managers, especially in the branches, were large shippers and dealers in the great staples of the country, and had undisputed control over her loans. It is known that our crops, the great articles of cotton and tobacco, and in the Western country the flour and pork, come into market in the winter months. Now, Senate Document 128, twenty fifth Congress, will probably shed some light on this hitherto mysterious subject—our planters always had a notion that he who could "hold on" until summer, could get a good price for his cotton, and thousands upon thousands have been paid to commission merchants, to enable them to hold on. But by far the greater portion of these articles are sold from November to May. Now, one would think that a great national institution, having credit all over the world, fed and supported by the people's taxes, would be bound to extend them the helping hand precisely at the time the products of their labor were in market, and would expect to find the loans greatest in the winter and spring months; but so far is this from being true, that the loans, every one of the years from 1825 to 1833, were less by millions at the January half year than at the July half year. Here is the book, sir, containing the bank returns. Curtailments take place precisely at the times our crops are in market, and must therefore sell lower, from the scarcity of money; and expansions are found to have taken place precisely at the time of year that a man who was a large dealer and shipper, and desired a good home market, or who needed extra loans to enable him to hold on and try the foreign.

These half-yearly curtailments in the January reports of the Bank, every year, from 1825 to 1833, make, together, if no mistake is made in addition, $33,140,000, and, making an allowance for the usual deductions in selling our crops in a hard money market for so many years, must have made many millions of dollars to the trading part of the managers of the Bank, and a few great borrowers, who were dealers; besides what they made through the Government, by dealing in stocks, which they could raise or lower the price of at pleasure.

Having shown to this committee how banking above the capital must inevitably injure a country in its property; how it has been conducted by the late United States Bank; the amount it made by its charter at the outset; the enormous amount it made by lending out the public taxes deposited with it, and the probable amount it enabled its managers, and great dealers enjoying its favors, to make out of the cotton, flour, tobacco, pork, and other great productions of the country; how it brought it with it the tariff of 1824, and then again the tariff of 1828, together with the whole system of extravagance and expenditure, called the American System; I am led to pause, and inquire of my colleague, whether he desires to restore the whole system again? Whether he does not know that the stockholders to a National Bank, of fifty or an hundred millions, would not be interested in again increasing the tariff, that they might have large sums deposited with them to lend out, and make the private fortunes of the stockholders? Whether he does not know that the manufacturers would join? Whether he does not know that all the greedy expectants of money to aid in carrying on improvements, would also join? And, finally, whether politicians and candidates for the Presidency would not join in and swell the current, until the scheme would be carried out, and the people again be plundered as they have been? Does he not know that all these things must follow in the train of the new, as they did upon the establishment of the old Bank?

Ah, well! but, says my colleague, the Bank paid Congress a bonus of one and a half millions for her charter; and it would be doubled now for double the capital. I have shown what a pittance was this bonus, compared to what the Bank made out of the people. But, sir, let us inquire into this thing called a bonus for a bank charter, and the right of Congress to give it. We, the people's Representatives, elected for only two years, who can pass no law to tax them, which they cannot repeal the next year if they so choose, undertake to sell to a few men the right to tax and plunder them for twenty years to come, and say that they cannot repeal that law; that we can confer upon others twenty times the power conferred upon us, and which we can exercise ourselves by virtue of our elections. Is not the proposition monstrous? Have we the right to transfer their sovereign power for such length of time, by merely calling it a charter? Have they ever yet agreed to it, when called upon to vote directly on the question? Will they ever agree to it, when fairly put before them? Does my colleague desire to restore the same state of things which existed from 1824 to 1832, when, by a high tariff, a National Bank, and internal improvements, united, the cotton and other products of South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama, did not bring as much money, by more than eleven millions of dollars, as the same products from Georgia and Carolina had done the eight years before, nor but little more than half the amount which the products of the three States brought in the eight years from 1832 to 1840? Can he make the people of those States believe that it is better to live under the dominion of the system upon half allowance, than to be free from it upon a full one?

I have said, Mr. Chairman, and I think proven, that a National Bank, a protective tariff, and the system of internal improvements, are necessary to each other; that they assist each other in making common war upon labor and property; that they were not authorized by the letter or spirit of the Constitution; and that the acts of Congress granting them were an extension of the powers of Government by implication, and that the same stretch of power would enable Congress to usurp every power retained to the people of the States, and break down every barrier intended to control its own action.

It is certainly true, sir, that the power to charter a bank was not known to exist in the Constitution, by those who framed that instrument; else it is impossible to reconcile the contradictory opinions of the great men who made the Constitution, and who were so shortly afterwards called upon to declare its powers, by voting upon the bill to charter the first bank. Many wholly denied the power, and of those who supposed it to be given, they differed as to the article or section of the Constitution in which it was to be found. No man in his senses would for one moment suppose, that if Washington had known of the existence of such a power, he would so shortly afterwards have kept the bill to charter the first bank ten days under consideration, doubting a power which he knew he possessed, and consulting the other great men around him, whether it was to be found, when they, too, knew it existed. Such conduct would have been disgraceful to Washington and his cabinet; and to suppose them guilty of such manœuvring, when "they had made the Constitution for that purpose," as has been contended here, is against all rules of evidence, as well as common sense.

General Washington himself, and many others who desired the charter, were afraid that it was an encroachment upon the liberties of the people, and therefore hesitated; and whenever the question has been left to the people to vote upon, they have denied the power. And, sir, well and wisely have they acted; for, give the money power of this nation to twenty irresponsible directors for twenty years, and the voting power is not worth much to the people for the whole of that period; the money power being stronger than the voting power, Congressmen will obey the stronger. This power, therefore, never was intentionally given, and it was not attempted until the idea of extending the powers of Congress, by implication, was introduced into our public councils, which would enable it to take as well what was needful as what was desirable. I have, therefore, a word or so to say upon the propriety of encroaching upon public liberty by implication only, and without express authority. To make this question also plain, we must resort to the most simple mode of illustration; for which purpose, I will take thirteen of the gentlemen around me to represent the thirteen old States, and suppose them to have settled in the wilderness as neighbors, and with the usual difficulties attending new settlers; and feeling their difficulties about bread, they determined to build a mill, and for that purpose engage my colleague [Mr. DELLET] to carry it on, and agree with him, in writing, that they will furnish him, at all times, one horse and one ploughman, to plough his grounds and to support his family, and to give him a certain toll, agreed upon, for keeping the mill. We will suppose, sir, that they get along pretty well satisfied; for a while they are relieved from the hardship of beating their meal, and are content. He, from his mill and tolls, and from his ploughman and horse, which they readily keep up, begins to increase his means rapidly, and soon has the ability to pay for any spare labor on the other farms. He opens more lands than they can, and extends the size of his fields, and one horse and one ploughman become insufficient to plough his lands. He tells the other gentlemen that he cannot get along without an occasional extra horse and ploughman. The thirteen don't get alarmed at this; it looks reasonable; and, without recurring to the contract, they furnish it. This increase of help enables the miller to extend farther, until it takes another and another horse and ploughman; and when it begins to oppress those who are least able to bear the burden, they begin to complain; and if, by this time, their families should have grown up, intermarried, and settled off, to the amount of some twenty-six, those living most convenient to the mill deriving most of the benefit, whilst those at a distance received little or none, they might all want to go back to the contract, the more especially if the miller's demands for more ploughmen, and more plough horses, were to go on increasing, with the increasing of his wealth and extension of his fields. His demands might become so great that it would require more hands and more horses to cultivate his lands, than they, together, had left for the twenty-six. They would begin to inquire how it was that they had worked so hard and kept so poor, whilst my colleague (the miller) had lived so easily, fared so well, and at the same time grown so rich. And my colleague would, doubtless, contend for a different construction of the contract from what the other gentlemen and their families would insist upon; unless, indeed, some of them had become interested in his tolls and possessions, and then we should have, as we have here, two parties, putting different constructions upon the same agreement. The most numerous party would contend that the object they had in view when they made the agreement, was to get their grain ground for one horse and one ploughman to work the miller's fields, and to allow him only a certain toll for grinding, whilst my colleague (the miller) and his party would contend that his object, in making of the bargain, was to get his fields cultivated, and to support his family; and, to effect that object, he not only had a right to the express grant of one horse and one ploughman, but to the implied grant of as many horses and ploughmen as were required to work his grounds and support his family. And as they had greatly increased in number, he might insist that he had a right to use all other means which he might deem proper, to increase his tolls, and, among others, he might claim the right to compel them all to grind at his mill, or pay double or treble toll. This would be getting power by implication; and my colleague, as the miller, "feeding his hogs upon other men's corn," would, without doubt, like very well to be enabled to put this interpretation upon the contract; but how would the other gentlemen and their families like it? Would they not go back to the express wording of the bargain? And would they not insist upon carrying on the mill for the toll agreed upon, and for the use of the one plougman and one horse? Would they listen to the miller's demands upon them, for all of their horses and all of their laborers, under the pretence that he having so long had the use of them, he now had a right to them; that he claimed the whole by precedent and usage; and that shortly after the mill was built, and before they had made more than two crops; they had yielded to his demands, and given him, occasionally, an additional horse and hand, without dispute, to assist in cultivating his farm? Would the other gentlemen hear and tolerate such a construction, put upon so plain a bargain, and submit to my colleague's demand? I think not, sir. I think that they would allege that they, too, had an object in view; that they, too, had fields to cultivate and familes to support; and that the object they had in view, and not the miller's, should be considered. And has it never occurred to my colleague, and those who act with him, that the great body of the people had an object in forming our Constitution? That it was intended for their benefit and their posterity, and not made alone for the benefit of a tax consuming set of privileged classes, whether they are judges, legislators, or other officers, or whether merchants, manufacturers, or bankers? And is it not our duty to give it that construction which its plain reading expresses, and not extend it, by implication, until you give all to the privileged few?

This bill, Mr. Chairman, which we are now about to pass, is intended to place a proper construction upon the powers of Congress. It confines the overgrown miller to his bargain as made, to the one horse and one ploughman, and compels him to keep the mill for single toll. And, sir, it is no wonder that you hear such grumbling among his well-fed, half-worked, and lazy family and dependants, or that you hear such a squealing among his pigs.

This bill will most effectually prevent the excessive importations of foreign goods, because the importing merchants, being bankers or stockholders in most of the moneyed institutions of the country, knowing that if they brought more goods into the country than the produce would pay for, that specie would be carried out for the excess; and having to pay cash upon the landing of the goods, the slightest excess of importation, above the wants of the country, would instantly be felt; and as the effects would fall upon them immediately, before they could get the goods out in the country, and sell them off to the country merchants, they would as instantly obey this great law of trade; they would instantly look to the produce of the country, and not bank loans, for means, and never import more foreign goods than crops and other exports of the country would pay, lest a run be made on their banks for specie, and their stocks come down, together with their profits on banking. The cotton bag, therefore, would be looked to, and take precedence of the bank bill, being good all over the world, and the bank bill only good at home, for which it was alone intended.

I know, sir, that at first this will go hard with our merchants; it will give them some trouble in labor, but will save them a great deal of sleep, which, I fear, many of them lose as I do when I get a notice that "grace is out on my note;" but it will restore business to its natural course, and will shake off a host of dependants who live upon public taxes; and I therefore support it as a great measure of deliverance and liberty; as a measure, securing to the people that power in the Government intended by our fathers; giving value to the right of suffrage, by preventing the sale of that right, for twenty years at a time, for a miserable bonus, a mere mess of pottage.

Do you believe, sir, that those who framed the Constitution ever intended that we should have a National Bank? Don't you know that bank paper, in any shape, always has, and always will, bring a people in debt? Would they, then, who had toiled so long for our liberties, in the same Constitution, have been guilty of the madness and folly of providing a system, of all others calculated to drive specie out of the country, and bring us in debt; and, also, at the same time declare that nothing but gold and silver should pay a debt? No, sir; they had too much wisdom to be charged with such folly, and too much patriotism to have been guilty of such wickedness. I will believe no one who makes the charge against them.

Now, sir, if I have shown that a National Bank is unconstitutional or dangerous to liberty, and that this bill is constitutional, safe, and beneficial, as a mode of collecting, keeping, and paying out the public moneys, I shall, in the hour allotted to me this evening, have fully answered the two days' speech of my colleague, [Mr. DELLET,] and his forty-one reasons against Mr. Van Buren's re-election, which will all, probably, be found to have originated in his pledge to veto a National Bank. But for the President's opposition to this great machine, my colleague, together with the greater portion of his party, would fall into ranks, and would, without doubt, pronounce him the most courteous, gentlemanly, and talented statesman who ever yet filled the Presidential chair.

It has reconciled the Opposition to Mr. Madison. They had forgiven him for carrying on the war against England. But Mr. Jefferson, who lived and died an enemy to corporate privilege, has (although he wrote our Declaration of Independence) never been forgiven. They want some man who can persuade the people that they are suffering more than any people ever suffered before, and, by that means, bring the voters and President to give them another chance to demand the labor of all the plough horses and all of the ploughmen in the Union, together with the keeping of the mill, and some to take single or double toll, at pleasure.

There is, however, so much error, so artfully mixed up and plausibly told, in my colleague's speech, that it may be thought incumbent upon me to examine and expose it. I shall not have time to answer that part which rests upon assertion, matters of opinion, or denunciation; but where he comes to facts and figures, and founds his argument upon these, I shall attempt a brief reply.

He supposes that in seventeen years, from 1816 to 1833, there was used, in carrying on the business of the nation, one hundred and sixty millions of dollars, which had to change hands at least five times every year, and that the domestic exchanges on that money, without a National Bank, would have been eight millions each time, which he says, would amount to forty millions a year, and in seventeen years, to upwards of six hundred millions, which he alleges was saved by the late bank to the people, besides $23,740,820 saved to the Government, being five per cent on the revenues. (See his speech, pages 14 and 15.) My colleague says that "every Loco Foco will attempt to ridicule his calculation;" but, he says, "make the calculation, and the result cannot be be ridiculed or laughed to scorn."

Now, as my colleague has made the same calculations on page 16 of his speech, to show what he pretends the people are now losing for want of a regulator, and that the passage of this bill will give to brokers and shavers forty millions a year, and has made this calculation the frame work of a two days' speech, I will, in a few words, take this frame to pieces, and show, beyond question, that it deserves not only ridicule by those he calls Loco Focos here, but that there is not a sheriff or a constable in the Union, accustomed to handling and changing bank notes, who cannot answer and laugh to scorn this effort of the great Whig leader in debate, on the project of recommending to the country the establishment of a National Bank.

We will begin with the item which he says was saved to Government at the rates of $1,390,636 per annum. In this he mixes up and confuses the two subjects of discount on bank paper, and that of exchange; exchange being nothing but the cost of transportation, and insurance of gold and silver, from once place to another, and never could be charged upon a larger sum than had to be sent away, from the place where collected to the place where it is to be used. For instance, the large sums collected at New York, and paid out at that place, would pay no exchange whatever; so at Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Charleston, Richmond, Norfolk, Savannah, Mobile, New Orleans, St. Louis, and all the smaller places of collection throughout the Union. And as the armies and navies, and other charges on the Government, are nearly all at those points, it is clear that upon the greater portion of the revenue no exchange could be charged, and the whole of this mighty sum dwindles into comparative insignificance; for exchange on specie, or the notes of specie-paying banks, (the only money the Government would ever receive,) could never average above two per cent. upon the amount actually sent off from the place collected. Yet my colleague having made this blunder the foundation of his building, goes on to show how the people would lose yearly at the same rate; and not only adopts this as the rate of exchange, and asserts that it will be charged on all of their transactions, but he has made this further extraordinary discovery, to wit: that if a man had a hundred dollar bill, which was worth but ninety-five dollars in money, and it is changed five times, it loses forty dollars; consequently, if you were to change it twenty times, it would, according to his argument, all be lost; for he says that one hundred and sixty millions, changed five times in the year, loses forty millions; and that if the same bank notes were used for seventeen years, they would lose upwards of six hundred millions. Now, this beats any thing I ever heard of yet, not excepting the case of the three Chinese jugglers, who visited our country some years ago, to exhibit their wonderful skill at deception. Meshech came first upon the stage, when Shadrach ran out and swallowed him; then Abednego came and swallowed the two; and being left with nothing else to swallow, turned a flip-flap somerset and swallowed himself. My colleague has so far beaten this, that he has made one hundred and sixty millions of dollars, in bank bills, not only swallow themselves, but also eat up four hundred and forty millions in addition; and I have no doubt but that he can prove it by all of the Whigs in the Union who witnessed the performance.

Now, seriously, Mr. Chairman, is there a constable in the Union who does not know that if he buys a hundred dollar bill for ninety-five dollars, and it suffers no further depreciation, that he has ninety-five dollars in money every time it is changed thereafter; if he changed it a thousand times in the year, it would lose but the five dollars. There is another answer in relation to the great cry of brokers and shavers being about to have such a harvest if we pass this bill. It is this, sir; they understand well their own business; and the great brokers and shavers are all Whigs, against this bill, and for a United States Bank.

There are two objections raised by my colleague against the bill, not founded upon his calculations just referred to. The first is, that if you pass this bill, you reduce the price of wages, and men won't work. The second is, that it will have an unfavorable effect upon the education of the youth of the country. My own observation has satisfied me that both objections are unfounded. The great amount of bank issues has evidently multiplied the idlers of the country, and every experienced teacher in the country will tell you that boys supplied with money will not study as long as they can get an opportunity of spending it. And, sir, these, and such as these, are the reasonings gentlemen bring forward here and publish, to go out among a nation, to induce them to give their liberty into the keeping of a few bank directors. It is true, they cry out distress, and beg the people to change the Administration; but it is equally true, that their own system has brought the distress upon us. Have they not concealed the facts of the case from the people, to induce them to change? Has not the public press, to a great extent, aided them in this cry against the Government, to divert the public attention from this system, practised by the plunderers of millions? Have the people not been told that the world could not supply specie for needful business, for the purpose of keeping them quiet, and making them labor for the paper makers? Have they not been told that the country never suffered so much for money before; and that prices were never so low as now? Have they ever been told by the bankites that prices were lower in 1831 than at any other time since the United States Bank was chartered, and that there had then been no veto by General Jackson? Why don't they tell or admit this fact to the people? Why don't they tell them that crops from farms did not bring, from 1824 to 1832, when the Bank had full sway, as much money, by hundreds of millions, as the same articles would sell for either the eight years afterwards or the eight years before? Why did they not tell the Southern people that the produce of South Carolina and Georgia, from 1816 to 1824, was worth, and sold, for nearly ten millions of dollars more money than the crops of the same States, with Alabama added in, during the eight years which the regulator reigned undisturbed; and that the crops, the eight years after the veto, from the three States, nearly sold for double what they did during national bank dominion? Why don't they tell the people the cause of distress and low prices in 1831, if they know the cause? If they did not know, then, how do they know now? They did not charge it to the Government, then, for the bank and Government were partners in using the public taxes. What right have they now to charge the present low prices and distress to the want of a national bank, when prices were so much lower the eight years the bank was in full blast, and when prices are now lower and distress greater in England, where they have, than here, where we have no national bank? They tell the people that it is for want of a national bank in our country that other banks have sprung up among us; when they know that banks have multiplied in England, where they have one much stronger than ours. They tell the people that a national bank here would keep down overbanking and overtrading. At the same time they know that overbanking and overtrading goes on in England, and that all of their present distress is charged to that cause—the royal bank blaming the smaller banks, and those in turn laying the blame upon the royal bank—and thus is England plundered and starved by them, and her people, like ours, quarrelling with each other about which of the beasts is most destructive. I call upon my colleague and his Whig friends to tell the people these things as they actually do exist; to tell them, that when paper money flooded the country in 1835 and 1836, that it was the joint action of the banks, both in England and the United States. Tell them that it was this that enabled our merchants to fill our country with goods upon a credit. Tell them that more than ten millions of dollars has been spent in fine carriages, by people who did not need them, and who would not have thought of buying had they first labored for the money. Tell them how many millions more were laid out in gold watches and other jewellery, and the still more millions in a variety of other articles of furniture, needless to a Republican people, and the names of which were not even known to citizens now using them, a dozen years ago. Tell them that all of these things have brought them in debt, and that they have got to work out, and not to give up their liberty to bankers, with the vain and foolish belief that they will help them out. Tell them, if they do, that they will still not only have to work out of debt, but that the nation will also, as they did before, have to work for money for these bankers to pay their stock with. Tell all these things as they truly exist, and no people upon earth would dream of again setting such a machine as a National Bank in motion.

I have, Mr. Chairman, a few general remarks to make to the old, experienced portion of this House, and I shall close. It will be remembered that, at the gloomiest period of our Revolution, Major Andre, a British officer, was sent into our army to try the effect of gold upon its officers, and that he found a general whose extravagant habits and ambitious feelings induced him to agree to sell his country for the means of gratification. You will remember that this same officer, on his return to the British headquarters, was arrested by three soldiers, whose whole property was not worth a month's pay of the general; and yet, sir, all the gold which Major Andre could offer was not sufficient to procure his release. Here is a case for the deepest reflection of the statesman. Extravagant habits, we are told, had corrupted Arnold, and though a general, he would sell and betray his country for the means of gratification, whilst the three plain living soldiers had a high-souled patriotism, a devotion to liberty, that gold could never buy. And, sir, is this system of paper money again to be set up in our land, to make our people extravagant, and corrupt their principles? Are they already so far gone that, like Arnold, they will sell their liberty, and that of their children after them, for a little more paper money? I do not believe it. I know, sir, that paper money is not needed to add to our happiness, or our devotion to our country. Where I grew up we had, until after the late war, but little, if any, paper money. Our people had an abundance of every thing our country produced—dollars were, it is true, not very plenty with us, and were cut up for change, but we were rich in patriotism—and when the blast of war came upon our land, the question was not who should go, but who should be left at home; and from Rutherford county, Tennessee, alone, eleven companies were out in service together—a larger amount, in proportion to the population, than ever yet left a bank district voluntarily on such an errand. Well, sir, when some of these young men, who marched to New Orleans, after a hard and fatiguing journey, arrived at the place of destination, ragged, fatigued, and disfigured with pine smoke, they were called upon to meet the enemy in their ragged condition, upon the first landing of his forces. The camp of the British commander was charged on the night of the 23d of December, 1814, and some fifteen or twenty of these young men, from General Coffee's brigade of volunteers, were wounded and made prisoners, and kept in the British lines. The next morning, whilst they were lying in their gore, upon a heap of rice straw, furnished to keep them from freezing, a British officer came among them, and read, first in French, and (finding he was not understood) then in English, a proclamation, written to induce the French population in Louisiana to desert our standard and join theirs. No sooner did those Tenneseeans comprehend his meaning, and that he thought, from their ragged and half-starved appearance, that they were beggars, who had been forced into service, than they told him to stop; that they were not beggars, or the boys of the neighborhood, but soldiers, who had volunteered and marched more than a thousand miles to meet them. The British officer said that it was impossible; but upon being assured of its truth, by one of them stating what had occurred a few weeks previous at Pensacola, he, in the presence of the soldiers composing the guard, indignantly swore that "he would not serve a Government that could not clothe him better; that beggars in England were better dressed than our President's soldiers." I do not think it out of place to state here, sir, that the proclamation (written and published by the British commander to induce the French population, who but a short time had been citizens of the United States, to abandon our standard and join theirs) did not denounce our Government and then President more grossly than I have heard the Government and our now President denounced on this floor. The splendor of the British uniform, the show of the epaulet, the blaze of the standard of colors, the rich, deep, and soul stirring music of the band, were the blandishments held out to our young men then. We have the grandeur of British power, her armies, navies, palaces, cities, towns, and improvements, pointed out to us on this floor, as objects worthy of our imitation now.

But, sir, notwithstanding the opprobrium cast upon our youth by this haughty and insulting Briton, intended no doubt to act upon the minds of their own soldiers, no sooner had night come, and these soldiers been left to themselves, than they would come and lie down among our ragged wounded men, and talk with them all night, desiring to know how they would be treated, if they could get away and stay in our country. Our men were astonished, and asked them if they could leave their country; and whether they had not friends and relations, and could leave them also. They replied, "that they had relations and friends, dear to them as life itself," and a country "the most lovely upon earth," and utterance was almost choked when they spoke; but they said "they could do nothing there." It was bad Government that drove them from home, and to get clear of which they were willing to leave father, mother, sister, and brother, and come to a place pointed out to them as a wilderness, and its inhabitants little better than savages. And is this the Government whose navies, armies, structures, and establishments, whose funding system, National Bank, and national debts, are held out to us in such glowing colors, as worthy of our imitation? I, sir, want none of them; a plain Republican form of Government is good enough for me and mine; and I have seen enough of the glories of the British system. It was love of splendor and show that made Arnold a traitor. It was high-souled patriotism and love of country, in the bosoms of three poor but honest soldiers, that saved a country from his treason. It was this same feeling, burning in the bosoms of the Tennessee youth, that made them (although their country was poor) by thousands volunteer in her defence, and bear the sufferings I have mentioned; and it was the grinding oppression of the multitudes in England, to create splendor and abundance for her lords, that induced her sons to come out from its splendor, to abide with us, in our supposed destitution. Is not this true, sir? If not, let the statesmen here present, let the men of talents and philosophy, tell what it was that led the young men of the one country voluntarily to march thousands of miles, and expose themselves upon the field of slaughter, for the defence of one, whilst the youth of the other, who had been brought thousands of miles in ships, to a supposed wilderness, would desert the standard of the other, and abandon their homes, never to look upon such loved objects again. Was it not "free Government" on the one part, and tyranny and oppression on the other?

It was England's whole system of oppressions, the paper system being the chief, that has so impoverished her people; and, sir, if you will tell ours plain truth, they will have none of it among them. They will remember the sufferings of our Revolutionary fathers; and when you cry "hard times," and make panic speeches, to induce them to give up Republican principles, they will remember the three poor soldiers, whose love of country was above price, and they will despise the name of Arnold, whose love of show made him sell himself, and attempt to sell his country, for the means of gratification. And when you hold out to them your schemes of national greatness, glory, and splendor, they will think of that system, in England, which first drives her children into armies for bread, and then to desertion, to better their condition. And, sir, from the time that our Tennessee young men lay prisoners in the British camp near Orleans, I have looked towards the policy of that Government as one to be shunned by ours. I know something of that power, and the cold, calculating, selfish policy which governs her councils. And, sir, among parties at home, I have always opposed that party which the British aristocracy desired to succeed. They will always be found to favor those who look more to find out how "power may be maintained in a Government," rather than how "liberty may be preserved to a people."

It was this feeling that made me oppose the second Adams; and it was this that made me oppose General Jackson's proclamation and force bill—the first, and I believe the only measure of his that ever received the support of my colleague and other distinguished politicians of our country. And it was this feeling that led me again to support him, for his opposition to this great Government machine, "a National Bank." And, sir, because I know that the English statesmen are opposed to Democratic Republican principles, I will cling the closer to them. It is because I know that her Barings and wealthy bankers are opposed to this great measure—divorcing Bank and State—that I support it, and conclude that it is for the good of the country that the bill should pass.

SPEECH OF MR. HOLLEMAN,

OF VIRGINIA,

In the House of Representatives, June , 1840—On the bill for the collecting, safekeeping, and disbursing of the public revenue.

Mr. HOLLEMAN next rose to address the committee, and observed that although he could not promise such intellectual entertainment as they had enjoyed from the gentleman who had just taken his seat, he would endeavor to present to the committee a more practical view of the subject before it; he could at least assure them that he should avoid drawing so largely as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RAYNER] had done upon his imagination; indeed he believed he had not much talent for that sort of discussion; not that he wished to disparage or undervalue brilliant displays of this kind; they were often highly interesting, and some times might be useful; but this was not generally the case, especially in the discussion before a deliberative assembly, of a subject eminently practical in its bearings. I, said Mr. H. go rather for utility; I like best to deal in facts and arguments, leaving rhetorical flourishes and ornament to those who have more taste for them. Nor shall I suffer myself to be drawn into counter denunciations in reply to such, which had so liberally been hurled by gentlemen in the Opposition at the heads of all those in power, from the President downward. We have heard them assailed with many opprobrious epithets, many hard names. They have been called at one time "tyrants," at another "fools." They have been accused of base and truckling servility, with obsequious submission to the nod and beck of Executive power. Now, sir, all this is not argument. Calling hard names proves nothing; and the difference is wide between denunciation and demonstration. I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I have been not a little astonished at the taste of honorable gentlemen. It seems to me strange that in this great theatre of national legislation, before the assembled Representatives of the American people, they should be so far mistaken as to attempt to produce conviction by dealing in widespread wholesale, indiscriminate, senseless denunciation. Do not gentlemen know that this may be retorted upon themselves with very great force? We have been called public leeches; it is said we go for the spoils; that we feast on the blood of the nation; that our only and ultimate object is pelf; that we are swayed and turned, and led about by those appliances which the Executive has in such variety and abundance at his control; that a nod, a wink, the slightest indication of his will, is enough to make us the advocates or the opponents of any public measure. Why, sir, what would be easier than to retort such language as this? To call gentlemen on the other side of the question a horde of hungry wolves, whose mouths are watering for the emoluments and spoils of office, and who are pressing on, in one eager, rapacious mass, to satiate their ravenous appetites with the good things at the disposal of the Government? Experience has taught us to conclude, when we hear any individual indulging in unsparing abuse, or unfounded suspicions of all around him, that he judges others from the feelings in his own breast, and that from a foul heart go forth evil words. I will not charge this upon those who are so liberal in their imputations on the friends of this bill: its friends and its opponents are both before the public eye, and the people will judge between us. When the late President was once called upon to remove an individual from office, he was said to have remarked: "if the gentlemen who are so urgent for the removal of this man from office will convince me that they do not want the office themselves, I will remove him." So now, if the gentlemen, who so loudly and so bitterly denounce those in power, can convince the American people that they are not longing after power themselves, the country may listen to them, and perhaps comply with their wishes; but those who live themselves in fragile glass houses, should remember the old proverb, which eminently applies in this case, and not throw stones.

But no more of this. The bill before the committee, I need not say, is one of great interest to the future condition of this country. It has been ably discussed, and the presumption is, that all those here present have, ere this, fully made up their minds as to what vote they will give. I have, I must confess, been not a little surprised at hearing gentlemen complain that the advocates of the bill are in such a hurry to pass it. "Why so much anxiety? Why this intemperate, this furious haste to rush upon a measure of such grave importance?" Will gentlemen look back, for a moment, to the early part of the session, and remember the language they then held? Were we not taunted with our delay? Did they not call upon us, almost dare us, to bring up the bill? When, yielding to the statements of those who presided over the Departments, and their urgent representations of the pubic necessities, we consented to give precedence to the general appropriation bill, did they not complain that the Sub-Treasury bill was held back? Did they not ask if we were in earnest, or if we really intended to bring it forward at all? Yet now, almost at the close of the session, they complain just as loudly that we are in a desperate hurry, and refuse the necessary time for deliberation.

Really, sir, it seems impossibe to please gentlemen; they are determined not to be satisfied, so I think our best course is not to attempt it. Again, I have been surprised (and yet I ought not, for if ever the old proverb nil admirandum held good any where it does here) at the wonderful arguments we hear. I have been at a loss to conjecture what they will advance next. They have conjured up before us "hydras, gorgons, and chimeras dire," with all the gravity of one who believed in them "to frighten men from their propriety." What, sir? Are we children? Are we to be scared by things like these? They have collected together in one fearful group whatever they can find in the shape of public calamity for these ten years past, and laid it at the door of the present Administration; and thence proceeding, have prophesied nothing short of general ruin and desolation to be be brought about by the outrageous and tyrannical acts of this corrupt and profligate Administration. Because sad reverses have taken place in the business of our people during the Presidency of Mr. Van Buren, they infer as a matter of course that the one event is the cause of the other. Yet the gentleman from North Carolina, who draws this inference, himself argues most strenuously against it, as applied to the case of the Bank of England. We are plied with this argument from day to day, and from month to month. Because those who now administer the Government are desirous that its revenue shall be paid in gold and silver, and shall be sustained in its own custody, and about the same time the prices of produce are somewhat lower than than they have been, they infer that one is the consequence of the other. Now when, for a long succession of time, and under various conditions and circumstances, two things are found invariably connected, such for instance as the roar of thunder succeeding the flash of lightning, it is philosophical to conclude that there is a natural connection between them, and that the one is the cause of the other; but such a conclusion is wholly unwarrantable, when deduced from only a single example, because here the coincidence may be purely accidental, and, though the two things be simultaneous, there may be no connection whatever between them. Now, if I can show that a similar depression of prices and stagnation of business have repeatedly taken place when no Independent Treasury existed, or was proposed, it should, I think, satisfy every candid man who opposes this bill, that he attributes our existing difficulties to the wrong cause.

Mr. Chairman, we are now, at length, after the continuance of a contest in this country for three years, between two great systems for the management of our fiscal affairs, about to see that contest brought to a close. The advocates of these systems, like the cohorts of different nations brought into the battle field, have long been manœuvring, but have abstained from crossing bayonets. Now comes the shock of battle. The enemies of this bill have now thrown off the mask, and are coming out boldly and openly with their substitute for it, and the people can now see plainly what these gentlemen have in view, for they admit in so many words that they wish this bill to be rejected, and they thus avow themselves in favor of a National Bank. In this manly avowal, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POPE] took the lead. At the beginning of the session he came forward like a man and told us what he wanted; others have since done the same. I differ entirely with that honorable gentleman in his views on the Bank. Yet I cannot but admire the boldness of his conduct in thus committing himself and his party. The issue is now fairly made up, and we are to see whether the fiscal concerns of this nation are to be conducted through a United States Bank, or whether the Government is to manage its own affairs by its own agents. We were formerly told that the Bank of the United States was dead and buried; but we now see that it is again revived and in the field. The great issue is once more to be tried before the people.

After so many gloomy pictures of the unconstitutional and destructive nature of the measure proposed in this bill, it may be well to go back a little to first principles to examine the acts and opinions of our fathers, and to see what were their views on this subject.

Soon after the adoption of the Constitution, a law was passed for the regulation of the Treasury Department; and in examining the provisions of that law we shall be able to see whether a National Bank was selected or considered as the best mode of keeping the public treasure. The law was passed in 1789, and this is its language:

"AN ACT to establish the Treasury Department.

"SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the Treasurer to receive and keep the moneys of the United States, and to disburse the same on warrants drawn by the Secretary, &c He shall at all times submit to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Comptroller, or either of them, the inspection of the moneys in his hands; and shall give bond and security for the faithful performance of the duties in his office, and for the fidelity of the persons to be by him employed," &c.

Now, if this plan of an Independent Treasury, under consideration, be a measure so monstrous, so unparalleled in its absurdity and wickedness, as gentlemen suppose, how did it happen that the fathers of the Republic were guilty of establishing it almost in the terms of this bill? They enacted that the public money should be kept by a Treasurer; that he alone should pay it out, and should submit the moneys to the inspection of officers appointed for that purpose. These are the very provisions of the present bill. Like the law of eighty-nine, it declares that the public money shall be received, kept, and disbursed by Government officers, and that it shall be inspected from time to time by persons appointed for that purpose. There were very strong reasons why our fathers should have adopted a plan of this kind, and why they should require the revenue to be paid in gold and silver only. Sir, they were in the full enjoyment of a most beautiful paper system. The idea of the gentleman from North Carolina was realized—the circulation was full, even to overflowing—the country had never possessed so much circulating medium before; and according to the argument of gentlemen, its condition ought to have been happy and prosperous in the highest degree. A gentlemen, in the course of this debate, read to us a market bill, made out at that time; and it shows that the currency was gloriously full, indeed. Veal and lamb were then at eighty cents per pound—good fresh butter at three dollars, and a pair of shoes at a hundred and twenty dollars.

A lieutenant in the Revolution once received thirty thousand dollars for his month's pay. Sir, it was a glorious time; we enjoyed a paper currency in its highest perfection. A lieutenant was certainly well paid when his wages amounted to thirty thousand dollars a month. Unfortunately, however, he had to pay out the whole amount for one uniform coat. Here we see the doctrine of a full currency in all its beauties. How cruel it was to reduce the price of labor when it stood at a hundred dollars a day. A most flagitious attack on the interests of the poor man. The poor man, however, did not then think so. The unanimous voice of the entire people condemned the system as most ruinous, and when the convention assembled to form a Constitution, they determined to abolish it as fast as possible; and with a view to prevent its recurrence, they inserted the provision that no State of the Union should be allowed to issue bills of credit. They had seen and suffered so much under a bloated paper circulation, that they resolved upon a general reform. So flagrant and so multiplied were the evils of the system, that nothing can excuse it but the plea of absolute necessity. Our liberties were at stake. We were waging the war of freedom, and almost any thing was justifiable, which would enable us to go through it at almost any sacrifice. When, therefore, we come to look at the bill, we find it reverts to the principles of 1789.

It requires the public money to be collected in the only currency known to the Constitution. I utterly deny that the Constitution ever contemplated that paper money should be received for Government dues. The Convention prohibited the use of bills of credit to the States, and they certainly did not intend to use them themselves. But we are grown so wise that we have no respect for the work of our venerated ancestors.

"We think our fathers fools, so wise we grow;
Our wiser sons, perhaps, will think us so."

There can be no doubt that the fathers of this Republic never contemplated such a thing as receiving or paying out the dues of the Government in paper money. That is an invention of modern times. It was one feature, and a favorite one, in the policy of the Federal party, to link the destinies of the Government with those of moneyed corporations, and thus, indirectly, acquired an accumulation of power, united to their ambitious designs, but dangerous to republican doctrines.

I will now, Mr. Chairman, advert to the operation of the Independent Treasury system in reference to the losses which it is said will accrue under it. And I ask what consequences will flow from having the public money kept by Government officers, different from what now exist, and always have existed? Wherever the public money has been deposited, it has always been received in the first instance by public officers; and it has always been transferred into the hands of disbursing agents, so that every dollar of the public treasure has twice passed through the hands of individuals. And gentlemen do not propose to change this state of things, but take a distinction between officers who receive and disburse the public moneys, and officers who keep them. I cannot see the grounds of the distinction. Have not the former class an opportunity to defraud the Government as completely as those of the latter? What is there to prevent them? Can they not conceal the amount of moneys they receive? Cannot they do this under a Bank of the United States, or under the State banks? Has there ever been a financial system known among men, which could entirely prevent peculation? Never; and no scheme the wit of man can devise ever will prevent it, till all men shall become honest. When that happy time shall arrive when men will beat their swords into plough shares, and their spears into pruning hooks, and shall learn war no more, then, probably, Government will cease to lose by faithless agents; but so long as men remain corrupt and avaricious, we may expect that losses, to a greater or less extent, will be incurred.

There must also be disbursing officers, as we have always had; and even if we establish a Bank of the United States, they may defraud the Government: and the Bank, so far from preventing this evil, will only increase the danger by introducing a third set of agents.

According to this bill, there are to be some few receiving officers, and in the hands of some of them there will occasionally be large sums of money. No doubt they may defraud the Government. But would a National Bank prevent this? Did not frauds and peculations prevail to an immense extent under the Bank of the United States? It is unjust and unfair to draw a comparison, as is frequently done by gentlemen on the other side of the House, between individuals and banks, because they themselves do not propose to dispense with receiving and disbursing officers. The only just comparison is between the banks and the few new officers who are to be created. A comparison of losses under these officers and under banks is worth nothing; it is perfectly idle, since the same opportunity to defraud will confessedly exist under your bank system. Under a bank there will be more probability of loss from individuals, because, as the money received is expected to be placed in bank, the Treasury Department will not be so cautious in taking ample security; but when the money is to remain in the hands of receivers, more care will be exercised, and heavier bonds will be required.

The great danger apprehended from the Independent Treasury is, that it will destroy the banks. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RAYNER] seems to think this a necessary and inevitable consequence; he predicts that every bank from Maine to Georgia will in the end be prostrated.

Sir, I only wish that the system we propose would have one-tenth part of the efficiency which its enemies seem to suppose. I fear we anticipate too much from it, and that it will not operate so usefully as we apprehend. My chief fear is, that it will not be able to check that wild extravagance which has been introduced among us by the use of banks, and the prevalence of the credit system. The bill, however, will accomplish much; and if it prevents but one of those wild expansions and contractions from which such wide-spread ruin has covered the land, it will prove a blessing to the country. This I believe it will do, at least to some extent. I repeat that my only fear is that the measure will not have the power to accomplish all that good which its friends fondly anticipate.

How will it operate? In ordinary times it does not require a very large amount of specie to conduct the regular and customary operations of Government. It is calculated that not more than five millions need be in the Treasury at any one time. There certainly will not at any time be much more than that sum, unless from extraordinary importations. Of all the evils we have endured, those which have proceeded from the unlimited and unrestrained credit of corporations, have been the greatest and the most fatal. If the demand for gold and silver in payment of public dues will prevent this, it will be fortunate for the country; and I do believe it will have a strong tendency to circumscribe this credit. The banks will not give such large accommodations, or furnish the means of such extravagant importations. Knowing that the Government officers will draw upon them for specie, the banks will naturally look to their means of meeting their demands. It may not effect this at once. We are not to expect a complete reformation in a day or a year; but I insist that the Independent Treasury will be the best regulator of the currency heretofore conceived, and an infinitely better one than the so much lauded Bank of the United States. That bank never regulated the currency or the other banks till it regulated itself; and it never regulated itself till it was compelled by dire necessity.

I know the argument is, that, by the bill under consideration the people are to be injured—the great mass of the community to be ruined, and a gang of mercenary office holders are to reap all the benefit. But the number of persons who pay duties is comparatively small; it consists, for the most part, of wealthy merchants, and men engaged in speculations—men who roll in splendor and enjoy bank facilities without limit. These are the men who will principally be called upon to pay specie into the Treasury. It is indeed true that the hardy pioneer of the West must pay gold and silver into the land office for his little portion of the public domain; but still the great bulk of the receipts will come, as I said, from the bank facility men; and these cannot justly complain. But while these are to pay this hard money, who is to receive it? In reply to this inquiry, gentlemen seem unable even to think of any body but "the office holders." Yes, the pampered office holders, they are to get all the specie. Is this true? Do not gentlemen know that the numbers who receive will be far greater than those who pay it? Look at the number of the pensioners—all these will receive their pensions in gold and silver. Are these the odious "office holders?" Where are all your war worn soldiers too, the men who fight your battles and bare their bosoms in your defence? Are these pampered office holders, wallowing in luxury and rolling in wealth and ease? Where are the bands of your hardy tars and the chivalrous officers who have as often led them to victory on the stormy deep? Are these, too, office holders? Gentlemen seem to forget that where one man pays into the Treasury, there are hundreds who receive money out of it. The mass of the people will not be injured, but benefited. It is indeed true that the office holders will share in the benefit, but they will share it with contractors for the mails, and with the multitudes of laborers on the public works. Do gentlemen think that they can get the people to believe this bill will injure them, by denouncing office holders? "Tell that to the marines—sailors won't believe it." In my own district there will be perhaps fifty men who will be payers to Government, while there are a thousand who will be receivers. You can't deceive my constituents on that point. They know that what they may receive under this bill, while it is good to-day, will also be good to-morrow. They have suffered too much from depreciated paper money to forget it readily. They have been pretty well shaved; and all your arguments in favor of paper, and against gold and silver, are wholly lost on such men. They see before their eyes the operation of this boasted credit system, and are able to compare it with the hard money Independent Treasury proposed by this bill. They know that the gold and silver is not carted to and fro in wagon loads, for the Government only, but gets into the hard hands of the laborers and mechanics, and from them passes into the general circulation. So far, too, from this bill injuring the banks, I do conscientiously believe that on the contrary it will be serviceable to them. The bank officers know the evils of their system from over issues, and the pressing demands of their customers which they cannot well resist; but under this system they could say, "we can go no father." In many parts of the country the banks will be protected by it from those fatal runs to which they are exposed. In my own district half a million will be annually received in specie, and thrown into circulation, or else they will get Government drafts, which are as good as gold and silver to the banks; for they can be exchanged dollar for dollar; and are some times preferred to the hard cash. The banks even now feel it to be a great convenience. Treasury drafts will always protect them as long as they are paid in specie.

But again we are told that this bill provides in effect two currencies, one for the Government and another for the people; and this is made a topic of declamation against the plan. Now if the people and the Government had always, until now, had the same currency, there might be some force in this objection. But so far is this from having been the fact, that under the Bank of the United States, not only had they two currencies, but forty currencies, in different sections of the country, each having a separate scale of depreciation ranging from 1 to 99 per cent.

The glorious and so much lauded Bank of the United States gave us a currency which was depreciated and dishonored by the Bank itself. During its existence it did not furnish more than one-tenth part of the circulation of the Union. In its palmy days its circulation was only ten or fifteen millions of dollars; yet we are told that it furnished a sound currency for the whole country. Its notes, I admit, were generally good, for those who could get them; to these they were the same as gold and silver; but they formed a small portion of the circulation. Now the question arises whether we shall take the currency established by the Constitution in preference to one that is constantly fluctuating; in other words, whether we shall measure by the standard bushel, which is always of one size, or use false measures, which vary perpetually? So with the laborer: the question is, whether he shall take a real dollar, or that which, though called a dollar, will not purchase for him a dollar's worth of any thing? I affirm that the Bank of the United States never did or could regulate the currency of this country. It cannot do it. And why not? A bank, as all men know, will always pursue its own interest. Each bank, in any community, wishes to loan and to circulate as much as it can, because it lives on the interest it receives on what it loans and can circulate. A number of banks may commence together, and for a time keep side by side. But presently one of them begins to extend its circulation. Its neighbor bank soon discovers this from the large dividends the banks makes; and it begins to play the same game. They become in debt to more prudent banks, who very soon begin to follow suit. It was just so with the Bank of the United States—by extending its circulation, it fell in debt to the State banks, and enabled them to expand: but whenever it chese, by curtailing its issues and discounts, to be satisfied with smaller profits, it soon brought the State banks in debt to it. The result is, that when the large bank, with heavy capital, expands, the smaller banks round it, are enabled to expand likewise; but as soon as it contracts, they are obliged to follow the example and contract also. Hence the reason of those ruinous expansions and contractions all over the country. And a large bank never can be a regulator to the smaller ones around it, until it is first willing to reduce its own profits. Now what was the course pursued by the United States Bank in 1817? Instead of acting cautiously, and limiting its issues, it dashed off at full speed, till, in the month of March, 1818, its loans and discounts amounted to no less than forty-one millions of dollars. Thus, in a single year, it had expended from three millions to forty-one millions! What became of the other banks? Just at that time the Bank of Virginia expanded its loans and circulation at the rate of from fifty to sixty per cent. The course of the great bank produced a general expansion, and a consequent inflation of prices; and its loans became greater and greater, till March, 1818, when it was compelled to contract; and immediately the State banks were compelled to contract in like manner. The Bank of Virginia, in 1819, contracted its issues nearly one-half.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RAYNER] drew largely on his imagination in describing to us the glorious state of the country under the Bank of the United States. True, it did raise the price of all commodities; corn rose as high as seven dollars per barrel. And for this the gentleman told us he felt most happy in glorifying that noble institution. Yes, the country, no doubt, seemed very happy. So a drunkard, while becoming intoxicated, feels himself one of the happiest fellows imaginable; he lives so fast that he is disposed to be pleased with all the world: he is "o'er all the ills of life victorious." But at last he has to get sober. He must cool off. In that process of cooling, he has to reduce himself below the standard of sound health, and in so doing, must suffer the headache. Much such a process this nation had to undergo in 1818 and 1819. The circulation of the bank fell from eight to three and a half millions. We then heard no complaints about reducing the price of labor—oh, no—no denunciation against ruinous experiments. The bank was not to blame—not at all. It might contract and expand at pleasure. It was all right in the bank. But if Government attempts to check extravagance, it is, in the opinion of gentlemen, an experiment—a reckless, profligate, experiment on the currency, and it is charged with the ruin of the country! These matters must be left to the banks—they know how to manage it all, say gentlemen. No doubt they do; and they will manage it just to suit their own interest; and gentlemen here are willing to surrender themselves, body and soul—life and limb, prospects and property, into the hands of a soulless corporation. Yet if Government tries to prevent these public evils, they are called a set of ignorant, tyrannical tinkers, who do not understand the subject. But, sir, of all tyranny, that of a moneyed corporation is, in my opinion, the most insupportable.

If I am to have a master, as John Randolph of Roanoke said, let me have one that I can respect—a man with sword and epaulette—not a bank president, sitting in his parlor "calm as the summer's morning," and armed with a goose quill. I would as soon live under the secret council of Venice, as at the will and pleasure of a soulless moneyed corporation.

But, Mr. Chairman, I promised to show to the committee and to the country, that the Bank of the United States never did regulate the currency, and I will now proceed to do so.

I hold in my hand a report from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Senate, made on the 28th May, 1838, numbered 457, which shows the price of bank notes in Philadelphia, from 1814 to 1838, and also the rates of foreign and domestic exchange in Philadelphia and New York, for the greater part of that time. I consider it a most valuable document, containing a mass of information and facts showing clearly the truth of my position. I will begin with the year 1818, after the United States Bank had been in operation more than a year, and most of the solvent banks had resumed specie payments. In the tables given in this report, the currency in Philadelphia were considered at par, and other bank notes and specie compared with that currency as the standard. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see how this great regulator succeeded in keeping the currency uniform for the year 1818.

Boston notes were at 2 per cent. discount, New York 3 discount, Pennsylvania 2 to 6, Delaware 4 to 12, Maryland 6 to 10, North Carolina 2 to 6, Tennesse, Kentucky, and Ohio, 4 to 10 discount, and Spanish dollars from 1 to 6 per cent. premium. Is this the regulator of the currency of which gentlemen boast so much, when bank notes from a distance were at a heavy discount and specie at a high premium at the door of the bank? Was this the sound uniform currency of which we have heard so much? I find a note to this table in the following words: "A committee of directors of the United States Bank, in a report dated October 30th, 1818, gives as one reason why a curtailment of discounts was necessary, the unexampled premium paid at this time for specie which is said to be the per cent. on Spanish dollars, and a considerable though less premium on other coins."

I think gentlemen will admit that, at this time, the currency was very badly regulated. But a gentleman near me says the Bank had not had time to correct the state of the currency, and I ought to look to the next year. I will accommodate the gentleman. How then stands the case in 1819? Here it is: Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut bank notes from 4 to 5 per cent. discount, New York county and New Jersey the same, Maryland 3 to 8, North Carolina 3 to 8, South Carolina 2 to 14, Georgia 2 to 20, Tennessee and Kentucky 10 to 25 discount, and Spanish dollars from 3 to 6 premium.

Mr. Niles, from whose Weekly Register the rates at New York and Baltimore were taken, says the price of bank notes varied several per cent. in the course of a week. The notes which were at par in one part of the country, were in other parts at a heavy discount. At the same time that exchange at New Orleans on New York was at from seven to ten per cent. discount, exchange at New York on New Orleans was at six per cent. discount. All the banks whose notes were at a discount at New York of less than five per cent. and some others, were understood to pay specie "on demand." How does the gentleman near me [Mr. MONROE] like the year 1819? If he thinks this was still too soon to expect a sound currency, I will pass on to the year 1820. Here we find all the New England notes at from 2 to 4 per cent. discount; Virginia 1 to 3; North Carolina 2 to 10; South Carolina 1 to 6; Ohio 15 to 25; and the branch notes of the United States Bank of New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Boston, from 2 to 4 per cent. discount. Yes, Mr. Chairman, its own branch notes were dishonored by the mother bank in Philadelphia, and sold before its eyes at from 2 to 4 per cent. discount. This, too, was in the year 1820, three years after it had been engaged in regulating the currency and exchanges; and yet gentlemen rise here in their places before the House and the country, and state, with the utmost apparent confidence, that this Bank always furnished a sound and uniform currency, such a one as no country was ever before blessed with—a currency better than gold and silver. Does it not prove that gentlemen have forgotten the history of the times, and drawn on their imaginations for facts and arguments to sustain the weakness of their cause?

Let us pass on to the year 1821. Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Connecticut notes from 2 to 4 per cent. discount through the whole year; New York (country) 1 to 6; Tennessee and Kentucky 25 to 50; and United States branch notes of Boston and New Hampshire 2 per cent. discount from January to December.

Here, sir, so far from furnishing a sound and uniform currency for the country, this great regulator could not prevent the depreciation of its own branch notes, at its own door, nor did it regulate the banks in the State or Pennsylvania, where it was located.

Are gentlemen not convined, or will they require me to go on? Let us then look to the year 1822: here it is, but the picture is not improved: Maine notes fell to 10 per cent. discount; other New England, 2 to 4; New York, country, 1 to 5; North Carolina, 2 to 12; Georgia, 2 to 14; Tennessee and Kentucky, 35 to 70; and United States branch notes of New Hampshire and Massachusetts, still two per cent. discount in Philadelphia.

In 1823, things were no better. Maine notes were at 10 per cent. discount the whole year; other New England, 2 to 3; New York, country, and Pennsylvania, 1 to 5; North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, 4 to 12; Ohio, 6; Tennessee, 35; and Kentucky, 70 discount.

In 1824 and '25, Maine notes were still at 10 per cent. discount; other New England, 2 to 3; North Carolina, Georgia, and Ohio, 3 to 6; Tennessee, 15 to 20; and Kentucky, 55.

In 1826, New England notes were generally 2½ per cent. discount; New York, country, 2 to 5; Louisiana, 5; Mississippi, 10; Tennessee, 20; and Kentucky, 50 per cent. discount.

I have omitted to notice many other banks, which are placed in separate tables. They were forty or fifty in number, and their notes varied through this whole time from 25 to 90 per cent. discount.

Sir, I could go on and show that the currency continued greatly deranged until about the time Gen. Jackson informed Congress that they were not to expect him to sanction a recharter of the Bank.

About this time currency and exchanges got into a tolerable condition. The bank was about to be put on its good behavior, and found it necessary to act more prudently, that it might secure a new charter. This continued until the removal of the deposites, when the great panic raised by the Opposition produced temporary difficulties, which, however, soon passed away after the adjournment of Congress in 1834. It is a remarkable fact, that during the time the State banks were the depositories of the public moneys, there was less depreciation in bank notes than had existed before for twenty years, notwithstanding the abuse heaped on them by the Opposition, and their subsequent misconduct and suspension. I will do them the justice to say that the depreciation of bank notes, and the difference in exchange was never less than during the years 1835, '36, and till the suspension in 1837.

I will not trouble the committee with detailed accounts of the fluctuations in foreign and domestic exchanges, but by examination they will be found to correspond to a great extent with the price of bank notes. So far, then, Mr. Chairman, from giving us one sound and uniform currency, the bank was unable even to keep its own branch notes at par, and refused to receive the notes of other specie paying banks, unless they were located in the immediate vicinity of its branches where they could (as in fact they did) demand weekly settlements, and compel the State banks to pay balances in specie, or in drafts on the Northern cities. The Bank of the United States did what is now charged almost as a crime on the Administration—it established one currency for itself, and left the great mass of the people to get on as well as they could with depreciated paper, at almost every rate of discount, from one to ninety-nine per cent. and yet gentlemen tell us we had the best currency in the world. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COOPER] went so far as to state that the notes of the bank were not only good, but at a premium even in China. Now, sir, I have no doubt the gentleman thinks so. I have heard this statement before, and seen it in the newspapers, but I have no hesitation in saying it is totally untrue. The Bank of England certainly stands as high in this country as the United States could have done in China; and is there a man in the House who thinks notes of the Bank of England would circulate currently here? An importing merchant would not take them to make remittances, as he would a bill of exchange. But, sir, it is idle and preposterous to say they would circulate through the country as money. A single bank note may have passed from one American merchant to another in China, who was returning home, but a Hong merchant would have been surprised at a proposition to pay him in bank notes. Who ever sent these notes to China to buy a cargo of tea? The very idea is absurd and ridiculous.

I wish, Mr. Chairman, to examine the operation of this Bank upon the business and industry of the country; but before I do so, I will refer gentlemen to the opinions of two distinguished gentlemen now of the Opposition, at the time of granting the charter in 1816. I have mislaid the extracts, but will state from memory. Mr. Sergeant was opposed to a capital of thirty-five millions, and thought twenty millions sufficient. He contended that it was the duty of the Government to take care of the currency, but that this Bank was not the proper remedy.

Mr. Webster insisted that chartering the Bank would not relieve the public distress, and denied that it was the business of the Government to regulate the currency. He maintained that we had the best currency the world ever saw; that our fathers were hard money men, and established a hard money Government. He was opposed to a Bank of the United States, and I quote him now as advocating the doctrine that it is the duty of the Government to demand its revenues in gold and silver as the only currency recognised by the Constitution.

I have prepared a table, showing the operations of the United States Bank from 1816 to 1836, which I will here exhibit, as I shall have to refer to it as I proceed in relation to the fluctuation of prices produced by expansion and contraction of its loans and issues.

Increase in seven months, nearly		20,000,000	10,000,000

From this table it appears, in about one year from its commencement, its loans and discounts had risen up to forty-one millions of dollars, with a circulation of eight millions; all the other banks followed the example of this great regulator, and in a short time all were compelled to contract. The circulation of this bank went down to three and a half millions in two years, and in 1822 its discounts were only twenty-eight millions. So extravagant and imprudent was it in 1818, that it again raised its discount line to the amount in that year till the year 1831, when it reached forty-four millions, and being then determined to force a recharter, in spite of the Roman firmness of Gen. Jackson, it increased its loans and discounts to sixty-six millions; an increase of twenty-two millions in one year, increasing its circulation, in the same time, five millions.

In December, 1834, after the memorable panic session of Congress, in which the distress orators uttered such loud and doleful lamentations over what they called the ruin of the Constitution, and the desolation of the country, the discounts were reduced to forty-five millions—a reduction said to be necessary, as its charter had but about fifteen months to run; but notwithstanding this pressing necessity, as it was called, in the short space of seven months the loans and discounts were increased about twenty millions, and the issues about ten millions of dollars. This, sir, was the commencement of that wild and reckless extravagance afterwards pursued by the State banks, until the whole system blew up like the eruption of a volcano. Let us now go back and examine the result of these expansions and experiments by the bank, which then, as now, was considered as a grand panacea for "all the ills which flesh is heir to." We heard of ruin and distress in 1834—we hear on this floor, every day, of scenes and pictures derived from the heated imaginations of political partisans, intended for effect through the country, in the coming Presidential election; but, sir, we have nothing to compare with the sad realities suffered in 1819, '20, and '21, and produced by the operations of this same United States Bank. I have some extracts which I will trouble the Clerk to read.

"From all parts of our country," says Mr. Niles, "we hear of a severe pressure on men in business, a general stagnation of trade, a large reduction in the price of staple articles Real property is rapidly depreciating in its nominal value, and its rents or profits are exceedingly diminishing. Many highly respectable traders have become bankrupts, and it is agreed that many others must 'go:' the banks are refusing their customary accommodations: confidence among merchants is shaken, and three per cent. per month is offered for the discount of promissory notes, which a little while ago were considered as good as 'old gold,' and whose makers have not since suffered any losses to render their notes less valuable than heretofore."

Four months afterwards, he says, "It is estimated that there are 20,000 persons daily seeking work in Philadelphia; in New York 10,000 able-bodied men are said to be wandering about the streets looking for it, and if we add to them the women who desire something to do, the amount cannot be less than 20,000: in Baltimore there may be about 10,000 persons in unsteady employment, or actually suffering because they cannot get into business. We know several decent men, lately 'good livers,' who now subsist on such victuals as two years ago they would not have given their servants in the kitchen."

"A writer in the Kentucky Gazette, quoted by Niles on the 9th of October, observed: 'Slaves which sold some time ago, and could command the most ready money, have fallen to an inadequate value. A slave which hires for 80 or 100 dollars per annum, may be purchased for 300 or 400. A house and lot on Limestone street, for which $15,000 had been offered some time past, sold under the officer's hammer for $1,800. A house and lot which, I am informed, was bought for $10,000, after $6,000 had been paid by the purchaser, was sold under a mortgage for $1,500, leaving the original purchaser (besides his advances) $3,500 in debt. A number of sales, which excited at the same time astonishment and pity, have occurred in this town. Comparison of local sufferings should not be indulged in, but I am told that Lexington is less afflicted than almost any other part of the State."

"Bankruptcies for large amounts were of frequent occurrence. Mention is made, among others, of the bankruptcy of a merchant tailor in the little town of York, Pennsylvania, who failed for the sum of eighty-four thousand dollars.

"This was, indeed, an important affair in a town containing but three or four thousand inhabitants; but it sunk into insignificance when compared with some of the failures in the large cities. "So extensive were these among the merchants of the cities east of Baltimore, that it seemed to be disreputable to stop payment for less than 100,000 dollars; the fashionable amount was from 2 to 300,000 dollars; and the tip-top quality, the support of whose families had cost them from 8 to 12,000 dollars a year, were honored with an amount of debt exceeding 500,000 dollars, and nearly as much as a million of dollars. The prodigality and waste of some of these were almost beyond belief; we have heard that the furniture of a single parlor possessed (we cannot say belonging) to one of them, cost 40,000 dollars. So it was in all the great cities—dash, dash, dash—venders of tape and bobbins transformed into persons of high blood, and the sons of respectable citizens converted into knaves of rank—through speculation, and the facilities of the abominable paper system."

Distress in 1820:

"It is said," remarked Mr. Niles on the 2d September, 1820, "but we know not how to believe it, that corn is selling at ten, and wheat at twenty cents per bushel, specie, in some parts of Kentucky. At this rate how are debts to be paid?" Mr. Niles appears afterwads to have had other evidence sufficient to overcome his incredulity, for he remarked on the 15th of September, 1821: "a gentleman in Western Virginia directs the register to be stopped, because he used to pay for it annually with one barrel of flower, but that three will not do it now. Another, a miller in Ohio, on paying his advance to my agent, observed, that he had sold four barrels of flour to obtain the note of five dollars which was remitted."

"In other publications we have evidence of the lowness of prices. For example: in the United States Gazette of May 23, 1821, corn is said to have been sold at Cincinnati at ten cents a bushel: and the same periodical of the 1st of June, has a notice of a letter from a practical farmer in Harrison county, Ohio, stating that wheat had fallen to twenty-five cents a bushel, and in some instances at twelve and a-half cents. A letter from Greenfield, Ohio, dated May 3, 1821, and quoted in the Gazette of June 23, states that wheat was sold at twelve and a-half cents a bushel, and that whiskey was dull at fifteen cents a gallon. The Weekly Register of May 19th, gives the following quotation from 'a late Pittsburg Mercury.' Flour, a barrel, $1: whiskey fifteen cents a gallon: good merchantable pine boards, twenty cents a hundred feet: sheep and calves one dollar a head. Foreign goods at the old prices. One bushel and a-half of wheat will buy a pound of coffee: a barrel of flour will buy a pound of tea; twelve and a half barrels will buy one yard of superfine broadcloth."

Here we see the natural result of the ruinous Bank expansion of 1817, when its loans rose to the enormous amount of forty-one millions. The contraction which unavoidably ensued, brought down the prices of produce infinitely lower than they are at present; it took four barrels of flour to day for one years' subscription to Niles's Register, and twenty barrels would not more than by a man a coat. In New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, fifty thousand persons were without any regular employment, and in the utmost distress. Such were the results of the "credit system" of this grand regulator of the currency, and of what gentlemen talk so much about; public confidence destroyed, not by the Administration, but by their boasted Bank.

We are vehemently denounced because we are unwilling to encourage men, not worth the clothes they wear, to borrow immense sums from the Bank, roll in luxury like princes, then break, and throw their losses on honest men, and after all turn round and abuse the Administration as the cause of their folly and fraud. Would gentlemen have us to give credit to bankrupts? Is it attacking the credit system—is it destroying public confidence, if we refuse to encourage fraud and swindling? If you charter another National Bank, you will probably again extend credit and confidence, as was done before, and then when the country is again ruined, the Administration again will be denounced, unless it will sustain the credit of cheats, bankrupts, and swindlers. Why, sir, I aver that in its very birth, the United States Bank commenced in fraud. Its capital was never paid in specie, as the charter required; yet the Bank began to loan money to those who had subscribed for stock, and who were compelled to borrow from the Bank to pay their instalments. No wonder its shares soon rose to a hundred and fifty-six dollars. It was a grand speculation; and while it lasted, all was very well; but the year after the stock went down from a hundred and fifty-six to ninety-eight. Many poor widows and orphans, whose friends had advised them to buy the stock at a hundred and twenty, thirty, forty, and fifty dollars per share, were compelled, when the panic came, to sell out below par. But nobody blames the Bank. The Bank could not help it. It gave us a glorious currency, say gentlemen; and it was only a misfortune which compelled it to curtail its issues, and call in its debts. Tuly it was a great misfortune, indeed, and produced by the mimanagement of the Bank; and when we are asked again to give our confidence to such an institution, should we not remember these things? No doubt a new bank would go on swimmingly for some months, perhaps longer; but, sooner or later, we should have the scenes of 1819 and 1821 over again.

Now let us look at the description of the country given by Mr. CLAY in 1824, when things had somewhat improved:

Extract from Mr. Clay's speech in 1824, Niles's Register, vol. 26, pages 378 and 387.

"In casting our eyes around us, the most prominent circumstance which fixes our attention, and challenges our deepest regret, is the general distress which pervades the whole country. It is forced upon us by numerous facts of the most incontestable character. It is indicated by the diminished exports of native produce; by the depressed and reduced state of our foreign navigation; by our diminished commerce; by successive unthreshed crops of grain, perishing in our barns and barn yards for the want of a market; by the alarming diminution of the circulating medium; by the numerous bankruptcies, not limited to the trading classes, but extending to all orders of society; by an universal complaint of the want of employment, and a consequent reduction of the wages of labor; by the ravenous pursuit after public situations, not for the sake of their honors and the performance of their public duties, but as a means of private subsistence; by the reluctant resort to the perilous use of paper money; by the intervention of legislation in the delicate relation between debtor and creditor: and, above all, by the low and depressed state of the value of almost every description of the whole mass of the property of the nation which has, on an average, sunk not less than about fifty per cent. within a few years."

"The truth is, that no class of society suffers more, in the present stagnation of business, than the laboring class. That is a necessary effect of the depression of agriculture, the principal business of the community. The wages of able bodied men vary from five to eight dollars per month; and such has been the want of employment, in some parts of the Union, that instances have not been unfrequent, of men working merely for the means of present subsistence. If the wages for labor here and in England are compared, they will be found not to be essentially different."

Here is a picture, drawn by the hand of a master, but he failed to attribute the distress and suffering to their true cause. He could not charge them to the operations of his favorite United States Bank, but must look around to find out some other reason. Fertile in expedients, he came to the conclusion that the want of a sufficient tariff for protection of domestic manufactures, had produced the difficulties under which the country was laboring. A tariff bill was accordingly passed, but in 1828 it was again found insufficient to relieve the country from the ruinous expansions and contractions of the "great regulator." The tariff was again remodelled to grant relief, and if we are to believe the account drawn from the brilliant imagination of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. RAYNER,] no country under the sun was ever so prosperous and happy. In 1829, said the gentleman exultingly, "every branch of industry was in the most flourishing condition." This, sir, was his language, and he seemed to speak of it to prove the happy influence exerted by the Bank over the business and industry of the country. Let us, then, Mr. Chairman, examine the history of the times, and see whether this was not a mere fancy sketch, totally contradicted by recorded facts.

Here are some accounts of the situation of New England in June and July of this identical year, 1829. Let us hear them:

'The Providence Literary Subaltern, as quoted by the Philadelphia Gazette, on the 26th of June, says—"The embarrassments which have been realized in this immediate neighborhood for the last ten days, have had no parallel in the history of the Republic. Men of reputed capital, who have withstood the shock of former changes and times, men who, for the last forty years, have stood firm, erect, and undismayed before the tempest of the times that have assailed them, are now tottering on the verge of bankruptcy and ruin. Their fall bears excessively heavy on the poor and laboring classes, who, by the way, are in reality the principal sufferers. Deprived of employment, destitute and friendless, they are thrown upon the world, and know not how to obtain a livelihood. Within the last ten days, within the circle of the ten adjacent miles, upwards of twenty-five hundred people have been suddenly and unexpectedly thrown out of employment, and the distress that such an event has produced can be far better imagined than described."

The Providence Herald of July 1829, says:

"The present distress of the manufacturers of New England is without example in the history of this country. The failures which have already taken place, according to our estimate, suspended the operation of about 45,000 spindles, and turned out of employ little short of three hundred families, whose sole dependence was upon their daily earnings. The situation of some, and indeed most of these families, is miserable in the extreme, reduced almost to a state of actual starvation. It calls on the humane to interfere, and proposes to call on the Legislature to save the remaining manufacturers by suspending the bank process for a limited time."

This, sir, was after the Bank had been in operation for twelve years, assisted by two tariff acts, and yet "the distress was without parallel in the history of the country." Sir, what are fancy sketches worth—what do pictures of the imagination avail against these stubborn and melancholy facts?

Much has been said about the present low price of produc ; and it has been roundly charged by gentlemen of the Opposition to the measures of the present Administration. I propose to call the attention of the committee to other times, when prices were even lower than at the present time, and when there was no interference or action on the part of the Government to which it could be attributed. I have an account of the prices of corn sold from the farm of Fielding Lewis, one of the largest and most intelligent farmers of James river, in Virginia, from 1796 to 1816, taken from the Farmers' Register of Mr. Ruffin, from which it appears that he sold his corn, in 1799, for $2 50; in 1802, for $2 46; in 1805 and 1808, for $2 33; and in 1807, for the low price of $2 per barrel. Here, sir, was no experiment on the currency by the General Government; and yet, for five years out of twenty, the price of corn varied from $2 50 down to $2. How then can gentlemen with propriety charge the low price of corn to the Administration, when it is clearly shown the price has been frequently lower than it is now? You might as well inveigh against the dispensations of an all-wise and beneficent Providence, who sends or withholds "the early and the latter rain," and who, in his wisdom and goodness, grants blessing and fruitful seasons "to the just and to the unjust."

I hold in my hand a volume of the American Almanac, containing the prices of many articles for forty years, commencing in 1795, and ending in 1834, giving the highest wholesale prices for articles of the best quality. I will not detain the committee with long details, but will select the single year of 1821, when the great regulator had been in operation four years. These prices were taken from the Boston Commercial Gazette, and for the year mentioned were as follows:

Flour, - -	$4 25	Barley, - -	50
Corn, - -	43	Beef, - -	$8 50
Rye, - -	45	Pork, - -	11 50

Neither of the above articles had ever been so low for twenty years previous.

Cotton, - -	14	Tobacco, - -	$6 00
Rice, - -	$3 25

Cotton had been as low only once in 20 years previous, to wit, in 1812, the first year of the war, when it was worth only 11 cts.

Rice had not been so low during the same time, except in the year 1808, which was during the embargo, being worth the same price of $3 25.

Tobacco had not been so low, except for three years, about the time of the war, to wit, in 1811, '12, and '13.

The whole table shows the most remarkable fluctuations, and they will be found to correspond to a great extent with the contractions and expansions of the bank currency. After the great expansion and high prices of 1819, produce of all kinds continued to decline until 1821, when it reached the lowest point of depression, and the important articles of flour, corn, rye, barley, beef, and pork, were all, yes, all, lower than they have been for twenty years previous. Can any intelligent and candid man deny that this was produced by the misconduct and gross mismanagement of the great regulator. There was no experiment on the currency by the Administration, no specie circular, no removal of the deposites, no Sub-Treasury, no war upon the credit and confidence of the country; but it was the natural and inevitable consequence of bank experiments spreading ruin and desolation over the land.

If the system under consideration is so monstrous and revolutionary in its character, such an outrage on all former legislation, so inconsistent with the principles of the Constitution as some gentlemen contend, we shall be driven to the conclusion that our forefathers, the founders of the Republic, and framers of the Constitution, were so stupid and ignorant that they established a Government which could not be carried into practice, that they constructed a machine which would not work, and must be rejected as useless. This must be the inevitable conclusion from the arguments advanced. Now, sir, although I do not profess to be wedded to ancient forms and principles, nor to consider things valuable merely for their antiquity, yet I have great respect for the virtue, patriotism, and wisdom of our forefathers, and will not believe they established a Government which cannot manage its fiscal affairs without submitting to the dictation and control of banks.

Before the committee rose on yesterday, Mr. Chairman, I attempted to show that the Bank of the United States never did regulate the currency of this country. On the contrary, that during its existence as a regulator, the depreciation of bank paper was greater than ever, except about the time of the last war. So far was this boasted institution from being able to regulate the currency throughout every part of the Union, as has again and again been asserted, it was unable to do it even in the State of Pennsylvania, where it was itself located. Nay, more; it was unable to keep the notes of its own branches at par, even at its own counter, much less all over the Union.

[Here Mr. RAYNER remarked it was not contended that it kept all the currency in a sound state, but that its own paper was good every where.]

Sir, I have shown that even this is not true. But this is giving up the question; and gentlemen are not to get off in this way. The average circulation of that bank was between ten and eleven millions. If it be granted that this sum was kept sound, what becomes of the remaining circulation of about one hundred millions? One-tenth would be regulated, and nine-tenths depreciated. This one-tenth was in the hands of speculators, and those who received facilities from the Bank. This was the better currency of the Bank facility men; and the depreciated paper of the other banks was considered good enough for the great mass of the people. Gentlemen, in their high-wrought eulogies on the Bank, seem to consider the merchants, speculators, and bank facility gentry, as the people. They seem to have no other idea of the people; and when they speak of them, they mean those persons who, by means of bank accommodations, are enabled to live on the hard earnings of the real people of the country. They cannot mean the great mass of our citizens, for their arguments do not apply to more than one-tenth part of our population. This has ever been the great error and stumbling block of the Opposition. They do not seem to understand who are the people, or how to appreciate the intelligence of those who "know their rights, and knowing, dare maintain them."

I also attempted to show that the derangement and depression of prices were unparalleled during the reign of the National Bank. I will, in confirmation of this general position, adduce a few more proofs to show that, during that most glorious and happy period, the prices of produce were as unsteady and fluctuating as the wind or the weather. I showed that, in 1821, prices were lower than they had been for twenty years before. This, I say, was the natural consequence of the course pursued by the Bank in flooding the country with its paper, and wantonly increasing and contracting its loans.

I will not go into the prices of any other article but that of Flour. In 1818, the price in Philadelphia was $14 25. It then fell to $8: then to $5: and so it continued to go down till, in 1821, it had sunk to $3 75. Yet now we hear every Whig orator and Whig press in the country proclaiming that the poor farmers have been ruined by the experiments of this wicked Administration. But is flour now selling for $3 75? Has a single barrel been sold for that? Not one; yet it was at that price in 1821; afterward it recovered in some degree. But again: in 1826, it fell to $4 50. Reference has been made by some gentlemen to the prosperous times, before the Presidency of General Jackson. I mean to insinuate no disrespect, and make no charge against the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts; but I will take the four years of his Presidency, and from the table of prices before me, it appears, during that period, the price of flour was lower, on an average, than during any period of the same length since the foundation of the Government; for this, I know that gentlemen is in no way responsible: it arose from causes over which he could exercise no control; but I might as well charge him with this state of things because it happened to occur when he was President, as for gentlemen now to charge the present depressed price of produce to the present Administration. I will not do it; I scorn such injustice; nor will I stoop to it, as others do, for mere electioneering purposes.

I observed that it would be found, from an examination of the table of prices, that the fluctuation in the value of agricultural products tallied in a remarkable manner with the expansions and contractions of the Bank. When it expanded, flour rose; when it curtailed its discounts, flour fell. In 1831, the Bank expanded its loans twenty-two millions. It was then in the field for a recharter; and it increased its accommodation to its friends from forty-four millions to sixty-six millions; that, is fifty per cent. in a single year. Flour rose immediately from $4 50 to $7, and then fell again the next year to $5 50. Of this gentlemen did not complain; not at all. But if the Government attempts to interfere, in the slightest degree, to prevent such fluctuations, oh, then, the Government has reduced prices and ruined the country! After the deposites had been removed, the Bank was said to be compelled to curtail its issues, as its charter was soon to expire. During the great panic session of 1834, what was the cry? "You have destroyed the Bank. It cannot relieve the country—and the only remedy is to restore the deposites to its custody." But Congress refused to do this. And then what was the course of this poor ruined bank—this bank that could not accommodate the country because Congress had refused to give it back the public money—this bank, whose charter had but fifteen months to run—what, I ask, was the course of this crippled institution? Why, sir, from December, 1834, to July, 1835, it increased its accommodations, in the short space of seven months, from forty-five to sixty five millions of dollars, and augmented, at the same time, its circulation from fifteen to twenty-five millions. This was its conduct at a time when its duty was to be winding up its affairs.

I say it is this corporation which has ruined the country. If ever it was ruined, it was from 1819 to 1821. There was vast distress in 1824 and 1829, and again in 1834. In 1835 the great expansion encouraged the other banks to commence their wild career, which produced the suspension of 1837, and the ruinous convulsions which have prostrated the country.

Sir, should you charter it again, its course would again be the same. We should see fine times for a year or so, but the necessity of contraction would inevitably follow, and again the country would be involved in general embarrassment and distress. What is the condition of this bank now? It was said to be more stable than ever, sounder and safer after it had been relieved from its troublesome partner. But what is now the fact? Is it not prostrate and grovelling in the dust? Yes, sir: it is more disgraced and degraded than almost any banking institution in the United States. Its stock is down to 76; its credit gone; and "none so poor as to do it reverence;" and yet we are now called upon by the Opposition in this House to erect a new institution of the same kind upon its ruins.

It is too commonly argued that, after all, there is no real depreciation in bank paper, because a dollar in paper will buy as much as a dollar in specie; but is it therefore true that paper is worth as much as specie? Go to a broker and ask him if he will give you as much for it. To test the value of an article it is necessary to put it in market. Put your paper money to this test and you will soon find that there is a difference of four to five per cent. The merchant, it is true, taking into consideration the profit on his goods, will give you dollar for dollar; but when you test its market value you will see the difference.

It may be well to allude to the scheme proposed by the worthy gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr.

POPE] What are its main features? He is for a Bank of from fifty to seventy millions, and for reducing the rate of interest to five per cent. I may be mistaken, but I think I see what would be the operation of his system. You may go to his bank to borrow at this new rate of five per cent.; but will the Bank lend money at that rate? You may prohibit it taking more, as you now do more than six per cent. They tell you they have no money to lend, as the shavers do, and yet they will shave your bond at a large discount. They will take or give a draft or bill of exchange at discount or premium and shave you well in so doing. It is now becoming a regular system amongst the banks. They refuse to grant loans that they may apply their capital to bills of exchange: the business they transact in that way is enormous. Now this would be just the course of a Bank of the United States, if you create one. They will deal in bills, but will not lend money at 5 per cent. to any one excpt to their own directors or special favorites and friends.

Gentlemen often allude to the low prices which now prevail, and try to make as much political capital as possible out of it. But I will now give one of the great causes of these low prices; and I think they may be accounted for in a different way than by laying the blame at the door of the Administration. It is true that prices are low; but this is also true. The crops of last year were universally abundant. Corn, wheat, cotton, tobacco, and sugar, were all more abundant than was ever known before. The product was enormous. Hence every body had something to sell, while there were few to buy. Farmers and planters know full well that when they have a full crop, prices will be low; and when the crop is short prices will be proportionably high. Now, I say again, that there never was such a crop of agricultural products known as we had last year; and the natural consequence of such an over product is the occurrence of low prices. Gentlemen must admit this. They will not deny it, unless, indeed, their object is to deceive the people and break down the Administration at all hazards. My colleague [Mr. WISE] told us of a farmer, who, having received a low price for his wheat, turned his coat inside out, and said he was no longer for Van Buren. Now I cannot but wish my colleague had told his story somewhat more at length, and given us all the particulars. I will warrant you the Whig merchant, who bought the wheat, failed not to tell the honest farmer that he could not give him more for his wheat because the Administration destroyed the credit of the bank; and the farmer, no doubt, believed him. The man was too simple and honest to suspect the cheat: but let him understand that the low prices which he received was the general result which invariably follows from a good crop, and that the cause assigned by the merchant has nothing to do with the matter, and he will be justly indignant at the base attempt to gull and deceive him. It frequently happens that the small surplus left to the farmer from a scanty crop, yields him more money than he receives when his crop is most abundant. The people will at last come to understand this matter, and will discover that it is a mere electioneering trick. They will exonerate the Administration thus unjustly accused, and spurn, with merited contempt, those who attempt to practise on their supposed simplicity.

I will now again allude to the views of some of the most distinguished members of the Opposition party in former times, from which it will appear that a National Bank, now pressed on us as the only panacea for the public calamities, when urged in like manner during a former period of our history, was not so considered by them.

Having found the extracts which I had mislaid when alluding to the opinions of Mr. SERGEANT and Mr. WEBSTER in 1816, while the bank charter was under discussion, I beg leave to read them to the committee:

"Mr. Sergeant proposed to reduce the amount of the capital of the Bank, from thirty-five to twenty millions. 'With regard to the present time,' he said, 'he should be glad to know why the Treasury of the United States had not now the command of specie payments, and the rate of exchange in its own hands.'

"Mr. Webster said, 'It was a mistaken idea that we were about to reform the national currency. No nation had a better currency than the United States—there was no nation which had guarded its currency with more care; for the framers of the Constitution, and those who enacted the early statutes on this subject, were HARD-MONEY MEN; they had felt, and therefore duly appreciated, the evils of a paper medium; they therefore sedulously guarded the currency of the United States from debasement. The legal currency of the United States was gold and silver coin; this was a subject in regard to which Congress had run into no folly.

"The establishment of a National Bank not being, in his opinion, the proper remedy, he proceeded to examine what was. The solvency of the Bank was not questioned; there could be no doubt,' he said, 'if the banks would unite in the object, they might in three weeks resume the payment of specie, and render the adoption of any measure by this House wholly unnecessary. The banks,' he said, 'were making extravagant profits out of the present state of things, which ought to be curtailed. He referred, for illustration of this point, to the state of the Bank of Pennsylvania, as exhibited in the return to the Legislature of that State, which, with a capital of 2,500,000 dollars, had done a discount business of 4,133,000, at the same time that it held 1,811,000 dollars of the United States' stock—so that, without taking into account a mass of Treasury notes, real estate, &c. that Bank was receiving interest on six and a half millions, nearly three times the amount of its capital. That Bank had been pronounced by the Legislature to be in 'a flourishing state;' it was so to the stockholders in the Bank, he doubted not.

"The Banks not emanating from Congress, what engine were Congress to use for remedying the existing evil? Their only legitimate power,' he said, 'was to interdict the paper of such banks as do not pay specie, from being received at the custom-houses. With a receipt of forty millions a year, if the Government was faithful to itself and to the interests of the people, they could control the evil, and it was their duty to make the effort. They should have made it long ago, and they ought now to make it.

"The whole strength of the Government, he was of opinion, ought to be put forth to compel the payment of duties and taxes to the Government in the legal currency of the country.

"In the end the taxes must be paid in the legal money of the country, and the sooner that was brought about the better."

Sir, I adopt almost entirely the sentiments here expressed by Mr. WEBSTER. Government has the matter in its own hands, and the sooner the duties are received in hard money the better. I would fix the period for this change at less than the four years proposed by this bill. And so far from this being an improper time to make this change, I believe that, of all others, it is precisely the most proper. Let us seize the present moment, when every thing is at a stand; we may effect the change at once and without difficulty. The banks would not be injured, for they might resume in three weeks from this time, if they would but make the attempt in concert, and but for the condition and opposition of the bank of Pennsylvania, I believe it would be done.

To show that a National Bank is not the proper remedy for our present difficulties, I will read to the committee one more extract: it is from the speech of a highly distinguished gentleman, now on an electioneering crusade against this Administration, which he attacks with great fury on the ground of its enmity to credit, and because the President presses this Sub-Treasury system on the people, as he says, against their will. Mr. RIVES of Virginia, in 1834, said:

"Sir, of all the reforms, social, political, or economical, required by the great interests of the country, that which is most urgently demanded, and which promises in its accomplishment the largest results of utility, security, and public benefit, is, beyond comparison, the restoration of the Government to what it was intended by the framers of the Constitution to be, A HARD MONEY Government. We are too much in the habit, Mr. President, of regarding the evils of the paper system as necessary and incurable, and of being content with the delusive palliation of those evils, supposed to be derived from the controlling supremacy of a National Bank. Nothing, in my opinion, is more demonstrable, than that the great evil of that system, its ruinous fluctuations, arising from alternate expansions and contractions of bank issues, making a lottery in effect of private fortunes, and converting all prospective contracts and transactions into a species of gambling—nothing can be more certain than that these fluctuations (and we have a striking proof of it in the present distresses of the country) are increased instead of being diminished, by the existence of an institution of such absolute ascendency, that when it expands, the State banks expand with it; when it contracts, those banks are forced, in self-defence, to contract also. Whatever influence such an institution may be supposed to exert, in preserving the soundness of the currency, that object would be much more effectually promoted by a return, as far as practicable, to a metallic circulation. The first step towards that return is, to let the Bank of the United States go down. Its notes being withdrawn, the convenience of travelling alone would immediately create a demand for gold coins, as a substitute, and enforce the necessity of correcting that under valuation of them at the mint, which is said to have contributed to their disappearance. In concurrence with this, let measures be taken, as it is believed effectual measures may be taken, to discourage and suppress the circulation of bank notes under a certain denomination, (ten or twenty dollars) of which the effect would be to produce another accession to the metallic circulating medium. The ordinary channels of circulation being thus supplied with gold and silver, the Government would be prepared, without hardship to the public creditor, to require payment of its dues in specie, and thus realize a reform, than which none could be more deeply interesting, in every aspect, to the safety and prosperity of the country.

"Sir, here is an object worthy to engage the most anxious labors of the patriot and the statesman, and I feel persuaded that, with a tithe of the effort and talent daily expended in the ephemeral contests of party, we should see it happily accomplished. I conjure gentlemen, then, with abilities so eminently fitted for this great work, to leave the Bank of the United States to its fate—a fate already pronounced by the voice of the nation, and called for by the highest considerations, connected with the safety of our free institutions—and to bring forward their powerful aid in an effort to restore the Government to its true constitutional character and destination—that OF A SIMPLE, SOLID, HARD MONEY GOVERNMENT."

Since that day, this eloquent gentleman has discovered that this measure of the Administration for collecting the revenue in gold and silver, and bringing back the Government to a simple, solid, hard money standard, is most dangerous; and he attacks it with all his power. Sir, there are some singular coincidences connected with this subject, which I will for a moment notice. There have existed some differences of opinion as to the question whether bank paper should or should not be used by Government in the receipt and disbursement of the public revenue. Some were for a hard money currency exclusively, others for good bank paper. So great was the difference of opinion on this and other matters, that it was said there was to be a split in the Administration party. We were once told of a Rives party and a Benton party. How did it turn out? Why, sir, Mr. Rives has now substantially repudiated what he before advocated and defended. I cannot account for it unless upon the doctrine of coincidences. Mr. Benton about that time was supposed to be a very prominent man for the Presidency, and it might be desirable to kill him off. It might also be that Mr. Rives had some private griefs in the election of Colonel Johnson. However, this once favored son of Virginia was thrown into the ranks of the Opposition; and his course now is in strange contradiction and contrast with his course in 1834. The much abused little expunger has now become a distinguished favorite of the Opposition. We are not without high authority for the position we assume, when we say that the banks themselves produce those great expansions and contractions which so much distress the country; and that the remedy is not in rechartertering the banks, or in extending the system of credit and confidence beyond due bounds. It may perhaps surprise some gentlemen that I should quote none other than Mr. Biddle himself; when, unbiased by excitement or prejudice, he is as capable of forming a correct opinion on the influence of banking as any individual in this country. Let us see what he said in 1828, when writing for the United States Gazette, in relation to the banking system:

"Like the power of steam, it is eminently useful in prudent hands; but of tremendous hazard when not controlled. The constant tendency of banks is to lend too much and put too many notes in circulation. The disorder in overtrading brought on by overbanking. The remedy is to bank less and trade less."

Here we have a most distinguished authority for saying that the true remedy for our evils is "to bank less and to trade less." It is the remedy we shall now have to adopt; and it must always be the remedy when a country has run wild with extravagant speculation. In this process, the country must for a time suffer severely—it cannot be avoided—it is a matter of necessity, (and necessity is always the excuse of the banks, you know, when it suits them to contract.) But while Mr. Biddle, in 1828, held these sound opinions, in 1836 he told the country that it was all a mistake to suppose we had overtraded, and bank men generally took the same ground. But I believe no sensible man will now deny but that we have ruinous overtrading produced by overbanking. Is it not argued, on both sides, that an increase of the currency increases prices? Do not we all know that prices a year or two past were enormously high? Too high because they could not be maintained. Ought wheat to be at $2 per bushel and other products in proportion? If indeed we could keep the price permanently at that point, it might be all well; but still the farmer would, in the long run, be no better off than when he gets a reasonable price. Is the country then benefited, if by an increased circulation you double prices? Your house, or slaves, or land, worth only $1,000, may be estimated nominally at $2,000; but you cannot raise a grain more of wheat, cannot live better, eat better food, or wear better clothes than before. True, you are said to be worth twice what you were before; but you have identically the same property you had then. All you have done is to make the currency worth half price. Indeed, I do not believe it is very material to the world whether the amount of money permanently in circulation be great or small. The danger and the difficulty arise from changing the standard of value by alternate expansions and contractions. When you multiply banks, you raise the nominal price of produce; but when a contraction ensues, prices fall, and the purchaser suffers. It benefits A, but it injures B in the same proportion. The keen-sighted merchant and speculator are on the look out for these changes. When the banks are going to expand, he goes into speculation, and purchases largely; prices rise, and he gets the advance; he sells his goods to the farmer on credit; when the money becomes due, the price of produce has probably fallen, and the farmer must sell double the amount of grain to pay his account to the merchant. The laborer is the last man to feel the benefit of an increase of the currency. The price of his labor does not rise so soon as the price of provisions and goods; he suffers until he is compelled to strike for higher wages. In this there can be no mistake; all know that prices have been above the point at which they can be maintained. The effect has been to transfer the wealth of the country from the hands of the laborers into the pockets of bank directors and speculators. I have some where read of a French gentleman who contrived to support himself, and in very good style too, out of the expansions and contractions in stockjobbing. A friend in Paris warned him beforehand of these changes, and he availed himself of the information, so as to buy when stocks were to rise, and sell before the fall. In this manner the banks grow rich. They manage the price of stocks as they please; they regulate exchanges at their own pleasure; they can make exchange high or low; and according to its rate they buy or sell. The community cannot understand how it is done: we see the effect, not the cause. The fluctuations in the stock market are caused by the demand which the banks produce. The public are unaware when the screw is to be turned backward or forward; the hand that moves it is concealed from view. No wonder that bank directors build fine houses, and roll in splendor.

Now, we are asked to encourage a system like this, instead of adopting the only currency recognised by the Constitution.

The gentleman from North Carolina on my right [Mr. RAYNER] alluded to the connection between the Government and the State banks. True, sir, there was such a connection, and seeing the unhappy consequences which flowed from it, we now ask a divorce. We found these false spouses, instead of doing their duty, were engaged in a conspiracy against us.

[Mr. RAYNER here asked: Does the gentleman allude to any connection of my friends with the State banks?]

No, sir, I allude to the connection between the banks and the Government; but I say we found these false wives engaged in a crim. con. an illicit intercourse with the gentleman's friends, and therefore have demanded a divorce from the bonds of matrimony. We surrender them to the gentleman and his friends, their seducers, and happy may they be.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are charged with having produced all the extravagant accommodations of these State banks. Now, sir, I have already referred to the conduct of the Bank of the United States in 1834–5, in increasing its accommodation from 44 to 66 millions, and its issues from 15 to 25 millions, and this just before its charter was to expire. This rash and expiring effort of the great monster caused much of the distress which afterwards ensued. The particular charge is, that President Jackson and his Secretary of the Treasury encourged the banks to extend their loans, and thus stimulated by Government, the banks started in the career of extravagance. Sir, I recollect distinctly in the first place, the charge was made by the friends of the Bank against the Administration party, that they had put down the Bank, and that the country would require new institutions, whose joint capital might be a substitute for that of the old Bank. The Administration party in general resisted the increase of bank capital which was demanded. In Virginia we had between six and seven millions of banking capital: the Opposition claimed thirteen millions more, and the Administration party opposed, and for a year, defeated the increase. We received our quota of the deposites and lent it to the banks. Our Legislature did finally consent to an increase of bank capital to the amount of five millions, on such conditions as it was thought would restrain their extravagance in the use of it. That was one of the strong considerations which induced them to submit to limitations such as had never before been known in Virginia. My own impression at the time was that they ought not to extend their business, though their capital had been increased. But gentlemen say that the President and the Secretary required the banks to extend their loans. The charge, I say, advanced by the Opposition, was that the State banks never could grant the community such facilities as they had obtained from the Bank of the United States; and the question every where mooted was, "How are we to get our exchanges?" The country was filled with the clamor of the banks' friends, and the Administration were charged with having cut off all accomodations from the people. In answer to this charge, the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury did say to the banks that they were expected to grant such facilities as the Bank of the United States had done; that was the advice given to the banks. When the banks were advised to grant facilities, it was on the proviso that they were to go as far as was consistent with the safety of the Government funds, but no farther. When the banks went beyond that point, the Administration were not responsible for their acts or for the consequences. Now this charge is made by the very men who clamored for accommodations; who even sent deputations here to demand them; who were eager, anxious, greedy, for them; and now, when in consequence of granting their own request, distress has come upon the country, they turn round and charge it all upon the Administration. It has become but too common a practice first to urge with great vehemence a certain course of action, and then to charge a compliance as a crime. It will also be recollected that the clamor of the day was that this money was loaned to the banks without interest. The State banks had a right to expect this privilege, because they were required to extend the same facilities as the United States Bank had done. Mr. Leigh charged Gen. Jackson with tyranny for loaning the public money to the banks without interest. He could not bear to see the State banks enjoying the same benefit which had been granted to the Bank of the United States, and introduced a section into the deposite law which required that when the moneys in the hands of the banks exceeded a certain amount, interest should be charged. Were not these gentlemen themselves responsible for these terms? The Opposition, to a man, went in favor of them; yet now they turn fiercely upon the President and his Secretary, because the banks used the public money, after being required to pay interest on it.

If we take all the acts of the Government together, we find the inconsistency of the Opposition on another ground. When the Government found that the State banks used their deposites, without regard to the interest or safety of the Government, but that it was fast losing possession of the public lands, and getting in exchange nothing but bank credits, with a view to check this profligate extravagance, the Treasury circular was issued; and what took place then? Why, in an instant, the whole country was filled with the clamors of the Opposition. This was an attack upon credit. Because we did not wish to let the whole public domain go into the hands of speculators, the President was denounced as a tyrant and a usurper; and this, too, by the very men who held the Administration responsible for the extravagant issues of the banks. So that whether the Administration encouraged the banks to lend, or checked and restrained their extravagant loans, it was alike in fault, and alike reviled. Those who were rapidly transferring the public lands into their own possession, were the very men who abused President Jackson for encouraging the banks to those loans which alone furnished the means of making fortunes.

Gentlemen here seem to take great delight in referring us to Great Britain; they pronounce eloquent and high sounding eulogies on the splender of her arts and arms, her commerce, and her wide dominions. Sir, there are too many politicians in our country, who like to look to England for examples. It is true she is great in arts and in arms; and it is equally true that she has been made great by the credit system. But England is great and distinguished for other things besides her arms, her arts, her commerce, and her power; she stands mournfully eminent for the enormous amount of her public debt, and for the number of her paupers, ground as they are to the dust by the operation of this her beautiful credit system. Do you admire her debt of four thousand millions, which hangs like a millstone about the neck of her Government? It has been said, I know, that by the pressure of that load the Government is held together. It may be so now, but this state of things cannot last forever. The time will yet come, when, disregarding all pecuniary obligations, the people of that empire will rise with a giant's strength, assert their rights by force, and the balance of the debt will be swept off at a dash. You cannot always keep down a nation of paupers. When starvation stares them in the face, they will rise in their despair, and lay all prostrate before them. Gentlemen may admire the condition of Great Britain: for myself, I confess I see but little to admire. There is much splendor, much wealth, much renown, and all that; but it is confined to a few—it is limited to King, Lords, and Commons—the mass of the people do not enjoy a state of domestic happiness and cheerful prosperity. The wealth and the glory are confined to "the higher circles." I do not admire a nation because it possesses a great navy, a numerous army, or splendid and costly palaces. That nation alone can be called truly great where the great mass are contented and happy—where wealth is widely diffused, and all have a share. We may go on with our credit system, till we are in the same situation with her—we may follow in her footsteps till we have in this country a bank aristocracy as irresponsible as it is in England. We may go on till, in this now free and equal community, we shall behold overgrown wealth in the hands of a few, while our manufactories are filled with starving wretchedness. Would this increase our national happiness? We may spread our commerce, and stretch abroad our arms, till we embrace the world, and still our wretchedness at home be none the less. When our merchants and speculators become princes, our poor, like the Irish peasant, may live on potatoes; and finding not enough even of these, may be compelled to rebel for bread. Yet we are called upon to admire the glory and splendor of the European Governments. Gentlemen forget the mass and look only at the nobles. I have no taste for such a state of society. I hold it better to guard against that credit system which, pushed to its legitimate results, will bring us into the condition of England. When we reach that point, revolution and anarchy must be the consequence. This credit system has enabled Great Britain to carry her arms and her dominions round the world, and will at last be her ruin. Her people, long ground down as laboring slaves beneath the feet of a lordly aristocracy, will not forever submit to their bondage. As a Republican statesman, I never can consent to draw my political principles from a man who held the British Government to be the beau ideal of perfection. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RAYNER] pronounced a sounding eulogy on Alexander Hamilton. I shall not detract from his talents: they are known and admitted by all—yet I cannot but think it strange, indeed, that a State Rights Republican, (as I know the gentleman to profess himself,) should select Alexander Hamilton as his model from whom to draw State Rights political principles. We are fallen on strange times. If ever two parties were founded on principle, as their grand distiction, it was the old parties which prevailed in this country in '98 and '99. At the head of one stood Alexander Hamilton: at the head of the other was Thomas Jefferson. That Federalists should admire with enthusiasm the character of Hamilton, does not surprise me: it is what we might expect. But that one calling himself a State Rights Republican should be that man's admirer and eulogist—I confess fills me with amazement. At that school I never should have thought of hearing the doctrines of State Rights Republicanism. The gentleman, I thought, seemed disposed, too, to disparage somewhat the fair fame of the Old Dominion. All I ask is, that if he holds such sentiments he will not publish them: and I will give my reason. A certain lady was once speaking very lightly of Napoleon: when a friend of his replied to her, "Oh don't talk so, you don't know how it will distress him." [A laugh.]

Now if my friend shall continue to reflect upon Virginia, she may be mortified and distressed.

[Mr. GRAVES here rose and said he did not see the application of the argument.

The CHAIR replied that the gentleman was in order.

Mr. RAYNER said, in explanation, that he had only referred to the doctrine of Hamilton on the subject of State rights, with a view to show that those who were the loudest in professions, were often the most wanting when it came to the point. Virginia politicians were always whining about State rights, and yet when matters came to the point, they were almost always found on the side of power.]

Mr. HOLLEMAN resumed. The charge has been made, though not very boldly, as if those who made it had no very great confidence in its truth, that this Sub-Treasury bill is in fact a bank. So said a distinguished Senator, [Mr. CLAY,] and so have said some gentlemen here. And why and how is it a bank? The Treasurer of the United States is empowered to draw on the depositaries of the public money, and his draft is to be paid, and that these drafts will get into circulation as currency. The Secretary can draw as a bank can, and therefore the Treasury is a bank. That is the argument. But does that constitute a bank? May not any individual draw for his own funds? I may draw a check on the Bank of Washington—am I therefore a banker? The thing is done every day. A good check, known to be good, passes from hand to hand as much money. Is the drawer, therefore, a banker, and his check money? But if this be so, and the Sub-Treasury is a Government bank, then we have always had a Government bank. Has not the Secretary or the Treasurer of the United States always drawn on the depositaries of the public money, on collectors and receivers, and on the Bank of the United States? And could not such drafts as well have gone into circulation as currency then as now? A draft on the Bank of the United States, endorsed by Government, was generally as good as gold and silver, and for some uses better. Did such drafts take the place of money, and enter into the general circulation? If we are to have a Government bank by this bill, we always have had one.

If a man holds a draft of the Treasurer, and does not choose to present it, he is now just where he was. But there is this additional safeguard: the Secretary is directed so to manage his drafts that they shall not enter into the circulation of the country; he is ordered to prevent this as far as in his power; whereas before there was no such restriction. Does the gentleman see any authority in this bill to make drafts for circulation? I say again, if this is a bank, then there has been a Treasury bank ever since the commencement of the Government. No matter where the depositary may be, there will always be the same difficulty. It has been the law of the land for the last fifty years. Is it now to be made a matter of complaint against this Administration? Cannot the Postmaster General do the same? There are 13,000 Postmasters in this country on whom he may make quarterly drafts. Is the Post Office, therefore, a Government bank? and are the drafts of the Postmaster General a currency? Here is the dreaded system in its widest extent, yet who ever complained that the General Post Office is a Government bank? The Treasury is not to have one tenth part of the number of depositories, and yet it is called a Government bank! It is amazing to hear gentlemen bring forward such an argument; it is scarcely worth refuting. I trust when the gentleman goes home and tells his constituents that this is a bank, he will not forget to tell them, also, that we have had just the same sort of a Government bank ever since we had a Federal Government.

Another accusation against us is, that by this measure we wish to reduce the price of labor. I will tell gentlemen what our object is: it is to reestablish a sound currency. This, and this alone, is the simple naked object we have in view. All other currencies have miscarried—we want to encourage the introduction of gold and silver as a standard of value; we want to make it, in matters of value, what the standard bushel is in matters of quantity. We would use it as a standard bushel or a lawful yardstick; and we want all things measured by the same yard and the same bushel. I say that it will cause no disproportionate reduction in the price of labor. It is true, however, that when the country shall have settled down into a sound and natural condition, and we have a currency of uniform value, the nominal price of labor may not be as high as it has been for the last two years. The value of money will not be as low. We propose to correct the system, not partially, but throughout. This will not injure the poor man, but, on the contrary, will establish a currency by which he will be protected in the just rewards of his industry. We do not offer him a system which will to day give him an enormous price for his labor, and to-morrow throw him out of employment; that is just what we want to guard against. We want labor to be so rewarded that the laborer may know that he will get steady employment and a uniform fair price from year to year. We would not raise his hopes with a high price at one time, and give him a low price or no price at all at another time. This is what the banks themselves will be compelled to resort to. They have done the same thing at various times heretofore; they are doing it now, and will continue, until from necessity, (for nothing less than necessity will ever move them;) from necessity, I say, they will be compelled to "bank less and trade less." The laborer is not benefited by high prices, unless he can at the same time buy at low prices. Suppose he can now get a dollar, and save half of it; double his dollar, it will at first seem a great benefit; the man will be delighted; but he will soon find that he is charged double as well as paid double. He lays up a dollar, it is true, but his dollar buys no more for his family than his half dollar did. Instead or getting a bushel of corn for his increased wages he gets the same half bushel as before. That state of things once took place in Kentucky. A man might offer a silver dollar for his breakfast and he would receive a paper dollar in change; nominally he got his breakfast for nothing, but in fact paid fifty cents in hard money.

The gentleman misunderstood me, if he thought I said labor, like produce, had been at a higher real price than it can be kept up to. The banks can tell you, they cannot supply a currency as they could before, and the reason is, they banked too much. They must reduce their business; that of necessity reduces the price both of commodities and of labor, below the true standard. This has been done over and over again by the banks, and no complaints were heard; but let Government attempt to correct such abuses, and at once it is charged with tyranny and and an attempt to injure the poor. It is not so; it is the antagonist plan that injures the poor man. It is the plan which puts it in the power of a moneyed corporation to say how much the honest laborer shall receive for his week's work. If you pay him in money of the Brandon Bank, he is to get $2; if in silver, $1. Was Mississippi benefited by the issue of the "Brandon money?"

The banks say that they must reduce their issues. This produces distress and low prices. My object is to have a sound uniform currency, by which the laborer can be benefited, as well as other classes of the community. By the credit plan, bank corporations fix the rate of their own profits, and fix at the same time the price of labor.

We are called upon for relief. "What measures," say they, "do you propose for the relief of the people?" When gentlemen themselves were thus called upon, what did they do?

In 1837, we relieved the banks and the merchants by giving them a longer to pay their debts to the Government, and that is the mode of relief always asked. But what did Congress do for for farmers and laborers? Give them bread? Oh, no; the maxim was—"Take care of the banks, they will take care of the merchants"—and they, the merchants, were the people! Very fine—the people were to trust to the tender mercies of the merchants! As well might you trust the wolf to nurse the tender lamb. The banks get relief, and then they grant to the community just such relief as will best suit their own purposes. They will nurse them and feed them as men take care of their horses—to get as much labor out of them as possible. We are charged with the design of bringing down the price of labor to the standard of foreign countries. Sir, that is a thing which cannot be done. And the reason is this: the wealth of those countries consists in their lands. Land is there scarce and dear, while labor, on the contrary, is abundant and cheap. Here the case is directly the reverse: land is abundant and cheap, while labor is comparatively scarce and high. Gentleman may adopt what plans they please. I defy them to reduce our laboring classes to the European standard of prices. In the older parts of the country, in manufacturing districts, they may, after a long time, approach to it; but, in the agricultural sections, and in the wide and fertile West, thank God, the thing is impossible. We have an abundance of land, and labor will meet its just reward. You may injure the laborer by the credit system, and he will and must be injured by the constant expansions and contractions of the circulating medium; but I trust the time is coming when we shall have the blessings of a better system. The General Government has begun it, and I hope the States will follow. Whether the currency shall be wholly metallic, or shall consist partly of gold and silver and partly of paper, it is not necessary to inquire. It is not for us to decide what the States shall do: we must leave that to their wisdom. Be it our part to set them, at least, a sound example.

Mr. Chairman, the questions involved in this bill are of vast importance: they are questions which must be settled, one way or the other. The country must make its choice between the system of banks and our simple plan of a constitutional currency. These questions are agitating and occupying the public mind, and they cannot remain longer undecided. Who is responsible for the great and unprecedented excitement which has been created, and who is chargeable with the distress which is said to prevail, are also questions which the people will settle. I entertain no fears for the issue. There are perhaps some gentlemen who may seek to excuse themselves, like the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. RAYNER,] by pleading infancy as a bar to his Jacksonism. As the gentleman is very young, I must forgive him for being a little extravagant. We treat with much forbearance those of tender years; and as he is my neighbor, I am ready to pardon the gentleman, as soon as he shall show, by his conduct, that he repents. He has mettle and high spirit. I defend and excuse him, as a young gentleman, and trust he will depart from the error of his way, and no longer follow after false gods. As to the great mass of those who have joined in the cry against the Administration, the people will decide whether they are to be justified in their course. They may file their indictments as soon as they like; we take issue with them, and put ourselves on the country, having no apprehension but that the verdict will be for the defendant, and that the plaintiffs, for their false clamor, in mercy be discharged. But as to the great leaders in this unholy war—those who could not bear to see others rise while they remained stationary—those who cannot endure to look upon the tenant of the White House, and who claim for themselves all the offices and all the honors of the country—those who, in the bitterness of their envious spirits, cry out with Haman, "What doth all this avail us, so long as we see Mordecai sitting at the king's gate—so long as we see Martin Van Buren, whom the people delight to honor, presiding at the White House"—as to those leaders, who, from a spirit of envy and ambition, have combined and confederated to put down this Administration at every sacrifice and at all hazards, a decree shall go forth from an insulted and indignant people, who are rising in the majesty of their strength, and it will read, "Let them be hanged like Haman upon the gallows prepared for Mordecai the Jew."

REMARKS OF MR. SMITH,

OF INDIANA,

In the House of Representatives, July 20, 1840—In reply to Mr. PROFFIT, on the amendment to the appropriation bill, giving to the President the power to withhold or limit the application of certain appropriations, if the condition of the Treasury should demand it.

Mr. SMITH arose and said: Mr. SPEAKER, to occupy the time of the committee at this late stage of the session, when every moment is so precious, needs some apology from me to the committee and to the country; and that apology may be found in the extraordinary remarks of my colleague. He considered that the time improperly consumed in debate could not be regarded in any other light than as a trespass upon the patience of the committee, and injurious to the interests of the country.

But, Mr. S. said, as he had occupied but little time of the House this session, he hoped a few moments would be accorded to him, whilst he proposed to say something in relation to the amendment pending, and briefly to reply to some of the extraordinary and strange remarks of his colleague, [Mr. PROFFIT,] who had just taken his seat. My colleague (said Mr. S.) has indulged in a strain of bitter invective and withering denunciation—and that, too, in a manner unique and peculiar to himself alone. On this, as on former occasions, he spoke of his utter contempt of the President, and said, "God knows he does hate the President, Mr. Van Buren—that he would not eat with him or drink with him. I cannot find words to express my contempt for him; sir, I would not touch him with a ten foot pole." This was the language of his colleague.

Sir, said Mr. S. (turning round to Mr. PROFFIT,) I must implore my colleague, in the name of humanity, to take back his denunciation, to withhold his hate, and to eradicate his contempt for the President; and I am sure he would, if he was conscious of the inexpressible and excrutiating pain he was inflicting. I appeal to this House and to the country, to tell me, how it is possible for the President to exist under the hate and contempt of my colleague. But, sir, it is fortunate for the President, (and I hope equally for the country,) that he is not aware of the hate my colleague bears him—else, like a wasting atrophy, it would seize upon him, prey upon his spirits, waste his flesh and end his life in wretchedness. [Loud laughter.] And, said Mr. S. my colleague has unmitigated contempt for all the heads of the Departments, and all the great Federal officers. Well, I congratulate my countrymen that they are unconscious of this alarming fact—the existence of this blighting hate—else on our return next fall, we would find those officers, should they live through it, stalking about the streets here like an army of ghosts, blighted, withered, and wasted away to mere skeletons, under the contemptuous ire of my colleague—some of whom, at the present time, weigh 200lbs. gross. [Yes, a voice cried out, "Levi does." Loud laughter.] Then, sir, in view of the probable effects, I implore my friend and colleague to reflect on the quantum of pain he is inflicting, and the disastrous consequences that may result from it to the injury of individuals, and perhaps to the country, to spare, oh spare them! When he is cool, I am sure he will do as I conjure him—for kindness is one of his characteristic virtues.

But my colleague holds this amendment, too, in contempt, "and the sneaking, low, underhanded manner in which such things are stolen in upon us at the end of the session." Sir, I would inquire if he has reflected whence this amendment came. Does he not know it is an amendment made by the Senate to a bill of the House? Should that not entitle it to some portion of respect from my colleague. Sir, what is the character of the Senate of the United States? I have been taught to respect it. I have schooled myself to think highly of it. Is it not the most august and talented deliberative body in the world? I believe the world would accord that much to it. This should weigh some little in the mind of my friend in favor of the amendment. But that is not worth straws in his estimation. Well, said Mr. S. my colleague has pronounced the doom of this Administration, and says "it must go down, and, if by revolution, it must go down;" he says, "if he had a son, he would train him up to arms, and point him to the purpose." These are extraordinary sentiments to be expressed on the floor of the American Congress by a representative of the people. But this accords well with sentiments I have heretofore seen expressed in a correspondence of a member of Congress with a venerable constituent, and published and endorsed by a very respectable opposition paper, the National Intelligencer. In one sentence the correspondent says: "I would sooner have my property in the funds of Great Britain than in those of the United States." Another says: "I should prefer the Government of Victoria." A third says: "I am tired of this Government," &c. Sir, said Mr. S. these are extraordinary sentiments to be avowed openly through the press, and by representatives who hold seats on the floor of Congress. I do not know the extent of the spread of such opinions and feelings as these. I hope, however, their roots do not strike deep into our political soil, for surely it is not possible that any man can seriously desire to overthrow the temple of liberty in this happy land. But I am happy to learn that my colleague has no son to train up in the way that he would have him to go, but that he has two lovely little daughters; and I hope they may live and marry true Republicans, who will feel and appreciate liberty, love and serve a Republic in a Democratic form, be faithful to the institutions of their country in peace, and, if there be need, that they will fight for it bravely and defend it nobly in war. Sir, said Mr. S. my colleague is extremely captious, and expresses strong opposition to the Government, and openly avows his eternal hostility to the Administration, avers that he does not like it, nor that he ever will. Well, it will be in vain to attempt to quiet my colleague's opposition. I know his inflexible disposition, and for my part I would as leave undertake by contract to furnish water to cool the flames of hell as to attempt to allay his ire, or undertake to give reasons to quiet the spirits of the damned, as to furnish arguments to reconcile him to this Administration. Sir, it cannot be done; the words "eternal hostility" have gone out of his mouth, and the case is hopeless. Mr. S. said his colleague seized hold of small points, with a microscopic eye, and threw them out before the public, with a view, no doubt, to deceive. If so, he mistook the intelligence of the people. If he thought, by holding the Government up to them, as extremely profligate and corrupt, because they have sold a few bushels of damaged corn in the progress of the Florida war, for four or five cents per bushel, that he would convince them that it was corrupt, he was mistaken. How such statements may affect men's constitutents, I know not, but I am sure it will make but little impression upon mine; they are a reasoning, intelligent, and liberal, and are always willing to make due allowance, for they expect imperfection in Government as in men. Sir, I would allow no man to make such statements to my constituents without proper explanations, and to go away without exposure.

Mr. S. said that his colleague had a kind of prophetic ken, for he says that he is a "prophet, and the son of a prophet." He did not know that that endowment entitled him to much credit for wisdom or sagacity. But his impression was that it did not; for prophets did not come to their conclusions by any of the known modes of reasoning, and by philosophical deductions, but, if true prophets, spoke as they were inspired. If not, they are false prophets, and are not to be believed. Mr. S. was of the opinion, at the present time, more prophets, or those who professed that gift, were to be found amongst the illiterate, low, and vulgar, than any other class of people; and as to modern prophecy, my friend cannot compare with a set of old women, socially seated around a tea table. My colleague says "he had a bad opinion of this Government before he came here." I came here prepared to find many things wrong, and did not expect to find perfection in any of the departments. I regard the Government as a mighty machine of complex and extended operations, and did not expect to find it perfect in all its parts. Those who expect perfection will never have their hopes realized.

But (continued Mr. S.) this amendment and this course of legislation are denounced in no measured terms as dictatorial on the part of the Executive, and creeping, crawling servility on the part of the majority of this House. Well, it may be so; but is there any thing in it compared with the tone and temper of dictation of my colleague, who says "this bill shall not pass with this amendment," and that he would denounce any Whig as a Tory, who would vote for it; and that he gave the friends of the Administration fair notice that, "if they proposed to carry it, they must have and keep a quorum in the House." Sir, (said Mr. S.) these authoritative declarations I call dictation that comes in no questionable shapes, when a member will stand up in his place, and pronounce upon the course a whole party shall pursue. It may be borne by those who act with him, or move by his direction, but such a mode of dictation is not known on our side of the House. The sequel will prove how far the dictation is obeyed. I fear the servility of the great independents will show quite as palpably as those who are dictated to by the Executive or his corrupt cabinet officers.

Mr. S. proceeded to make some comments on the great delay in the despatch of public business, arising in the House, as he believed, from the undue proportion of a certain talking profession, though he disclaimed any intention of making an attack on any order of men. But it was a deplorable fact, that matters of the utmost importance to the nation, were frequently hung up in that House on a point of order—business of vital importance was protracted and delayed by the merest pettifogging and special pleading. Ay, sir, questions of the utmost importance are in this way suspended for months and for years on points and punctilios, that the same number of common sense men would settle in an hour.

Mr. S. proceeded to show that the cause of many of the evils of the Government were overlooked. Sir, (said Mr. S) the President and heads of departments are charged with and denounced for extravagance, and strongly implicated as being corrupt, when no man can put his finger on a cent that any of them have drawn from the Treasury, not authorized by law. Yet all this does not save them from fierce invective. Sir, I think the evil is not so much in the Executive and heads of departments, as in the practice which has long prevailed, of appointing to office young sprigs of the aristocracy and boys from West Point, to be disbursing and contracting agents. These men have never, perhaps, in their lives, earned a meal's victuals—they know but little about the use or value of money, and less about the value of labor. When they disburse, they do it profusely, and when they contract for the Government, they are the sure victims of the keen Government speculator. In this way, sir, the public Treasury is made to bleed at every pore. The agents are frequently supplied from another class of gentry, in whose competency to perform such trusts with ability and fidelity, I have quite as little confidence. I mean a kind of quasi professional men, who thrust themselves into such places by their continual watching and ceaseless importunities. In this particular, I would say to the appointing power, discard the practice of taking disbursing agents from West Point or the line of the army, and take men from the people, of mature age and known probity; and when you want men to contract, select them from the same pure source—the great body of the people—and if either of those selected in this way should have been a laboring man at some time in life, he will be none the less qualified on that account; but will, perhaps, know experimentally something of the value of labor. My word for it, such men will be less the subject of imposition.

Sir, said Mr. S. I do not possess oratory to be a polished speaker. To do my own speaking in a plain way, is as much as I can attend to; but I hold that no man shall trample upon me, after the manner or style of my colleague, or in any other way, if I can avoid it. I fear that I have been more tedious than I intended; but I shall say a few things to the amendment, and then conclude.

Sir, said Mr. S. I understand this to be an amendment added to a bill of this House by the Senate, authorizing the President of the United States, on certain contingencies, to postpone operations on certain named and specified works, if it can be done without injury to the public service, with a view that the expenditure shall not exceed the means in the Treasury and accruing revenue within the year. Now, sir, this is plainly and simply the fact. How is it possible for those croakers about economy to find so much fault with it? If I understand the people, this is just what they want; that is, that the means of the Treasury shall be kept low, and the expenditures within those means. The friends of the Administration have proposed this course, as a measure of economy, and to avoid encumbering the country with a national debt. It is a course which I heartily approve; but (said he) my reforming colleague is outraged with such a policy. If this policy tends to parsimony, his must tend to extravagance. Sir, said Mr. S. the true secret of this unheard of opposition to the Administration is, that the Whigs are most cruelly chafed and galled to think they have not been able to run up the appropriations so as to discredit the Government, or compel it to resort to loans, or, at this late hour, compel us to steal in (as they say) a proposition to authorize the emission of more Treasury notes. In all these hopes, I am happy to think, purely patriotic gentlemen, you will be disappointed. Congress will adjourn, and you will find that your fancies and hopes and desires have been delusive and vain.

The Government is denounced as being insolvent; and it is a choice sentiment to send to the country, that your Treasury is bankrupt. Mr. S. inquired if gentleman would tell him whose business it was to replenish the Treasury. Was it not the duty of Congress? And who had more right than the Opposition to propose ways and means. Do gentlemen recollect that the operation of the celebrated compromise tariff had reduced the revenue from customs nearly one half? And do not all men know that the monetary matters of the whole world are in confusion, and calculated to disturb revenue arising from commerce? Will gentlemen be magnanimous, and make some allowance for all those causes which tend to cut off the resources from the support of Government? But, above all things, if they wish economy, let them not, by any means which they can bring to bear, try to prevent it.

BANKRUPT BILL.

SENATE, JUNE 2, 1840.

Mr. CALHOUN said: It was impossible to listen to this discussion, without being struck with the difficulty of the subject, and the number and delicacy of the questions involved. The relation of creditor and debtor was, indeed, the all-pervading one in our country, and ought not to be touched without much deliberation and caution. This bill and the amendment proposed, taken together, embrace this universal relation, almost to its utmost extent and minutest ramification, and ought to be examined with corresponding care and attention.

I was at first inclined to favor the bill; but the discussion and reflection have brought me to the conclusion that it is unconstitutional, and therefore could not receive my support, if there were no other objection. The power of Congress is restricted, by the Constitution, to establishing laws on the subject of bankruptcies. That is the limit of its power. It cannot go an inch beyond, on the subject of this bill, without violating the Constitution. Thus far, all must be agreed.

After full and deliberate investigation, I cannot regard this bill as one on the subject of bankruptcy. It relates, in my opinion, to another, but connected, subject, not embraced in the Constitution—that of insolvency, miscalled voluntary bankruptcy—as I hope to be able to establish.

In order to understand the ground on which my opinion rests, it will be necessary to premise—what none have denied, or can deny—that, at the time of the formation of the Constitution, there existed, both in this country and in England, from which we derived our laws, two separate systems of laws, growing out of the relation of creditor and debtor; the one known as the system of bankruptcy, and the other of insolvency. The two systems had existed together in England for centuries, and in this country from an early period of our colonial Governments. It would be useless to waste the time of Senate in accumulating proof of a fact beyond controversy. This very bill, and the only one ever passed by Congress on the subject of bankruptcy, bear internal evidence of the fact. The decisions of judges recognise the distinction, and elementary works place them under distinct heads, and in separate chapters. The distinction is one neither of form nor accident. The two systems, in commercial communities, naturally grow up out of the relation of creditor and debtor, but originate in different motives, and have different objects, which give different character and genius to the two.

The system of insolvent laws grew out of the debtor side of the relation, and originated in motives of humanity for the unfortunate but honest debtor, deprived of the means of paying his debts by some of the various unforeseen accidents of life, and in consequence exposed to the oppression of unfeeling creditors. Their object is to relieve him from the power of his creditors, on an honest surrender of all his property for their benefit.

Very different are the motives and objects in which the laws of bankruptcy originated. They grew out of the creditor side of the relation, and form a portion of the mercantile or commercial code of laws. Their leading object is to strengthen the system of commercial credit, with the view of invigorating and extending commercial enterprise; and we accordingly find that the system commenced in the commercial Republic of Venice, and has been confined exclusively, as far as my knowledge extends, to commercial communities. Though growing out of the same relation, and to that extent connected, the two are as different in genius and character as the different aspects of the relation out of which they grow. The one looks to credit and the creditor interest, and the other to the debtor, and the obligations of humanity towards him, when, without demerit on his part, he is utterly deprived of the means of meeting his engagements.

It is true, indeed, that the insolvent system, in its humanity for the debtor, is not unmindful of the interest of the creditor; nor the bankrupt system, in guarding the interest of credit and creditors, does not forget that of the debtor. But this, though it has, to a certain extent, blended the two, and caused some confusion in practice, cannot obliterate the essential and broad distinction between them. Nor is it necessary, with my object, to trace the history of the legislation in relation to them in this country and England, with the judicial decisions, in order to show that the two systems, though blended and confounded in part, have, nevertheless, retained their distinctive features. It is enough for me that there were, when the Constitution was adopted, two separate systems, known both to our laws and the English, such as I have described.

I next assert, that the members of the convention that framed the Constitution could not have been ignorant of the fact, that there were two such systems, known by the names of bankrupt and insolvent laws. The convention abounded with able lawyers, many of whom were among the most distinguished and influential members of the body, and could not but be as perfectly familiar with the whole subject as we now are, after this long and able discussion.

Now, sir, I ask, is it to be supposed, that if they intended to delegate to Congress power over both systems, these able and cautious men, so familiar with the distinction between them, would not have included both by name? And is it not conclusive, that in not doing so, and in limiting the grant to bankruptcy alone, that it was their intention to grant that only, to the exclusion of insolvency? Do we not feel, that if we were framing a constitution, with our present knowledge of the subject, that such would be our course? If we intended to grant both, would we not insert both? And would not the insertion of bankruptcy only, be intended to exclude insolvency? The conclusion appears irresistible. How is it met? By admitting (for it cannot be denied) that such would be the case, if the words of the Constitution are to be taken in their legal sense; but it is asserted that our Constitution was made for the people at large, and on this assumption it is inferred that it ought to be interpreted, in all cases, according to the ordinary meaning of the words used, and not in their legal sense. Having arrived at this conclusion, it is next contended, that, according to their ordinary sense, bankruptcy and insolvency are convertible terms, and of the same meaning; and it is thence inferred that the framers of the Constitution intended to comprehend both under the former.

I might well deny both the premises and conclusion. It might be easily shown, that in many cases the words of the Constitution must, and have been, constantly taken in their legal sense, and that, according to the established rules of construction, they ought to be so taken in this. It might be also shown that they are not convertible, in common use; that insolvency is the general term, and includes bankruptcy. But I deem all this unnecessary. I admit, for the sake of argument, both premises and conclusion, but deny the application. Taken unconnected with other words, insolvency and bankruptcy may be admitted to have the same meaning, and that the one may stand for the other; but that is not this case. In the Constitution, bankruptcy stands in connection with law, which, attaching itself to it, fixes its meaning. Now, sir, I assert, however the terms bankruptcy and insolvency may be confounded, standing alone, no one—no, not the most uninformed, confounds bankrupt laws with insolvent laws. They never call the insolvent laws of the States bankrupt laws. They may not be able to draw the distinction with any precision, but they know that they are not the same.

But admit that there is doubt. I ask, what is the rule of interpretation to be applied to the Constitution in case of doubt? It is a fundamental principle that Congress has no right to exercise any power whatever that is not granted by the Constitution. To do so would be an act of usurpation, and; if knowingly done, a violation of oath. Hence, in cases of doubt, it is a just caution to take the words in their limited sense, and not their broad and comprehensive—a rule at all times considered as essential to the safety of the Constitution, by those of the States Right creed. Apply it to this case, and the controversy ceases. Let me add that there are few subjects, in reference to which it is more necessary to apply the most rigid rules of construction, than to that of the all-pervading relation of debtor and creditor. It is one on which the slightest encroachment is dangerous, and might, in its consequences, draw into the vortex of this Government the whole of that vast relation in its fullest extent, and with it the entire money transactions of the Union, as will be manifest in the sequel.

If, after what has been said, doubts should still exist, they may be removed by turning to another provision of the Constitution, standing in close connection with this. I have said that the bankrupt system grew out of the commercial policy, and made a part of it. The provision I refer to is that which grants to Congress the power of regulating commerce. This grant carried with it several others, as connected powers; such as that of coining money and regulating the value thereof; fixing an uniform standard of weights and measures, and we accordingly find these, with the power of establishing laws of bankruptcy, all grouped together, and following in close connection, the parent power of regulating commerce; just where we would expect to find it, regarded in the light I do, but not, if taken in the broader and more general sense of insolvency, in which it would comprehend far more than what relates to trade, and what, under our system, belong to the mass of local and particular powers reserved to the States.

So irresistible does the conclusion at which I have arrived appear to me, that I have been forced to inquire how it is that any one in favor of a strict construction of the Constitution could come to a different, and can find but one explanation. We are in the midst of great pecuniary embarrassment, suddenly succeeding a period of several years of an opposite character. There are thousands who, but a short time since, regarded themselves as rich, now reduced to poverty, with a weight of debt bearing them down, from which they can never expect to extricate themselves, without the interposition of Government. The prevailing opinion is, that the Legislatures of the States can apply no remedy beyond the discharge of the person, and that there is no other power which can give a discharge against debts, and relieve from the burden, but Congress. That so large and enterprising a portion of our citizens should be reduced to so hopeless a condition, makes a strong appeal to our feelings, of which I am far from being insensible. It is not at all surprising, that, under the influence of such feelings, judgment should yield to sympathy; and that, under the impression there is no other remedy, one should be sought in a loose and unsafe construction of the Constitution; and hence the broad construction contended for. I appeal to the candor of my State Right friend, who differs from me on this occasion, if what I state is not the true explanation. If I mistake not, it might be safely asserted that there is not one among them who would yield the power to this Government, if he believed the State Legislature could apply a remedy. I, on my part, neither assert nor deny that they can; but I do assert, that if the States cannot discharge the debt, neither can Congress.

I hold it clear, if by discharging the debt be meant releasing the obligation of a contract, either in whole or part, that neither this Government nor that of any of the States possesses such a power. The obligation of a contract belongs not to the civil or political code, but the moral. It is imposed by an authority higher than human, and can be discharged by no power under heaven, without the assent of him to whom the obligation is due. It is binding on conscience itself. If a discharged debtor had in his pocket the discharges of every Government on earth, he would not be an honest man, should he refuse to pay his debts, if ever in his power. In this sense, this Government is just as powerless to discharge a debt as the most inconsiderable State in the Union.

But the subject may be viewed in a different light. It may be meant that Government is not bound to lend its aid to a hard and griping creditor, in the cruel attempt to coerce the honest but unfortunate debtor, who has lost his all, to pay his debts, when it is utterly beyond his power. Certainly not; and, in that sense, every Government has the right to discharge the debt, as well as the person. They both stand on the same ground. It is a question of mere discretion, when and in what manner the Government will give its aid to enforce the demand of the creditor; but, thus regarded, State Legislatures are just as competent to discharge the debt, under their insolvent laws, or, in the absence of our legislation, under their bankrupt laws, as Congress itself. In proof of what is asserted, I might cite the laws of many of the States, and my own among others, which discharge the debt, as well as the person, as far as the suing creditors are concerned—the constitutionality of which, as far as I know, has never been questioned. It would, indeed, be a violent and unreasonable presumption, to suppose that, in granting the right to establish laws of bankruptcy, the States intended to leave Congress free to discharge the debt, and at the same time imposed on themselves an obligation to forbear the exercise of the same power in the case of insolvency or bankruptcy, should Congress decline to exercise the power granted. Nor can such be the intention of the provision in the Constitution which prohibits the States from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts. The history of the times amply proves that the prohibition was intended to apply to stay laws, and others of a similar description, which State Legislatures had been in the habit of passing, in periods like the present, when a sudden contraction of our always unstable currency had succeeded a wide expansion, and when large portions of the community, with ample means, found themselves unable to meet their debts; but who, with indulgence, would be able to meet all demands. The objects of all these laws were either to afford time, or to protect the debtor against the hardship of paying the same nominal amount, but in reality a much greater, in consequence of a change in the standard of value, resulting from a contraction of the currency. As plausible as was the object, experience had proved it to be destructive of credit, and injurious to the community, and hence the prohibition. To extend it beyond, and give a construction which would compel the States, whether they would or not, to lend their aid to the merciless creditor, who would reduce to despair an innocent, but unfortunate, debtor, without benefit to himself, and thereby to render him a burden to himself and society, would be abhorrent to every feeling of humanity, and principle of sound policy. It is impossible for me to believe that such was the intention of the Constitution. Nor can I be reconciled to a construction which must have the effect of enlarging the power of this Government, and contracting those of the States, in relation to the delicate and all-pervading relation of debtor and creditor, by throwing on the side of the former the powerful consideration of humanity and sympathy for a large and unfortunate portion of the community.

Having now established, I trust, satisfactorily, that the framers of the Constitution, in restricting the power of Congress to establishing laws of bankruptcy, intended to exclude those of insolvency, it remains to be shown that this bill belongs to the latter class, and is, therefore, unconstitutional. And here I might shift the burden of proof to the other side, and demand of them to prove that it is a bankrupt, and not an insolvent bill. They who claim to exercise a power under this Government are bound to exhibit the grant, and to prove that the power proposed to be exercised is within its limits—to show, in this case, what a law of bankruptcy is—how far its limits extend—that this bill does not go beyond; and, in particular, that it does not cover the ground belonging to the connected power of insolvency reserved to the States. Till that is done, they have no right to expect our votes in its favor. The task is impossible. Every feature of the bill bears the impress of insolvency. The arguments, urged for and against it, demonstrate it. Have its advocates uttered a word, in urging its passage, in favor of credit or creditors? On the contrary, have not their warm and eloquent appeals been in behalf of the unfortunate and honest debtors, who have been reduced to hopeless insolvency by the embarrassment of the times? And has it not been attacked on the ground that it would be ruinous to credit, and unjust and oppressive to creditors? Every word uttered on either side, proves that it belongs to the class of insolvent laws, and is, therefore, unconstitutional. As such, it cannot receive my support, were it free from other objections.

But as decidedly as I am opposed to the bill, I am still more so to the amendment proposed as a substitute by the minority of the committee. It contains a provision in favor of insolvent debtors, similar to that of the bill; and is, of course, liable to the same objections. But it goes much farther and provides for a comprehensive system of compulsory bankruptcy, as it is called; that is, as I understand it, bankruptcy as intended by the Constitution. As far as the provisions of this portion of the bill is limited to individuals, I admit its constitutionality, but object to it on the broad ground of expediency.

It is impossible for any one to doubt, who will examine the history of our legislation, that there must be some powerful objection to the passage of laws of bankruptcy by Congress. No other proof is needed than the fact, that although the Government has been in operation for more than half a century, and the power is unquestionable; yet, in that long period, notwitstanding the numerous and strenuous efforts that have been made, but a single act has passed; and that, though limited to five years, was repealed before the expiration of the time. If we inquire into the cause, we shall find it, in part, at least, in the genius of our institutions, and the character of our people, which are abhorrent to whatever is arbitrary or harsh in legislation, than which there is none, in its wide range, more so than the laws of bankruptcy. They give the creditors the most summary and efficient process against the debtors, of which we may be satisfied by looking into the provisions of this amendment. On the mere suspicion of insolvency, or fraud, one or more creditors, to whom not less than five hundred dollars is due, may take out a process of bankruptcy against the debtor, by applying to a judge of the Federal Court; and on his order, without jury, he may be divested of his property, and the whole of his estate placed in the hands of assignees, with authority to wind up and settle his affairs, and distribute the proceeds among his creditors.

But, as repugnant as a process so summary and arbitrary is to the genius and character of our institutions and people, there is another objection connected with our currency still stronger. It has been the misfortune of our country, at all times, with the exception of some short intervals, to be cursed with an unsound and unstable paper currency, subject to sudden and violent expansions and contractions. It belongs to such currency, in the period of its expansion, to excite an universal spirit of enterprise and speculation, particularly in a country so new, and rapidly increasing, and of such vast capacity for increase, as ours. Universal indebtedness is the result, followed on the contraction, by wide-spread embarrassment, reducing thousands to hopeless insolvency, and leaving a still greater number, though possessed of ample property to pay their debts in ordinary times, without money, or the means of getting it, to meet the demands against them. What can be imagined more oppressive, unjust, or cruel, than to place at such a period, such a power in the hands of hard and grasping creditors?

Now, sir, we are in the midst of such a one—a period of almost unexampled contraction, following one, remarkable above all others, for the extent and duration of the expansion; for the universality and boldness of speculation, and the extent and severity of the embarrassment which has followed. Such is the period selected to arm, the creditors against the debtors, with the harsh summary and arbitrary power of a bankrupt law—a period, such as the States, in former times, interposed, with stay laws, valuation laws, and others of like description, to save the debtor struggling against an adverse current, and who, if allowed time, could save himself and family from poverty. This amendment proposes to reverse this humane but misguided policy, and, instead of interposing in favor of the embarrassed but solvent debtors, to arm their creditors with more powerful means to crush them. I say misguided policy. I will not call it unjust. On the contrary, there is a strong principle of justice at the bottom in favor of interposing at such a period as the present, if it could be done on principles of sound policy. The condition in which so large a portion of our people now find themselves, in debt, with ample means of discharging all they owe, if time be allowed, but incapable of immediate payment, is much less their fault than that of the improvident legislation of the States, countenanced by this Government, and by which the solid and stable currency of the Constitution has been expelled, and an unsound, vacillating one of bank notes substituted in its place, incapable of discharging debts. By its sudden, violent, and unexpected fluctuations, alternately raising and depressing prices, tempting, at the one period, to contract debts, and leaving debtors, at the other, without the means of paying, the whole country, even the cautious and prudent, has become involved in debt and embarrassment. To this cause may be traced the present condition of the country, and the many similar ones through which the country has of late so frequently passed, in which few are out of debt; and of the indebted, though few are actually insolvent, but a small portion could pay their debts, if demanded in legal currency. And shall we, who are, at least in part, responsible for such a state of things, at such a period, when the debtors are so much at the mercy of the creditors, reversing the ill-judged, but humane, policy wisely prohibited to the States by the Constitution, of interposing in favor of the debtors, arm the creditors with new and extraordinary powers of enforcing their demands? Who is there that does not feel that it would be impolitic, cruel, and unjust? But it is only at such periods that bankrupt laws are proposed; and is it at all wonderful that the instinctive feelings of the community have so steadily and strongly resisted their adoption?

On no occasion has there been stronger cause for resistance than the present; for on none would such a law be more impolitic and cruel; and such, if I may judge from the discussion, is the feeling of this body. Standing alone and limited to individuals, I doubt whether the portion of the amendment under immediate consideration would receive a single vote, although it is the only part which is clearly and unquestionably within the limits of the Constitution. It may, then, well be asked, if it is without supporters, why is it inserted? But one answer can be given: because it is felt, as obnoxious as it is, to be indispensable to the passage of the provisions connected with it. One portion of the Senate is so intent on passing the part in favor of insolvent debtors, that they are willing to take with it the compulsory portion, in favor of creditors; while another, from a strong desire to include corporations, are willing to comprehend the other provisions, though they denounce the provisions in favor of insolvent debtors, standing alone, as fraudulent, unjust, and unconstitutional. It is thus the two extremes unite in favor of a measure that neither would support alone; and a feature of the bill, obnoxious of itself, but constitutional, is made to buoy up other portions, which, if not clearly unconstitutional, to say the least, are of doubful constitutionality.

Let me say to those who represent the portion of the Union where the indebtedness is the greatest, and who, on that account, favor the provisions for the relief of the insolvent, that the operation of the amendment, should it pass, will disappoint them. The part in favor of the debtors may, indeed, throw off the burden from many, who are now hopelessly insolvent, and restore their usefulness to themselves and society; but the other provisions will reduce a far greater number to insolvency, who might otherwise struggle through their embarrassments, with a competency left for the support of themselves and families. I cannot be mistaken. Should the amendment, as it now stands, become a law, instead of relieving, it would crush, the indebted portion of the Union. In order to make good the assertion, I shall now turn to the novel and important provision which places certain corporations and banks among them, under this compulsory process.

I am not the apologist of banks or corporations generally, nor am I the advocate of chartered privileges. On the contrary, there is not a member of the body more deeply impressed with the evils of the banking system, as now modified, or more opposed to grants of privileges to one portion of the community, at the expense of the rest. My opinions on these points have not been recently or hastily formed. I long since embraced them, after much reflection and observation, and am prepared to assert and maintain them on all proper occasions. But, sir, I am not to be caught by words: I have too much experience for that. It is in vain that I am told that this is a contest between corporations and individuals—the artificial, legal person, called a body politic, and the individual man, as formed by his Creator. All this is lost on me. I look not to where the blow is professedly aimed, but beyond, where it must fall. The corporate, ideal thing at which it is said to be directed, is intangible, and without the capacity of hearing, seeing, or feeling; but there are beneath, thousands on thousands, not shadows, but real, sensitive human beings, on whom the blow will fall with vengeance. Before we act, let us look at things as they really are, and not as we may imagine them, in the fervor of debate.

The States have, by an unwise and dangerous legislation, centralized in banks and other corporations, to a very great extent, the relation of creditor and debtor. Were I to assert that these central points could not be touched, without touching, at the same time, that wide-spread and all-pervading relation, in its minutest and remotest ramification, I would scarcely express myself too strongly. To subject them to this measure would, then, be to subject to it, in reality, almost the entire relation of creditor and debtor. It would be bankrupting by wholesale —a prompt and forced settlement of the aggregate indebtedness of the country, under all the pressure of existing pecuniary embarrassments, made manifold greater by the measure itself.

In order that the Senate may have some idea how vast and comprehensive the measure is, I will give a statement from the paper in my hand, which contains the most recent account we have of the number and condition of the banks.

There were, then, by estimation, on the first of January last, upwards of nine hundred banks, including branches, with a capital of upwards of three hundred and fifty millions, having debts due to them of more than four hundred and sixty millions, and by them of more than two hundred and seventy millions, making the aggregate indebtedness, to and by them, upwards of seven hundred and ten millions of dollars, with a supply of specie but little exceeding thirty-three millions. By including the banks, this vast amount of indebtedness, concentrated in the banking system, would be subject to the operation of the law, should the measure be adopted. But the amendment extends far beyond, and takes in all corporations for manufacturing, commercial, insurance, or trading purposes; or which issue, pay out, or emit bills, drafts, or obligations, with the intention of circulating them as a substitute for money; which would add to the indebtedness brought within its operations, hundreds of millions more. Never was a scheme of bankruptcy, so bold and comprehensive, adopted, or even proposed, before: no, not in England itself, where the power of Parliament is omnipotent, and where the system has been in operation for three centuries.

Such is the measure proposed to be adopted, at such a period as this, when there is a universal and intense pecuniary embarrassment—when one-half of the banks have suspended payments, and when their available means of meeting their debts are so scanty. At such a period, and under such circumstances, any creditor, or creditors, to whom a bank, or other corporation, may owe not less than five hundred dollars, may demand payment; and if not paid in fifteen days, may take out process of bankruptcy, on application to the Federal courts, and place the corporation, with all its debts, credits, and assets, in the hands of trustees, to be wound up, and the proceeds distributed among its creditors. I venture nothing in asserting, that one half of the banks, in numbers, and amount of capital, and a large portion of the other corporations, might be forthwith placed in commission, should the measure be adopted; which, including debts, credits, capital, and assets, would amount at least to seven or eight hundred millions; all to be converted into cash, and distributed among those entitled to it. How is this to be done? Where is the cash to be had, at such a period as this, particularly when one half of the banks would be closed, and their notes equalling one half of the present scanty supply of currency, would cease to circulate? What sacrifices, what insolvencies, what beggary, what frauds, what desolation and ruin, would follow!

But would the calamity fall with equal vengeance on all the land, or would there be some favored, exempted portion, while desolation would overshadow the residue? Let the document* which I hold, answer. It is a communication from the President, transmitting a report from the Secretary of the Treasury to this body, dated the 8th January last, containing a list of the suspended and non-suspended banks of last year, arranged according to States, beginning with Maine. I find, on turning to the document, that there are nine hundred and fifty-nine banks, including branches, in the Union; of which five hundred and thirty-eight are in New England and New York. Of this number but seven are suspended, if Rhode Island be excepted. Her banks all suspended, but I understand have since resumed. The Senator near me, from that State, (Mr. KNIGHT,) can answer whether such is the fact.

[Mr. KNIGHT assented.]

There are, then, sir, in New England and New York five hundred and thirty-one banks which are not suspended, and but seven that are. Now, sir, if we cross the Hudson, and cast our eyes South and West, we shall find the opposite state of things. We shall find there four hundred and twenty-one banks; of which three hundred and sixty-eight suspended in whole or part, and fifty-three not. It is probable that the present proportion is still more unfavorable.

Can we doubt, with these facts, where the storm will rage with all its desolating fury? Is there any one so credulous as to believe that any one of the suspended banks, throughout that vast region, or many of the non-suspended, under the panic which the passage of the act would cause, could meet their debts, and thereby escape the penalties of the act? And if not, is there any one here prepared to place at once all the banks south and west of New York, with few exceptions, in the hands of assignees, under the jurisdiction and control of the Federal courts? Is there any willing that their doors should be all at once closed; their notes cease to circulate; their affairs wound up; their debts to and from them to be forthwith collected; their property and assets converted into money by Federal officers, acting under Federal authority, and all that might be left from plunder, fraud, and forced sales, distributed among creditors? And how, I ask, is so mighty a concern, amounting in the aggregate, certainly to not less than five or six hundred millions of dollars, to be at once wound up? Where is the money to be found to pay the debts to and from the banks, and to purchase the vast amount of property held by them and their debtors, which must be brought at once under the hammer? Where found, after their notes have ceased to circulate, (as they would, as soon as process of bankruptcy is taken out against them,) and before specie could come in to supply their place? Were it possible to carry through the measure, it would spread unheard of destruction and desolation through the vast portion of the Union, on which the blow would fall; such as the marching of hostile armies from one extremity to another; the sweep of tornadoes; the outpouring of floods; or the withholding from the parched and thirsty earth the fertilizing droppings of the clouds, would give but a faint conception. But it would be impossible. If you were to adopt the measure, you would ordain what would not, could not, be executed. Public indignation would paralyze the hand of the grasping creditor, stretched to execute it, and sweep your act from the statute book ere it could be enforced.

I turn now from the immediate effects of the measure, were it possible to carry it into effect, to inquire what would be its permanent, if adopted. Its first effect, after the desolating storm had passed over, would be to centralize the control over all the banks that might be spared, or thereafter chartered, in the banks located where the public revenue would be principally collected and disbursed; and where that would be, I need not say. The reason is obvious. The fiscal action of the Government would keep the exchanges steadily and permanently in its favor. Now, sir, every man of business knows, that the banks located at the point where exchanges are permanently favorable, can control those where they are unfavorable. The reason is obvious. The former can draw on the latter with profit; and, through their drafts, command their specie, or notes, at pleasure, while the reverse is the case with the latter. Hence the consequence would be control on one side, and dependence on the other, increasing with the increasing amount of collection and disbursements, which, by their absorbing character, would draw with them the imports and exports, with an increased control over the exchanges. Add to this the power which this measure would place in the hands of the banks at the favored points, and I hazard nothing in asserting that it would at all times be in their power to crush, by a sudden and unexpected run, the banks elsewhere, which might incur their displeasure, with greater ease, and more effectually, than the late United States Bank, in its most palmy days, ever could.

The next permanent effect would be, to place the whole banking system under the control of this Government. It would hold over the banks the power of life and death. The process of bankruptcy against an incorporation is but another name for its death warrant. It would give, with the power of destroying, that of regulating them, without regard to their chartered rights. The same bold construction that would authorize Congress to subject them to a bankrupt law, would give it the power to determine at pleasure what shall or shall not constitute acts of bankruptcy, by which it might limit the extent of their business, fix the proportion of specie to liability, and make it a condition for one dollar in circulation, there should be a dollar in their vaults. The possession of such a power would give Congress more unlimited control over the banks, than that which the States, that incorporated them, possess, or which you would possess over a Bank of the United States, chartered by yourselves. Your power over such an institutions, and the States over their own banks, would be limited by the acts of incorporation, while yours over the banks of the States, with the bankrupt power in your hands, would be without any other limitation, except your discretion.

It is easy to see that the complete subjugation of the State banks to your will, must be the result of such unlimited control; and not less easy, that with their subjugation the conflict between this Government and the banks would cease, to be followed by a close and perpetual alliance. It is in the nature of Governments to wage war with whatever is opposed to its will, and to take under protection that which it has subdued; nor would the banks be found to be an exception. They would be forced to conciliate the good will of the Government, on which both their safety and profit would depend; and in no way could they more effectually do that, than by upholding its power and authority. They would be thus forced, by the strongest appeals to both their fear and hope, into the political arena, with their immense power and influence, and to take an active and decided part in all the party strifes of the day, throwing their weight always on the side which their safety and profit might dictate. The end would be the very reverse of that for which we, who are in favor of a divorce of Government and banks, have been contending for the last three years. Instead of divorce, there would be union; instead of excluding the banks from the political struggles of the day, they would be forced to be active and zealous partisans in self-defence; and instead of leaving the banks to the control of the States, from which they derive their charters, you would assume over them a control more powerful and unlimited, than has ever been before exercised over them by this Government, either through the pet banks or a National Bank. This control would be the greatest at the principal points of collection and disbursement—the very point where that of the local banks would be the greatest over all others. It follows that the Government would have the most decisive and complete control over those that would control all others; and, by lending their powerful aid and influence to maintain their control, would in reality control the whole banking system; thus making, in effect, the banks at the favored points the National Bank, and the rest virtually but branches. If to this we add the control which it would give over the other and powerful corporations enumerated in the amendment, it may be safely asserted, that the measure, if adopted, would do more to increase the power of this Government, and diminish that of the States—to strengthen the cause of consolidation, and weaken that of State rights—than any which has ever been assumed by Congress.

Having pointed out the consequences, I now demand, in the name of the Constitution, what right has Congress to extend a bankrupt act over the incorporated institutions of the States, and thereby seize on this immense power? The burden of proof is on those who claim the right, and not on us, who oppose it. I repeat, ours is a Government of limited powers, and those who claim to exercise a power, must show the grant—a clear and certain grant, in case of a power so pregnant with consequences as this.

I ask, then, those who claim this power, on what grounds do they place it? Do they rest it on the nature of the power, as being peculiarly applicable to banks and the other corporations proposed to be embraced? If so, frail is the foundation. Never was power more unsuited to its subject—so much so, that language itself has to be forced and perverted to make it applicable. Taking corporations in their proper sense, as bodies politic, and there is scarcely a single portion of the whole process, beginning with the acts of bankruptcy, and extending to the final discharge, applicable to them. What one of the numerous acts of bankruptcy can they commit? Can they depart from the State, or be arrested, or be imprisoned, or escape from prison, or, in a word, commit any one of the acts without which an individual cannot be made a bankrupt? No; but they may stop payment, and thereby subject themselves to the act. True; but how is the process to be carried through. The provision requires the bankrupt to be sworn: can you swear corporations? It requires divers acts to be done by the bankrupt, under the penalty of imprisonment: can you imprison a corporation? It directs a discharge to be given to the bankrupt, which exempts his person and future acquisitions: can a corporation receive the benefit of such discharge? No; the process itself is the dissolution, the death, of the corporation. It is thus that language is forced, strained, and distorted, in order to bring a power so inapplicable to the subject to bear on corporations. It would be just as rational to include corporations in insolvent laws, which none has been, as yet, so absurd as to think of doing.

The right, then, cannot be inferred from the nature of the power. On what, then, can it stand? On precedents? I admit that if, at the period of the adoption of the Constitution, it was the practice to include corporations in acts of bankruptcy, it would go far to establish that it was intended by the Constitution to include them. But the reverse is the fact. As long as the system has been in operation, there is not a case where a corporation was ever included, either in England, this country, or any other, as far as can be ascertained, nor ever proposed to be. The attempt in this case is a perfect novelty, without precedent or example; and all the force which it is acknowledged the practice of including them would have given in favor of the right, is thus thrown with a weight equally decisive against it.

But we have not yet approached the real difficulty. If the power was ever so appropriate, and the only one that was—if precedents were innumerable—it would only prove that this Government would have the right of applying the power to incorporations of its own creating. It could not go an inch beyond, and would leave the great difficulty untouched; the right of Congress to include State corporations, in an act of bankruptcy, passed by its authority! Where is such a power to be found in the Constitution? It seems to be forgot that this and the State Governments are co-ordinate Governments, emanating from the same authority, and making together one complex, but harmonious and beautiful system, in which each, within its allotted sphere, is independent, and coequal with the other. If one has a right to create, the other cannot have the right to destroy. The principle has been carried so far, that in the case of the State of Maryland and McColough, the Supreme Court, after elaborate argument, decided that a State, in the exercise of its undoubted right of taxing, could not tax a branch Bank of the United States, located in its limits, on the ground that the right of taxing, in such case, involved the right of destroying. Admit, then, Congress had the right to include corporations of its own creation, still, according to the principle thus recognised, it could not include those created by the States; unless, indeed, the fundamental principle of our system, admitted even by the extreme consolidation school of politics, that each Government is coequal and independent, within its sphere, should be denied, and the absolute sovereignty of this Government be assumed. If, then, the States have a right to create banks, and other corporations enumerated in the amendment, it follows that Congress has not the right to destroy them; nor, of course, to include them in an act of bankruptcy, the very operation of which, when applied to corporations, is to destroy. But whether they have or have not the right, belongs not to Congress to decide. The right of the separate Legislatures of the States to decide on their reserved powers, is as perfect as that of Congress to decide on the delegated. Each must judge for itself in carrying out its powers. To deny this, would be virtually to give a veto to Congress over the acts of the State Legislatures—a power directly refused by the convention, though anxiously pressed by the national party in that body.

Such and so conclusive is the argument against the right; and how has it been met? We are told that the States have greatly abused the power of incorporation. I admit it. The power has been sadly and dangerously abused. I stand not here to defend banks or other incorporations, or to justify the States in granting charters. No; my object is far different. I have risen to defend the Constitution, and to resist the inroads on the rights of the States. In the discharge of that duty, I ask, can the abuse of the right of granting bank or other charters, give you the right to destroy or regulate them? Are you ready to admit the same rule, as applied to your own powers? Have the State Legislatures abused their powers more than Congress has its powers? Has it not abused, and grossly abused, its powers of laying taxes and appropriating money? And what assurance is there, with these examples before us, that Congress would not equally abuse the right of controlling State corporations, which is so eagerly sought to be vested in it by some? But we are also told that bank paper—worthless, irredeemable bank paper—has deranged the currency, and ought to be suppressed. I admit the fact. I acknowledge the mischief, but object to the remedy, and the right of applying it. I go farther. If the evil could give us the right to apply any of our powers to remedy it, regardless of the Constitution, the taxing power would be far more simple, efficient, and less mischievous in its application. It would be applied to the specific evil. That which has deranged the currency, and defeated the object of the Constitution in relation to it, is the circulation of bank notes. There lies the evil; and to divest the banks of the right of circulation, is to eradicate it. For that purpose, what remedy could be more simple, safe, and efficacious, than the taxing power, were it constitutional. By its means, bank notes might be gradually and quietly suppressed, and the banks left in full possession of all their other functions unimpaired. There is but one objection to it, but that a decisive one—its unconstitutionality. It would be a perversion of the taxing power, given to raise revenue. To apply it to suppress or regulate the circulation of bank notes, would be to CHANGE ITS NATURE ENTIRELY, from a TAXING to a PENAL power, and is therefore unconstitutional; but not more so than to include banks and other corporations in an act of bankruptcy, as proposed by the amendment, while, in every other respect, it would be greatly preferable.

One other ground still remains to be considered. The authority of influential names has been resorted to, in order to supply the defect of argument. The names of two distinguished individuals, who formerly filled the Treasury Department, have been introduced—Mr. Dallas and Mr. Crawford—in favor of the right of including banks. If this was a question to be decided by authority, it would be easy to show that their opinions, as able as they were, would be entitled to little weight in this case. It was casually and incidentally given in a report on another subject, and that calculated to lead them to an erroneous view in reference to this power. Such an opinion, given under such circumstances, by the ablest judge, would have little weight in a private case, even in a court of justice, and ought to have none in this body, on a great constitutional question. Besides, it is well known that the opinion of both was in favor of the constitutionality of a National Bank, and that, too, after a full and deliberate consideration of the subject. Now, sir, I put the question to the Senators who have quoted their casual opinion, in favor of the constitutionality of including banks in a bankrupt law, are they willing to adopt their well considered and solemnly delivered opinion in favor of the right to incorporate a bank? And if not, how, on the ground of precedent, can they adopt the one and reject the other? The names of other distinguished individuals have been quoted—Randolph, Macon, White, Smith, and others—but, in my opinion, unfairly quoted. It is true, they voted, in 1827, when the bankrupt bill was then before the Senate, in favor of an amendment to include banks; but it is equally so, that the amendment was moved at the end of a long debate, when the Senate was exhausted, and that it was but slightly discussed. But, what is of more importance, they were opposed to the bill; and, as the amendment came from a hostile quarter, and was clearly intended to embarrass the bill, it is not improbable that it received the votes of many with the view of destroying the bill, without thinking whether it was constitutional or not; just as some, no doubt, will vote against the opposite amendment, to strike the banks out, now under consideration, from the belief that it is the most effectual means of destroying this bill. But if the question is to be decided by weight of names, and the vote on the occasion to be the test, the weight is clearly on the opposite side. The vote stood, 12 to include the banks, and 35 against; and among the latter will be found names not less influential—that of Tazewell, Rowan, Hayne, Berrien, the present Secretary of Treasury, and finally that of the present Chief Magistrate. But why attempt to decide this question by the weight of names, however distinguished? Do we not know that all those referred to belonged to the political school which utterly repudiates the authority of precedents in construing the Constitution, and who, if they were now all alive, and here present as members of the Senate, would not regard the name of any man in deciding this important constitutional question?

I have now presented the result of my reflections on this important measure. To sum up the whole in a few words, I am of the opinion that the whole project, including the bill and the amendment, is unconstitutional, except the provisions embracing compulsory bankruptcy, as it is called, as far as it relates to individuals; and that, under existing circumstances, to be highly inexpedient. Thus thinking, I shall vote, in the first instance, against striking out the bill, and inserting the amendment; and, if that succeeds, against the bill itself.

SPEECH OF MR. BLACK,

OF GEORGIA.

In the House of Representatives, June 15th and 16th, 1840.—On the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. CUSHING of Massachusetts having moved to strike out the enacting clause of said bill,

Mr. BLACK said: His experience in legislative assemblies, as well as in the court-house, had taught him that little was to be gained to the cause or the advocate by prolix speeches and lengthened debate. Empty benches, or a drowsy audience, were the sure consequence of that vanity which exhibits itself in telling a thrice-told tale, or in reiterating arguments which, however true or forcible of themselves, were trite and familiar to honorable gentlemen who sat in committee. He hoped to avoid the error to which he alluded, by addressing himself, in the remarks he had to make, to the people of the State of Georgia. He spoke for the benefit of his constituents, and for the purpose of explaining and elucidating his own course in relation to the great financial question which divides the country. He was one of those who did not regard the Federal Government as the prime source of the beneficial results which flow from enlightened legislation; for, while he professed a due regard for the constitutional powers of the Union, he looked with increasing confidence beyond this Government, to the States, for the preservation and enforcement of those principles upon which the Confederation was formed, and on which its perpetuity depends. If the fountain be pure, the waters which flow from it will be clear and bright. The States are the constituents of this Government; and it was, therefore, infinitely more important to address the argument and discussion of this question to the people than to attempt the conversion of gentlemen here, who were supposed to be but echoing the voice of their constituents at home. It was not his intention to contemn the House; his purpose was simply to address himself to those who were the true sources of power and authority; when they were convinced, their representatives would require no argument to induce them to legislate in accordance with that conviction. He would, therefore, speak as if he was addressing the Legislature of Georgia; and he hoped that he would be enabled, by the facts and arguments he should adduce, to show that his present position in relation to this bill was in strict accordance with that of his own

State, and of many prominent men of the State Rights party.

Sir, said Mr. Black, I rejoice that this question has at last been reduced to a distinct, direct, and tangible issue before the people. I congratulate this House and the country, that henceforth the Independent Treasury system will be placed before the public eye, not as heretofore—"solitary and alone," but in contrast with a National Bank, which has been announced within the last week upon this floor by gentlemen high in the confidence of their party, as the great counter proposition on which the Opposition rely. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] in the able speech with which he opened this debate, denounced this bill as the exponent of a system which he was pleased to designate "THE MEASURE of the Administration." Sir, I accept the designation; it is emphatically "THE MEASURE of the Administration;" and upon that measure mainly, I go to the support of Mr. Van Buren. Upon that measure he must stand or fall in the pending contest; for while there are many other grounds upon which I am compelled to support him in obedience to principle, the Independent Treasury system stands out prominently and pre-eminently as the measure on which he rests his claims to the suffrages of his countrymen. This, then, is our proposition; what is its antagonist? The honorable member from Kentucky (Mr. UNDERWOOD) and his colleague, who preceded me, (Governor POPE,) while they condemned this bill in unmeasured terms, announced that A NATIONAL BANK was the only source to which we could look for relief; and the gentleman last up (Gov. POPE) actually read to the committee his projet of a bank, with a capital of from fifty to seventy-five millions. These honorable members to whom I refer, stand deservedly high in the confidence of the modern Whig party; and to them, therefore, we have a right to look, as the organs of that party on this subject. But, in order that there may be no misunderstanding on a point so important, I myself, on the authority of these gentlemen, will reiterate, as I now do, in the presence of this committee, that "A NATIONAL BANK" is the great measure of the Whig party, and is now propounded by that party as the antagonist of the Sub-Treasury system. If in this I misrepresent the Opposition, if I have not truly stated the Whigs and their policy upon this subject, I will cheerfully yield the floor to any member of that party for the purpose of correcting the mistake, and defining their position. I am in earnest when I offer the floor for this purpose, and I wait for its acceptance. Sir, no member of that party thinks proper to rise in his place and deny, either for himself or his political associates, the correctness of the statement I have made. I am glad of this, said Mr. Black; for, while I contend that I am consistent in my support of this bill, it enables me to ascertain and expose the present position of those in my own State, who, although my former friends and allies, are hereafter to be regarded as my political adversaries. Here, then, is the Independent Treasury, "the measure" of the Administration, on one hand, and a National Bank, "the measure" of the Whigs, on the other. This brief statement constitutes the great issue joined between the two contending parties, and which is shortly to be submitted to the final judgment of the people of this country. Upon this issue the belligerants are now in the open field—our enemy has left his masked battery—his visor is up, and the wily politician, who heretofore manœuvred behind a bank, is now fighting for it openly and desperately in front of that institution. Into that war I go, under the "flag" which bears for its inscription "a divorce of Bank from State." This, at least, is an issue for the public eye—an Independent Treasury, or a United States Bank. Either is the only alternative of the other, and between them the people are called on to choose.

Sir, while our opponents thus declare that a United States Bank is their measure of relief, I am free to admit that there may be a few individuals of that party who profess yet to entertain constitutional scruples against a Bank; but they are only individuals, rari nantes in gurgite vasto, and the exception which they present but proves the fact as to their party. Let us us look for a moment at the situation of these individuals, opposed to the Sub-Treasury, and opposed to a United States Bank! It has been said that the wit of man can devise but one other mode of collecting, keeping, and disbursing the public revenue, namely, the pet bank or deposite system. If they absolutely reject the first two propositions, they are then thrown back per force upon the old, repudiated, exploded, State depositories, the only other and remaining agents to which the Government can by possibility resort. Will they venture to avow their willingness to go back to that system which resulted in the loss of millions to the people? Sir, I put the question respectfully but earnestly to them. The wheels of Government cannot stand still; the revenue must be collected and kept in some way or other, and our debts must be paid. How shall it be done? They will not resort to the agency of their own officers; they are opposed to a United States Bank; and no one has yet had the temerity and folly to suggest a return to the pet banks. Their position, then, results in this: that, as there are but three possible modes of collecting, keeping, and disbursing the public money, to neither of which they agree or consent, they are absolutely without any plan for administering the Treasury of the United States. Glorious and impracticable statesmen, with neither theory nor practice! No, sir; the truth is, these scrupulous gentlemen, who see so much that is objectionable in the bill on your table, and who yet profess to entertain doubts of the constitutionality of a Bank, will, in a little while, be merged in the mass of the great bank party, of which they are active members. Having been "mustered into the service," they will be compelled to obey the word of command, as given by Clay, Webster, and the other captains who lead them to the contest; and, however they may writhe under the necessity, they will be forced by the power of party to sustain those who sustain a Bank. It may be a bitter pill to them, but still they must swallow it, constitutional objections, scruples, and all. The State banks, as fiscal agents, are out of the question; and, as they have "enlisted for the war," they will be compelled by the mass into which they have thrown themselves, to move onward to the establishment of a bank, the avowed object of the party to which they are so unnaturally allied. How, sir, will they answer to the country? Of what avail will it be to them when they are arraigned before the people for aiding such a cause, to plead their constitutional scruples? They will be told by their indignant constituents (whose "scruples" they are supposed to represent) that, as a State bank system is out of the question, those who are against the Sub-Treasury must be for a Bank, and they will be held answerable for the re-establishment of an institution, which, in the words of Thomas Jefferson, "is one of the most deadly hostilities existing against the principles and forms of our Constitution," and which "may, in a critical moment, upset the Government."

So much, Mr. Chairman, for those who, while they profess to doubt upon constitutional grounds, are doing every thing in their power to aid in the re-establishment of that powerful institution, by resisting and opposing the fiscal measures of this Administration.

Sir, there is one advantage which we have in this contest, of all the benefits of which I desire to avail myself. If there be any merit, in these days of construction and expediency, in the conceded constitutionality of a proposition, then are we entitled to it; for the opponents of the bill admit that it is strictly constitutional, and object to it simply on the ground of inexpediency. On the other hand, we aver that a bank is not only inexpedient and dangerous to the country, but we solemnly protest, that, so far from being within the constitutional scope and power of Congress to charter such an institution, that instrument confers no power on this body to create corporations or banking companies, in any shape or form. Thus, sir, while the opposition to the Sub-Treasury is reduced to the secondary objection of inexpediency, its antagonist measure is liable to the double objection of being both unconstitutional and inexpedient. The Federal party do not pretend to claim any express grant of power in the Constitution on this subject; they seek to attain their object by implication and construction only; and are, consequently, presented before the people in the unenviable attitude of endeavoring to exercise a doubtful and dangerous power, to say the least of it, in opposition to a measure of clear and admitted constitutionality.

Sir, I will not now argue the constitutional question at large; I may do so before I sit down. I only refer to this state of the case, in order that my constituents may know that the bank party, although thay rant and roar in unmeaning declamation against the Sub-Treasury, and the ruin it will bring on the people, admit that it is strictly within the limits of the Constitution. However this admission may be lightly regarded hereabouts by your "if necessary" and expedient politicians, the people of Georgia will look upon it, I am sure, as a glorious concession of our fidelity to principle.

Sir, said Mr. BLACK, there is a party of men in Georgia, who have attempted lately to hold me up to public reprobation. Among them are many with whom I have heretofore acted, and who are indebted to me for many a hard struggle in defence of the principles they professed when we were political associates. While they who are now loudest and most froward to condemn me as an apostate, hung back in the beginning of the contest, which created us a party, and avoided the odium of our name, while they prudently pocketed the benefits of our principles, I was among the first to offer myself a martyr to our faith, which, although scouted and reviled as a damning heresy then, (because it and our motives were not understood,) is now recognised as the true doctrine. This association of men, composed of a fraction of the old State Rights party, held, as you are aware, a convention at Milledgeville, on the first Monday in this month. Their first act was to abandon their old name of State Rights—a name which had given them a distinctive character on principle—and to assume the personal appellation of the anti-Van Buren party. With this oblivious preparation for the sacrifice, they nominated W. H. Harrison for the Presidency, and rejected my colleagues, Judge Colquitt and Major Cooper, and myself; at the same time, they expressed their approbation of the remainder of our delegation, by renominating them upon their Congressional ticket. Now, sir, if this convention had objected to us upon the ground of personal or mental imbecility, although it would, indeed, have been mortifying, yet we should not have felt ourselves bound, as we now do, in justice to ourselves and our friends, to demand the cause of our proscription. Ay, sir, I demand it here, and I shall demand it when I go home among my constituents. They, at least, have no private griefs, personal preferences, or official aspirations, to warp their judgment. Personal considerations weigh not a feather with them; and if I show you, as I think I can, that I have not misrepresented the State of Georgia on this leading measure, I will at least have shifted the burden of proof from myself to the convention, to show cause, before the people, why Cooper, Colquitt, and myself, have been condemned as unworthy the confidence of the State.

With this view, let us recur to the question: Ought I, as a Representative of Georgia, to be condemned for opposing a bank by advocating the Independent Treasury? If I did, I should be setting at naught the deliberate and repeated resolutions of our Legislature, solemnly avowing her hostility to "this mammoth of aristocracy." For the purpose of showing that my position is in strict accordance with that of the State I represent, I ask the Clerk to read from this volume of the laws of Georgia the preamble and that part of the resolutions I have marked relative to a United States Bank.

"IN SENATE OF THE STATE OF GEORGIA.

"Whereas one of the first principles on which our Government, State and Federal, is founded, is the right of the constituent to instruct his representotive, and the correlative duty o the la ter to obey the will of the former, when distinctly expressed to him, or to resign the trust delegated to him, if he cannot conscientiously represent and advance such will;

"And whereas our Senators in Congress, elected by the Legislature, and responsible to the people through this body, cannot, on principles of reason, good sense, or honesty, disregard the expression of the will of the people, made through the Legislature, on subjects to which public and general attention has been called; it is therefore only proper and right that this General Assembly express to our Senators the will of the people, and instruct them to use their best efforts, in their proper sphere, to advance said will;

"And whereas, also, the expression of this body, immediately connected as it is with the people, may serve as a guide to the members of the House of Representatives in Congress in their action on several subjects of great general interest, to which the people are sensitively alive;

"And whereas it is unwise and inexpedient to place in the hands of a few wealthy individuals, who are irresponsible to the people, an immense moneyed power, such as the Bank of the United States, enabling it to control the commerce of the country, to fix the price of labor and the value of products at its pleasure, at its will to spread distress and ruin through the whole country, and in a season of public calamity to control the Government:

"The course pursued by the Bank in its endeavors to compel a recharter, and in the attitude which it has assumed toward the Government of the United States, is sufficient to demonstrate that it is an institution fraught with danger to our liberties; that, in placing its funds at the disposal of its president for the purpose of securing its recharter; in spending immense sums avowedly to disseminate information, but in fact to influence elections; in its extravagant loans to editors of newspapers, whereby strange changes have been wrought; in transacting its business in such a manner, through the medium of committees, as to exclude the Government directors from a knowledge of what was actually done, and thereby to defeat the object of their appointment; in using its immense means to produce commercial embarrassment; and through the fear of wide-spread ruin to extort a recharter; in its refusal to deliver up to the Government the pension funds and books relating thereto; in its refusal to pay the dividends on the Government stock, on the ground of a claim for damages on a bill of exchange drawn on the French Government, which claim had no foundation on any principle of law or justice, and making itself the judge in its own cause; in substituting an illegal kind of branch drafts in lieu of its notes, and exporting the specie of the country, and thereby preventing a metallic currency in the United States; in refusing to a committee of the House of Representatives that examination of its books and papers which the many imputations of corrupt management made necessary and proper—has violated its charter in several of these particulars, and in all has shown clearly that it cannot with safety, independent of other considerations, be suffered to continue its existence.

"For these reasons, among others, the people of Georgia, through this Legislature, resolve;

"By the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Georgia, in General Assembly met, 1st, That the Bank of the United States ought not to be rechartered on any terms; and that our Senators in Congress be, and they are hereby instructed, and our Representatives requested, to vote against the recharter of said Bank in any form or shape in which it may be presented:

"2d. That the bold, patriotic, and constitutional course pursued by the President of the United States to arrest the powerful efforts made by that Bank to compel a recharter; which must, if successful, have resulted in the destruction of the liberties and happiness of the American people, deserves, and has the unqualified approbation of the people of Georgia, who pledge to him their support, while he steadily moves onward in his course to arrest, and finally to destroy, this mammoth of aristocracy.

"And whereas the power of Congress, under the Constitution, to charter a bank is, denied by a large portion of the people of this State, and is acknowledged by another portion, who assert the power to be of too disputable a character to admit its exercise without an amendment of the Constitution expressly granting it; and the opinion of this General Assembly being that Congress should exercise no such power, not expressly granted, or necessarily flowing from one so granted, and that the right to charter a bank is not one of this character.

"3d. Be it further resolved, That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives requested, to use all proper means to prevent the charter of any Bank of the United States, at least until an amendment of the Constitution in this particular shall have been submitted to the States, and by them ratified.

"Agreed to 11th December, 1834.

"JACOB WOOD,

"Attest: JOHN A. CUTHBERT, Secretary.

"IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

"Concurred in December 12, 1834.

"THOMAS GLASCOCK,
"Speaker of the House of Representatives.

"Attest: JOSEPH STURGIS, Clerk.

"Approved, December 13, 1834.

There are other resolutions of like character passed by the Legislature of Georgia at other periods, which I would read for the information of the committee, and to strengthen my position; but the volumes in which they are contained, are not in your library. They are familiar, however, to my constituents, and are remembered, I have no doubt, by my colleagues. But, sir, the resolutions just read remain undisturbed on our statute book, and are conclusive evidence of the deliberate opinion and position of the State I represent. Georgia, as one of the sovereign constituents of the Federal Union, declares to you, in language not to be misunderstood, that a United States Bank "is an institution fraught with dangers to our liberties;" that it had appropriated its funds to influence elections; that it had wrought strange changes in editors of newspapers, by extravagant loans to them; that it had excluded the Government directors from a knowledge of what was done by it; that it was seeking to extort a recharter, by producing commercial embarrassment and wide-spread ruin; that it had violated the laws, and broken its faith with the United States in relation to the pension funds, and the bill of exchange drawn on the French Government; that it had contributed to prevent a metallic currency in the United States; and that when charged with corrupt management, it had refused to open its books and papers for inspection; in a word, that it had shown itself to be an institution that cannot with safety be suffered to continue its existence. This is the language, these the sentiments of the State of Georgia in relation to "THE MEASURE" of the modern Whig party. They have ever been mine. Am I, then, justly chargeable either with inconsistency, or with misrepresenting my constituents, by advocating the bill on your table, as the only practicable means of carrying out these resolutions against a bank. I have shown you, by incontrovertible arguments and facts, that he who is opposed to the Sub-Treasury is necessarily the advocate of "its antagonist scheme;" and having shown this much in my own vindication, I leave it to those who, by their opposition to this bill, are lending themselves to the recharter of a Bank, to reconcile their position with that of their constituents, and to answer to the people for violating their will.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have other testimony from the State of Georgia in support of the Independent Treasury. About the same time that our Legislature was denouncing a Bank at home, the State was represented, in part at least, upon that measure, on this floor, by the Hon. Roger L. Gamble and the Hon. Thomas F. Foster. These gentlemen are highly esteemed for their intelligence and patriotism. With the former I am well acquainted, and know him to be entitled to respectful consideration; and I rejoice to be enabled to refer to the opinions and votes of such men, as a sanction for my own. It is, therefore, with this view, and with no other, that I now proceed to show by the Journals, that at the session of this House in 1834–'35, these gentlemen not only voted for and supported the first Sub-Treasury bill ever introduced into this hall, but one of them actually moved twice during the same session in favor of divorcing the Government from all banks. Both of these gentlemen have lately been placed on the Harrison Congressional ticket in Georgia, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the "reformation" of myself and two of my colleagues, to whom I have referred. It is conceded that they are NOW opposed to the Sub-Treasury; the consequence, as I have shown, is, that they are necessarily in favor of a bank. From my personal intercourse with the first-named gentleman, (who, I understand, has been nominated for the express purpose of killing me off,) I am sure that he is opposed to the principles of this bill; and as the old exploded pet-bank system is out of the question, it follows, as the night the day, that his present position cannot be one of opposition to a bank. With this gentleman's apparent inconsistency I have nothing to do, further than to prove my own consistency; to do this I shall call to my aid the solemn, recorded, and repeated EXAMPLE which these prominent Harrison candidates deliberately set before me in 1834. From these gentlemen and their anti-Sub-Treasury position of 1840, I appeal to the same gentlemen and their Sub-Treasury votes in 1834; and I claim all the benefit of the coincidence between myself now and themselves then. Sir, let us read from the Journals of the House of Representatives:

Friday, January 2, 1835.—"Mr. GAMBLE submitted the following resolution; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table, viz:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House whether, in his opinion, it is practicable or convenient for that Department to collect, safely keep, and disburse the public moneys of the United States without the agency of a bank or banks, and, if so, to report to this House the best mode, in his opinion, by which that object can be accomplished."

Saturday, January 3, 1835.—"The House proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. GAMBLE yesterday:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House whether, in his opinion, it is practicable or convenient for that Department to collect, safely keep, and disburse the public moneys of the United States without the agency of a bank or banks, and, if so, to report to this House the best mode, in his opinion, by which that object can be accomplished.

"A motion was made by Mr. Ewing to amend the said resolution by striking out these words, viz:

"'That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House whether, in his opinion,' and, in lieu thereof, inserting the following, viz:

"That a select committee, to consist of one member from each State, be appointed to inquire into the expediency, and report to this House whether, in their opinion.

"A motion was made by Mr. McKim that the said resolution do lie on the table.

"And the question being put on this motion, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 106, nays 87.

"Those who voted in the negative are: John Quincy Adams, John J. Allen, Chilton Allan, William S. Archer, William H. Ashley, Noyes Barber, Daniel L. Barringer, Isaac C. Bates, William Baylies, Martin Beaty, Horace Binney, George N. Briggs, John Bell, George Burd, Tristram Burges, Harry Cage, Thomas Chilton, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Augustine S. Clayton, William K. Clowney, Thomas Corwin, Joseph H. Crane, David Crockett, Edward Darlington, Amos Davis, Thomas Davenport, Edmund Deberry, Harmar Denny, John Dickson, George Evans, Edward Everett, John Ewing, John M. Felder, THOMAS F. FOSTER, ROGER L. GAMBLE, Rice Garland, William F. Gordon, Benjamin Gorham, James Graham, George Grennell, jr. John K. Griffin, Benj. Hardin, James Harper, James P. Heath, Ebenezer Jackson, William Cost Johnson, Henry King, Robert P. Letcher, Dixon H. Lewis, Levi Lincoln, James Love, Chittenden Lyon, Henry C. Martindale, Thomas A. Marshall, Samuel W. Mardis, John Y. Mason, Jonathan McCarty, Thomas M. T. McKennan, Charles F. Mercer, John J. Milligan, Phineas Miner, Samuel McDowell Moore, John M. Patton, Stephen C. Phillips, Francis W. Pickens, David Potts, jr. Robert Ramsey, John Reed, Abraham Rencher, John Robertson, William Slade, Jonathan Sloane, David Spangler, John N. Steele, William P. Taylor, Philemon Thomas, Christopher Tompkins, Joseph Trumbull, Samuel Tweedy, Joseph Vance, Samuel F. Vinton, John G. Watmough, Elisha Whittlesey, Richard H. Wilde, Lewis Williams, Henry A. Wise, Ebenezer Young."

I am aware, sir, that many of the gentlemen whose votes are here recorded against laying Mr. Gamble's Sub-Treasury resolution on the table, are sought to be excused upon the ground that they only intended to test the sincerity of the Administration in the State bank system, then in force. Even if this were so, will not their votes be regarded as a test, also, of their own sincerity? They were voting under the solemnity of an oath, and I will not believe that they could so far trifle with the obligations incurred by that oath as to vote for a proposition in which they did not belive and fully concur.

But, sir, my predecessors, and present opponents, are not liable to that derogatory suspicion. They, at least, were in earnest; for, nothing daunted by the rejection of his first resolution, Mr. Gamble preseveres in his Sub-Treasury movements, and grows bolder and more decisive with defeat. His first resolution may be said to have been only advisory; that it contained nothing on its face conclusive of the settled opinions of the mover. For his second motion, however, not even this flimsy apology can be made. Instead of being satisfied with the test he had applied to the Administration, he keeps his eye steadily fixed (where mine is now, and ever has been) upon a divorce of the Government from all banks, and instead of receding, he advances in his demands. Hear him:

January 5, 1835.—"Mr. GAMBLE moved the following resolution; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table, viz:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to digest and prepare, and communicate to this House, a detailed plan by which the public revenue of the United States may be collected, safely kept, and disbursed, without the agency of a bank or banks, either State or national."

So far, then, as the fiscal action of this Government is concerned, my honorable competitor, in 1835, when the pet bank system was in full blast before him, moved, upon his own responsibility, as a Representative of Georgia on this floor, for a prepared, digested, detailed plan, by which the United States revenue might be collected, safely kept, and disbursed, without the agency of a bank or banks, either STATE or NATIONAL. Sir,

"There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune."

If this resolution had been adopted, and the system it prescribes had gone into operation at that time, millions of dollars, which have been otherwise lost, would have been saved to the country, and instead of that general depression said to be prevalent in the land, the people would have been blest with peace and plenty; gold and silver would have been restored to their natural function of a circulating medium; and prosperity, the result of a well-regulated currency, would have cheered and rewarded the efforts of labor and industry. In the accomplishment of these most desirable results, the mover of that resolution would have covered himself with honor and glory; he would have been known in future time as the wise and provident legislator, who, foreseeing the evils likely to ensue from a connection between the Government and banks, originated a great system of finance, which GEORGE M. TROUP has pronounced to be "not only constitutional, but an extremely wise and very expedient measure."

With a constancy and pertinacity worthy of the great cause they then advocated, we find Mr.

Gamble and Mr. Foster voting, on the 11th February of the same year, to recommit the bill regulating the deposites of public money, with instructions so to amend the same as to dispense altogether, in the fiscal operations of the Government, with the agency of banks:

February 11, 1835.—"The House resumed the consideration of the bill (No. 563) regulating the dedosite of the public money of the United States in certain local banks.

"The question recurred on the motion made by Mr. Robertson that the said bill be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions so to amend the same as to dispense with the agency or instrumentality of banks in the fiscal operations of the Government.

"And, after debate, the question was put on the motion made by Mr. Robertson, for the recommitment of the bill, and was decided in the negative—yeas 91, nays 115;"

Thomas F. Foster and Roger L. Gamble voting in the affirmative.

But the crowning act of the legislative career of these gentlemen is to be found in the votes they recorded on the same day in favor of the first Sub-Treasury bill ever proposed in the United States; I allude to the amendment offered by Mr. Gordon of Virginia, which, if it had been adopted, would have thrown the Sub-Treasury into operation with an immediate, not prospective, specie clause: I read from the Journal of the House of Representatives:

"Wednesday, February 11, 1835.—"The question recurred on the motion make by Mr. Gordon to amend the said bill, viz: strike out all thereof after the enacting words, and insert—'

"That from and after the —— day of —— in the year ——, the collectors of the public revenue at places where the sums collected shall not exceed the sum of —— dollars per annum, shall be the agents of the Treasurer to keep and disburse the same, and be subject to such rules and regulations, and give such bond and security as he shall prescribe, for the faithful execution of their office, and shall receive, in addition to the compensation now allowed by law, —— per centum on the sums disbursed, so that it does not exceed the sum of —— dollars per annum.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all places where the amount of public revenue collected shall exceed the sum of —— dollars per annum, there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, receivers of the public revenue, to be agents of the Treasurer, who shall give such bond and security to keep and disburse the public revenue, and be subject to such rules and regulations, as the Treasurer shall prescribe, and shall receive for their services —— per centum per annum on the sums disbursed, provided it does not exceed the sum of —— dollars per annum.

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That from and after the —— day of ——, the whole revenue of the United States derived from customs, lands, or other sources, shall be paid in the current coins of the United States.'

"And on the question, Shall the bill be so amended? it was decided in the negative—yeas 33, nays 161.

"The yeas and nays being desired by one fifth of the members present, those who voted in the affirmative are: John Quincy Adams, Heman Allen, John J. Allen, Chilton Allan, William S. Archer, Noyes Barber, James M. Beale, Martin Beaty, Robert B. Campbell, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, William Clark, Augustine S. Clayton, Amos Davis, Thomas Davenport, Edmund Deberry, THOMAS F. FOSTER, ROGER L. GAMBLE, James H. Gholson, William F. Gordon, John K. Griffin, James P. Heath, Robert P. Letcher, Dixon H. Lewis, Henry C. Martindale, William McComas, Francis W. Pickens, John Robertson, David Spangler, John N. Steele, William P. Taylor, Richard H. Wilde, Lewis Williams, Henry A. Wise."

[Mr. WISE asked permission to explain, as his name appeared among those who voted in the affirmative. He was understood to say, in substance, that when he voted for the bill just read, he did it more out of respect and courtesy to his colleague, Mr. Gordon, than from any serious intention to grant what the bill demanded; and that he regarded it then, as he did now, as a humbug. He referred to the absence of many others, whose votes appeared with his, and he had no doubt if they were present they could explain the part they bore in the transaction to the satisfaction of the House.]

Mr. BLACK resumed: He had nothing to do with the vote of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE.] He was obliged to read it, because it was there upon the record, staring him in the face. His attention was directed wholly to Georgia, and those who had represented her. It had been intimated, however, that some of those who supported Mr. Gordon's bill were ABSENT. Sir, said Mr. Black, I deny it; they are here, in our very midst, living witnesses upon your record in favor of an Independent Treasury; and their testimony will remain until this Government shall perish, speaking volumes in behalf of those who support this Administration. I will not believe that my predecessors voted for that bill as a "humbug," for it would be holding them up to the people of Georgia in an exceedingly questionable light. Their vote, I have no doubt, was given upon due reflection, and with a full knowledge of what they were voting for. Their character for sober thought and mature deliberation forbids me to think otherwise.

Sir, I have been asked by my honorable colleague [Mr. KING] whether the vote which my predecessors cast in favor of General Gordon's proposition should be considered as binding them to vote for this bill. My answer is easily given. It seems to me that consistency, if they have not honestly changed their opinions, would require them to support this measure. Let us look for a moment at the bill for which they did vote. It is far more ultra in its provisions than the one upon your table. While it provided that the receivers and collectors of the public revenue should be the agents of the Treasurer, they were subjected to such rules and regulations, and should give such bond and security only as the Treasurer should think proper to prescribe; and that officer himself was left entirely to his own discretion. It contained none of the prescriptions, restraints, or penalties, which the present bill throws around the functionaries it creates. It provided that the whole of the revenue, after a ——— day, should be collected in "current coin." Here, then, we have the specie clause in perfection; not prospective and gradual, as in the bill on your table, but immediate and total. This is not all, sir. This celebrated Sub-Treasury bill, for which, it seems, my predecessors may be allowed to vote without incurring censure, required that the debts due to the Government should be collected in coin; but it nowhere enacts that the debts due by the Government to the people should be paid in coin. No, sir; those who had labored for the country, and to whom the Government was indebted, were left to take care of themselves as well as they could. Why, Mr. Chairman, convinced as I am of the expediency of the bill now before us, and which has been carefully elaborated by its friends in all its details, I do not think I could have voted for General Gordon's bill in 1834 unless the important defects which I have noticed in it had been remedied by amendment. I hope that my colleague is not only answered, but convinced, that he who, in 1834, could muster courage enough to vote for a bill of such latitude and allowance—a bill with an immediate and total specie clause, and which provided for the collection, but not for the payment, of gold and silver, might surely venture to support, in 1840, "the measure" of the Administration, guarded and restricted as it is by express limitations and fearful penalties.

Sir, said Mr. BLACK, I will pile Ossa on Pelion; I will bring you other "golden opinions" from Georgia in favor of this measure. While her Legislature and some of her Representatives were condemning a bank, and striving, with admirable constancy of purpose, to legislate a Sub-Treasury, with an immediate specie clause, into existence, many eminent citizens of that State publicly expressed their views in favor of this system. In 1838, when candidates for office had not yet learned to made no more "new issues for the public eye;" when they neither stood mute before the peopie, nor declined to say "what they would, or would not do if elected"—in those days of open, undisguised, Republican simplicity, a number of the citizens of Georgia addressed interrogatories to the individuals who then were candidates for Congress in that State. They were asked, among other things, for their views in relation to the Sub-Treasury and bank. From the letters written in reply I select one, because I have it at hand. It was written by my colleague, (Mr. NESBIT,) who sits before me, and I refer to it now only to fortify myself by the precedent and example of a man who is held in some esteem by his friends at home. Here, sir, is the letter:

"MACON, Ga. August 26, 1838.

"GENTLEMEN: The questions propounded through the public press to the candidates for Congress in this State, by a number of the voters of Taliaferro county, I beg leave respectfully to respond.

"I am in favor of an entire separation of the Government from all banks; and I am also for divesting the Government of all influence over the currency, so far as that is practicable.

"I am, therefore, against the establishment of a national bank, and against the reorganization of the pet bank scheme.

"Allow me to refer to my letter addressed to the Macon Messenger, for a full exhibition of my opinions upon these questions. Respectfully, &c.

"E. A. NESBIT.

"The EDITORS of the Southern Recorder"

[Mr NESBIT desired to explain. It was true he had written the letter just read. Although he was favorable to divorcing the Government from all banks, and was opposed to a United States Bank and the pet bank scheme, he had ever been opposed to that feature of this bill usually denominated the "specie clause;" and before this letter could be relied on as an exposition of his opinions upon this subject, it should be taken in connection with his letter to the Macon Messenger, which was distinctly referred to in the above. After some debate between Mr. BLACK and his colleague not relative to the question, Mr. BLACK resumed.]

Sir, I question no man's motives; but I have a right to refer to this letter, not only because it comes from a respectable source, but because the opinions therein expressed have received the sanction of the State of Georgia by the subsequent election of the writer to the seat he now occupies. As to the letter to the Macon Messenger, it was doubtless referred to by his colleague to approve and enforce, not to contradict or deny, the letter I have just read, to the people of Taliaferro. Hence, sir, I have a right to claim that gentleman's support of this "great measure of deliverance and liberty;" since, whatever may have been his reservations, I have conclusively shown to you that he who is "against the establishment of a National Bank, and against the reorganization of the pet bank scheme," must necessarily be in favor of an entire separation of the Government from all banks. If this be the inevitable conclusion, as I think it is, it remains for that gentleman to explain the whys and wherefores of his opposition to the present bill. If the details are not acceptable to him—if the specie clause frightens him from his proprieties, consistency, at least, requires that he should make some exertion to correct that defect by moving to strike out or amend.

Sir, said Mr. BLACK, my other colleague who sits near me, (Mr. KING,) scorning to remain silent under the interrogatories which had been addressed to us all, promptly announced his opposition, not only to a national bank, but to a connection of bank and State. I regret that I have no access to his letter at this time; and, therefore, if I have misquoted him, he will correct me at once.

[Mr. KING explained. He had written the letter alluded to, in which he expressed his opposition to a national bank, and his support of a separation of bank and State; but he had reserved his opposition to the Sub-Treasury bill then before the country, and he was also opposed to the bill on the table.]

Mr. BLACK resumed. He would not allow himself to doubt the correctness of his colleague's statement. But if gentlemen recognise the principle on which this measure rests, is it not incumbent on them to make some effort to correct objectionable details? I myself readily admit the importance of details; the most acceptable measure may be presented to you in such a shape and form as to ensure your opposition; but those who hope to excuse their opposition to a measure in 1840, which they approved in 1838, on account of objectionable details, must first show that they have exercised their privileges on this floor in attempting to eradicate the errors of which they complain. No such motion has been made. The only question before the committee is on the motion to strike out the enacting clause, which, in fact, is a motion condemnatory of the measure itself. But (said Mr. BLACK) I am content to know, so far as my own vindication rests on the opinions of other men, that in 1838 my colleague and myself were together in oppposition to a bank; at that point there was a coincidence between us. Since we have left that point, in our onward journey, I have arrived at the only other station on the direct road. Where is my colleague and former companion? I look around for him in vain. Is he yet on the road? and will he yet arrive? or has he, by opposing the only alternative against a United States Bank, deflected upon a route which, however circuitous, must necessarily lead him back, though contrary, it may be, to his desires, to the very institution which we left and condemned in company with each other. Sir, I also had the honor of writing a letter, before the election in 1838, to the people of Franklin and Taliaferro counties upon this subject. On that occasion, I deemed it my duty to answer; and upon that answer I was elected. If I had stood mute the people would hardly have received me with that generous confidence which they subsequently evinced toward me. In that letter, I desired to "place the control of the Treasury, and the appointment and supervision of those who are to administer its affairs, in the hands of the House of Representatives;" but upon subsequent reflection, I was convinced that such an arrangement, however desirable in itself, would be incompatible with the appointing power which the Constitution has vested in the Executive and the Senate. I also said that "I distinctly recognised gold and silver only as money, and as the only currency known to the Constitution. I did not think I should be violating either the letter or the spirit of that instrument, by receiving the bills of such banks as promptly paid specie, dollar for dollar, at the will of the holder. I should look upon such bills as the immediate representative of the precious metals—as specie certificates, convertible with gold and silver, so long as they were so in fact. I should receive them, not as a matter of favor to the banks, but of convenience to the Government. I am yet of the same opinion; and I venture to say that the most ardent friend of this measure would not consider that the specie clause was lost, if, in lieu of it, this extract from my letter were inserted in the bill. I am therefore now as I was then; and my constituents, by my subsequent election, have recognised, as a truth, that gold and silver only is money. I have referred to these resolutions and letters, and put these questions as arguments powerful and conclusive, to show that I am not only consistent in voting for this Sub-Treasury bill, but that, in so doing, I am faithfully representing the State of Georgia, and the votes and opinions of some of her eminent citizens. To many gentlemen on this floor, who represent other States, and other interests than those prevalent in Georgia, these references may appear wholly unsatisfactory; but by the people whom I represent, they will be received as proof incontrovertible that, however I am assailed for abandoning my party, I have neither abandoned my former principles, nor misrepresented the State.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are not left to interference and deduction as to the consequence of defeating this measure; we are distinctly called on, in the name of the country, to establish a National Bank. Argument, entreaty, and threats, have each in their turn been used to effect this great and leading object of Whig policy. It is said that John Randolph declared the day would come when a constitutional question would be out of order in this House. That period, I hope, has not yet arrived; and although, by your expedient politicians, it may be considered a useless expenditure of words, I yet venture to demand of gentlemen the proof that Congress has power to charter a bank. Sir, according to my limited notions of the functions of this Government, Congress can exercise no power not expressly delegated to it by the Constitution, or which is not absolutely necessary to effectuate a delegated power. This is the corner stone on which rests the great political superstructure raised by Mr. Jefferson. It is not enough to show that Congress is "not prohibited" from acting, but it must be shown that the power to legislate is distinctly and directly conferred by the Constitution. Now, sir, the bank men on this floor do not even pretend that there is any express grant of power to this body to charter a Bank; but they rely on that clause of the Constitution which declares that "Congress shall have power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into effect the powers expressly granted." Thus our opponents are reduced to the necessity of resorting to the most doubtful and constructive clause of the Constitution, as authority to do that for which no express grant can be shown. The reply to this extravagant claim is simple and conclusive. There is not only no clause of the Constitution authorizing Congress to charter a Bank, but the convention which framed that instrument distinctly refused to empower this Government to create corporations. That power (Mr. Madison says) was demanded in the convention, for the avowed purpose of enabling the Federal Government to charter a Bank; and upon that ground it was refused. If you charter a Bank, ipso facto, you create a corporation; and, in so doing, you do that which the convention refused to authorize you to do.

We are then told that a bank is "NECESSARY" to enable Congress to conduct the affairs of the Federal Treasury, or, in other words, to enable Congress "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." Now let us examine this proposition. The word "necessary" precludes of course the possibility of accomplishing these objects by ordinary legislation under the express grants. So far from this being true, Congress does lay taxes, imposts, and duties, without this intervention of a bank. Your taxes, imposts, and duties, are and have been collected without the aid of a bank, and they can be and have been transferred and disbursed, without resorting to the agency of an institution, the creation of which depends upon the supposition that these things cannot be effected without its instrumentality. Why, sir, the very bill on your table refutes the idea that a bank is "necessary to carry into effect the power expressly granted" of collecting, keeping, and disbursing, the "duties" which constitute your revenue. We propose by this bill that the Government itself shall do that which the Constitution not only authorizes, but requires it to do; and if the Government can of itself conduct its fiscal concerns, where is the "necessity" of resorting to a bank? Again, does the Government acknowledge this necessity, by confessing its inability to manage its revenues? No, sir; the opponents of the Government are making all this clamor about the "necessity" of a bank; and the "KEEPING" of the public moneys, infinitely more than than the collection and disbursement of them, is the true motive which lies at the bottom of these extravagant demands—demands which, if conceded, must result in an assumption of a power not granted, more dangerous than a direct violation of the Constitution itself.

Refuted and driven back from their flimsy argument of "NECESSITY," their transition to the question of "EXPEDIENCY" is easy and natural. We are told that the Treasury is empty, the revenue unskilfully managed, and the Government bankrupt! and this unfortunate and discreditable state of affairs is attributed to the fact that we have no National Bank to manage our revenue. The ingenuity of the Federal party, in and out of Congress, has been taxed to the uttermost to prove that it would be highly beneficial, convenient, and proper, to reconnect the Government with their favorite institution; and we are adjured, by every motive of patriotism, to legislate into existence an irresponsible corporation, which will not only keep and disburse our money for us, but which will accommodate us with liberal loans of its "paper emissions." Sir, I will not detain the committee by recapitulating all the facts and arguments, which scatter to the four winds of Heaven these hollow pretences and fallacious professions, but I will proceed to produce to you the highest authority known to this country, to prove that such an institution, whether viewed by itself as a source of paper emission, or as an agent, in connection with the Federal Treasury, is neither beneficial, convenient, nor proper. I have before me a letter written by General Washington in 1787, in reply to a gentleman who desired his opinion as to the utility and necessity of banking institutions. The views entertained in this letter by the Father of his Country, are evidently applicable to banks generally, as manufactories of "paper money," and I recur to them here with pride and satisfaction, because, while they are, of themselves, abstract truths, his opinions furnish a conclusive answer to the groundless charge that the Administration, by refusing to charter an institution whose first duty will be to issue nothing but paper money, is running a mad career against "credit" in all its forms. If this letter had been written by an Administration man of the present day, it would have been immediately pounced upon by the Federal party as the outpourings of Loco Focoism, and the rabid violence of an agrarian leveller. It would be held up as the hateful instrument by which the destruction of all banks is to be effected, and the unfortunate author would have been branded and scouted as a Jack Cade, volunteering in a wild crusade against the institutions of his country. As it is, however, we have the cheering fact before us that he who was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen," entertained and expressed the same opinions in 1787, which characterize, in 1840, the party with whom I am associated in support of the Sub-Treasury system. Let the bank men touch this letter, or the author of it, if they dare, and the great mass of the PEOPLE, in whose bosoms he and his principles are cherished as an idol, will rise up in their indignation to wither and destroy the hand that shall be lifted to strike the sacrilegious blow:

"MOUNT VERNON, February 17, 1787.

"DEAR SIR. Your favor of the 30th ultimo came duly to hand. To give an opinion in a cause of so much importance as that which has warmly agitated the two branches of your Legislature, and which, from the appeal that is made, is likely to create great and perhaps dangerous divisions, is rather a delicate matter. But as this diversity of opinion is on a subject which has, I believe, occupied the minds of most men, and as my sentiments thereon have been fully and decidedly expressed long before the Assembly either of Maryland or this State was convened, I do not scruple to declare that, if I had a voice in your Legislature, it would have been given decidedly against a paper emission, upon the general principles of its utility as a representative, and the necessity of it as a medium.

"To assign reasons for this opinion would be as unnecessary as tedious. The ground has been so often trod, that a place hardly remains untouched. In a word, the necessity arising from a WANT OF SPECIE is represented as greater than it really is. I contend that it is by the substance, not with the shadow of a thing, we are to be benefited. The wisdom of man, in my humble opinion, cannot, at this time, devise a plan by which the credit of paper money would be long supported; consequently, depreciation keeps pace with the quantity of the emission, and articles for which it is exchanged rise in a greater ratio than the sinking value of the money. Wherein, then, is the FARMER, the PLANTER, the ARTISAN, benefited? The debtor may be, because (as I have observed) he gives the shadow in lieu of the substance; and, in proportion to his gain, the creditor or the body politic suffers. Whether it be a legal tender or not, it will, as has been observed very truly, leave no alternative. It must be that, or nothing. An evil equally great is, the door it immediately opens for SPECULATION, by which the least designing, and perhaps the most VALUABLE PART OF THE COMMUNITY, are preyed upon by the more knowing and crafty speculators.

But, contrary to my intention and declaration, I am offering reasons in support of my opinion; reasons, too, which, of all others, are least pleasing to the advocate for paper money. I shall, therefore, only observe, generally, that so many people have suffered by former EMISSIONS, THAT, LIKE A BURNT CHILD WHO DREADS THE FIRE, no person will touch it who can possibly avoid it. The natural consequence of which will be, that the specie which remains unexported will be instantly locked up.

"With great esteem and regard, I am, dear sir, &c.

"GEORGE WASHINGTON."

If it be true, as its enemies charge against it, that the Independent Treasury system will contribute, incidentally, to restore a limited specie circulation, and, to that extent, expel bank bills of a low denomination, though it may result in temporary loss to the speculating part of the community, yet "the farmer, the planter, the artisan," who constitute "the least designing, and perhaps most valuable part of the community," will reap the benefit of dealing with "THE SUBSTANCE, NOT WITH THE SHADOW OF THE THING" Sir, I am aware that this is not the doctrine of Chestnut street, nor will it find favor with the paper money speculators of Wall street, but it is the old fashioned doctrine of George Washington; and, as such, I submit it in my defence to the people whom I have the honor to represent. With this high authority against the general system of paper emission, let us return to the particular question of a United States Bank. It is true that Adams, Clay, Webster, and the host of lesser lights which revolve around them, are the advocates of a bank, and, consequently, of a paper emission. If they are right, General Washington was wrong, and so was Mr. Jefferson; and, in order that I may have the full benefit of his opinions, I will quote to you his own words:

"From a passage in the letter of the President, I observe an idea of establishing a branch bank of the United States in New Orleans. This institution is one of the most deadly hostilities existing against the principles and forms of our Constitution. The nation is, at the present time, so strong and united in its sentiments, that it cannot be shaken at this moment. But, suppose a series of untoward events should occur, sufficient to bring into doubt the competency of a Republican Government to meet a crisis of great danger, or to unhinge the confidence of the people in the public functionaries, an institution like that, penetrating by its branches every part of the Union, acting by command, and in phalanx, may, in a critical moment, upset the Government. I deem no Government safe which is under the vassalage of any self-constituted authority than that of the nation, or its regular functionaries. What an obstruction may this Bank of the United States, with all its branch banks, be in time of war! It might dictate to us the peace we should accept, or withdraw its aid. Ought we, then, to give further growth to an institution so powerful, so hostile? Now, while we are strong, it is the greatest duty we owe to the safety of our Constitution to bring this powerful enemy to a subordination under its authorities."

Shall I be reviled and rejected at home for refusing to foster a "deadly hostility against the principles and forms of our Constitution?" Shall I be branded as a traitor for refusing to enlist in the ranks in a party whose first great object is to charter a bank which Jefferson has denounced as an institution "penetrating by its branches every part of the Union, acting by command and in phalanx, and which may, in a critical moment, upset the Government?" No, sir; although the interests of a few "paper emission" men have led them to proscribe me as intractable to their designs, the great mass of the people of Georgia—the men who dwell on our hills and in our valleys, and who live, not by paper emission or bank credit, but who make their bread by the sweat of their brow, and depend for an honest support upon their "productive industry"—they, sir, when they know that I am denounced and superseded for the principles I here proclaim, will rush "in phalanx" to the rescue; and I and my able and fearless colleagues, with whom I act, will be triumphantly sustained at the ballot box, not for the purpose of saving us as individuals, but for the sake of rescuing from peril and defeat the principles of Washington and Jefierscn.

Again: we are told that this Administration, by its uncompromising hostility to a moneyed corporation as an adjunct of the Federal Treasury, has lowered the price of property and reduced the wages of labor; that it has caused commerce and agriculture to languish, and brought upon the country one wide scene of ruin and distress. Give us a bank, they say, and property will rise in value—the laboring man will be better paid—industry in all its branches will prosper—money will be plenty, and the people will pay their debts and be happy. Withhold a bank, and you bankrupt the nation. Now, sir! unfortunately for these Whig politicians and panic orators, facts happen to be stubborn things, and speak louder than words. We have had two National Banks, both of which, independently of their own resources, monopolized the use of the public treasure, and were made the exclusive recipients of Government patronage and credit. Were times any better then? Were the people less oppressed with debt, or their labor or property worth more than they are now?

Let Mr. Clay answer that question. How does he speak of the condition of the country in 1824, when a Bank was in full operation?

Mr. Clay's speech of 1824, as published in Niles's Register of that date, vol. 26, pages 378, 387, as follows:

"In casting our eyes around us, the most prominent circumstance which fixes our attention, and challenges our deepest regret, is the general distress which pervades the whole country. It is forced upon us by numerous facts of the most incontestable character. It is indicated by the diminished exports of native produce; by the depressed and reduced state of our foreign navigation; by our diminished commerce; by successive unthreshed crops of grain, perishing in our barns and barn yards for the want of a market; by the alarming diminution of the circulating medium; by the numerous bankruptcies, not limited to the trading classes, but extending to all orders of society; by a universal complaint of the want of employment, and a consequent reduction of the wages of labor; by the ravenous pursuit after public situations, not for the sake of their honors and the performance of their public duties, but as a means of private subsistence; by the resort to the perilous use of PAPER MONEY; by the intervention of legislation in the delicate relation of debtor and creditor; and above all, by the low and depressed state of the value of almost every description of the whole mass of the property of the nation, which has, on an average, sunk not less than about fifty per cent. within a few years.

"The truth is, that no class of society suffers more, in the present stagnation of business, than the laboring classes. That is a necessary effect of the depression of agriculture, the principal business of the community. The wages of able-bodied men vary from $5 to $8 per month; and such has been the want of employment, in some parts of the Union, that instances have not been unfrequent of men working merely for the means of present subsistence. If the wages of labor here and in England were compared, they will be found not to be essentially different."

This, sir, is the testimony of a man who stands at the very head and front of the Bank party. In 1824, when a United States Bank, with $35,000,000 of capital, should have regulated the currency and "scattered blessings o'er a smiling land," he tells you that his deepest regret was challenged by the general distress which pervaded the whole country; that your exports and commerce were diminished; your navigation depressed; your unthreshed crops perishing in your barns; that your circulating medium was alarmingly diminished; bankruptcies were numerous, the wages of labor reduced; that public offices were ravenously sought for as a means of private subsistence; and to crown all, he tells us that this "general distress" was "forced upon us," and "indicated" to us "by the resort to the perilous use of paper money."

Le us call another witness to the stand—Hugh L. White. He has now "shuffled off this mortal coil," and can no longer be influenced by the hopes and fears of human life; and while we throw a thick veil over the errors which marked him a man, let us hasten to record those lessons of his wisdom which time has proven to be truth itself. He was once the chosen favorite of the old State Rights party of Georgia—to those who then composed that party let him now speak through the record he has left behind him. I read, sir, from Judge White's speech, delivered in the Senate of the United States in 1834, on the motion of Mr. Webster to bring in a bill for prolonging the charter of the Bank of the United States.

"The bank went into operation the 1st day of January, 1817; one of the leading objects in granting its charter was, through its operations, to reduce the extravagant dealings with State banks, to restore and preserve a sound currency to the country. The directors well knew this, yet they acted with a single eye to what they conceived the interest of the bank and its friends; in place of checking, it stimulated overtrading. Instead of restoring and preserving a sound currency, it adopted measures which, in 1818 and 1819, placed in the power of the State banks in Philadelphia, to take from it every single dollar, and leave it still in debt to them upward of one hundred and twenty-four thousand dollars. Mr. Cheves took charge of the bank, and, as president, pursued a policy which, in seventy days, placed the bank in a state of security; but the curtailments were so rapid, and the withdrawal of the circulating medium so great, as to ruin society, compel other banks to suspend specie payments, and again afflict the community with a depreciated currency. Liberal accommodations, and extensive issues, had given an appearance of wealth to those worth little or nothing. Property commanded enormous prices, as this bank had made money plenty; but the counter current commenced, and in 1819, a scene of wide ruin was presented. The bank made money scarce; the price of property fell to almost nothing; those who had been apparently wealthy, were found to be bankrupts, and hardly any man had where withal to pay his debts.

"An individual had, when money was plenty, purchased a house and lot for ten thousand dollars; he paid six thousand, was sued for the balance; the house and lot sold at fifteen hundred dollars; and thus he sunk, in the single bargain, eight thousand five hundred dollars.

In the principal cities and towns, thousands of individuals were thrown out of employ, the whole business of the country was deranged, scenes of misery and distress were produced, to which the present distress and pressure bear but little resemblance. This state of things was produced because the directors managed the bank with a view to their own interest, and that of their friends, disregarding the interest of that community from which they had acquired their power. May they not do so again? Have we not reason to fear they will, if the charter is prolonged?

"When the Senate adjourned on yesterday, I was considering the effects on society, in the year 1819, of the proceedings of the Bank of the United States from the time it went into operation. The distress then experienced, and those now felt, are the fruits of the charter granted in 1816."

Sir, said Mr. BLACK, I pin my faith to the sleeve of no man; but while I feel bound, under the oath I have taken, to investigate and judge for myself, I may be permitted to refer to, and adduce, the opinions of Washington, Jefferson, Clay, and White, to show that I am supported and sustained in my "Sub-Treasury notions" by their anti-bank notions. But what avails all this array of great names, stubborn facts, and sound principles, when your stump orators and Tippecanoe club politicians are enlightening the people with "log cabins and hard cider." Whatever may be the force of these luminous Whig arguments, I have the consolation to know that I am sustained by the opinions of the great men I have referred to, and that I have done my duty in laying those opinions before the people, that they may look at both sides of the question, and judge for themselves. If we may form conclusions as to the future from past experience, can we reasonably hope or expect relief from a bank? When the bank flourished we were oppressed! "This state of things," says Judge White, "was produced because the directors managed the bank with a view to their own interest, and that of their friends, disregarding the interest of the community from which they had acquired their power. May they not do so again? Have we not reason to fear they will, if their charter is prolonged?"

Mr. BLACK desired to say a few words with regard to the famous credit system of the modern Whigs, and of the hostile relation in which a national bank has stood, and in which it must necessarily stand toward the local institutions of his own State. He was the friend of that bona fide credit which was based either upon gold and silver, or on valuable property. It should emanate from, and be founded on, something substantial and tangible; otherwise it was a pretence to confidence which might never be realized in fact, and which, in nine cases out of ten, would result in delusive, ruinous, and gambling speculation. Look, sir, at the derivation of the term—credo, I believe, I trust, I have confidence; why? Because there is something substantial behind the bare promise which credit implies, capable of paying the debt which that promise incurs, if the individual credited should, from whatever cause, fail to perform the obligation he assumes. In speaking of credit, we should divide the subject into two heads, at least, to facilitate the analysis to which it should be reduced, before we can properly understand it; first, with regard to the individual who creates credit, and, secondly, with regard to the individual credited. He who originates credit, should own gold and silver, or other valuable property which can be made available to answer the possible failure of the individual intrusted with the credit; and he who receives that credit should have skill, intelligence, integrity, "productive industry," in the absence of property, to which the friend who assists him with his name may look for his safety. If these qualifications in the credited fail, then the community who were induced to part with their property upon the faith of a promise, have something behind that promise substantial, available, and responsible for the debt. The community, whose interests are mostly at stake in the practical effects of the credit system, will then be ultimately secure from loss in extending that confidence, without which, I admit, many an honest and intelligent man might continue in hopeless poverty. Sir, let me illustrate my system of credit. My neighbor has amassed wealth; he is a man of substance, owning, perhaps, one hundred thousand dollars in gold and silver, or other valuable property. I have neither gold or silver, nor other valuable property; but I have skill, intelligence, integrity, and productive industry. I desire to extend my sphere of action, and to apply my personal or mental qualifications in such a way as to induce a greater return of interest to myself. To enable me to accomplish this laudable object, and reposing confidence in my skill and integrity, he loans me his name, and gives me the use of his credit. I go into one of your commercial cities and purchase goods, wares, and merchandise, upon my promise to pay, backed by my friend's credit, which, itself, is founded on his gold and silver, or other available property. If I fail to pay the community who trusted me, they lose nothing, because there is substantial and valuable property which can be made available to pay the debt. As between my neighbor and myself, the uestion of credit must depend upon his confidence in me and my qualifications; but if this system of responsible credit, not only in the particular case I put, but in all its legitimate variations, be adopted and adhered to, then the people, who are always the real and ultimate creditors, and into whose hands these promises to pay must eventually fall, will be comparatively safe. This safety will beget confidence, and induce credit; and many a poor, but honest and intelligent man, who is now thrown back on his own original and limited resources, in consequence of the fear and distrust which result from a spurious and irresponsible system, would, under a different state of things, be enabled to develope all the resources of his skill and industry. This, sir, is my system, illustrated, in part, by a particular case. Its foundation is laid broad and deep in absolute and tangible responsibility, without which all confidence between individuals and the community must be ultimately destroyed.

Now, let us look at the credit system of the modern Whigs, as exemplified in a National Bank, which they are pressing with such eagerness on the country. Their first step would be to create an ARTIFICIAL person. To this intangible being, they give the power of making contracts. By your legislative sanction, you enable it to throw those contracts, in the shape of "promises to pay," far and wide over the country, without, at the same time, investing it with means to redeem them. It is not restricted in its issues to "dollar for dollar;" and even if it was, where is the gold and silver to meet the immense liabilities it would be sure to incur? Where is the valuable property to meet its promises to pay? It is true the balance sheet of the directors would exhibit, to the minutest fraction of a cent, a certain something, which they call funds, just sufficient in amount to pay their debts. But when the day of reckoning comes, their gold and silver turn out to be an "abstract nonenity," and their goods and chattels are embraced under a sheriff's return of nulla bona. At this point of profitable insolvency, my colleague [Mr. KING] comes to their relief. He would have the currency (bank bills) based in part on specie, and in part on the productive industry of the country. Those who would create a bank, and enable it to make contracts, do not, at the same time, provide the corporation with gold and silver, or other valuable property, wherewith to comply with those contracts, and redeem their paper emissions. No, sir: no provision of this sort is made. How, then, are their bills, which constitute our currency, to be redeemed? In part, says my colleague, with specie, and in part by the productive industry of the people. As this is a most important and startling proposition, I will quote the gentleman's own words, from his speech on the Treasury note bill. He says:

"In the progress of financial science, this country and Great Britain have adopted a credit system, founded on banks of discount, deposite, and circulation, which supply a currency based on the precious metals and the productive industry of the people. This system has sprung up under the fostering care, and out of the very nature and spirit of our Republican institutions, and the character of our people for integrity and enterprise."

Here, then, is the broad assertion that the banks of this country supply a currency, (that is, bank bills,) based on the precious metals, and on the productive industry of the people. Interpret this part of the gentleman's speech, and how will it read? Why, sir, in plain English, it means that our currency, which is almost exclusively paper promises to pay, is based upon, and supported by, the precious metals, and by the labor of the people. If these bills are ever redeemed, they must be paid with specie, as long as it lasts; when that source of solvency fails, then with the products of the industry of the people! The produce of your labor, of mine, and of my constituents, who may not own one dollar of bank stock, is to be seized on, and appropriated as a basis, in part, for our currency, and, consequently, as a means of redeeming and paying off the paper issues of the banks. And this beautiful system of appropriating the produce of the people's labor to pay the debts of corporations, we are gravely told, springs out of, and is fostered by, our Republican institutions and the character of our people? This, sir, is your modern credit system, and from it I wholly and totally dissent; and if I have not greatly mistaken the people of Georgia, they will fix upon it the seal of their indignant condemnation, as a principle which, if successfully practised, will not only destroy their rights, but rob them of their property. Sir, the people whom I represent will never consent that the produce of their labor shall be appropriated as a basis for any paper emissions, except for their own bonds, drafts, orders, due-bills, and promissory notes. Let the banks pay their own paper, and the people pay theirs.

[Mr. KING rose and objected that the deductions and inferences his colleague [Mr. BLACK] had drown from that part of his speech just quoted, were illegitimate, and did not convey his meaning or intention.]

Mr. BLACK replied: Here are the gentleman's words; I can't tell what he would mean; I only tell you what he has said; and I submit to our constituents whether I have not drawn therefrom the only reasonable inferences and deductions which the gentleman's printed remarks will bear.

But I shall be told that the people, by receiving these bills, make them their own; that the bank holds the notes and obligations of the people; and that when these are paid, the bank will be enabled to pay their bills. Now, as between the few original borrowers and these institutions, the question may be a little different; but even between them, there is only an exchange of credits; the borrower gives his endorsed credit, backed by his property and personal responsibility, for the unendorsed, irresponsible credit of the bank; the borrower receives no money in return for his note—not a cent; he only receives a promise to pay money on demand; and if he demands that payment, he may be lawfully met with his own note. For his folly, in making so fruitless an exchange, he loses the interest he paid in the shape of discount, and gets back his own note for the notes of the bank. Thus far, there is not much to complain of; for the favored few who originally borrow, act with their eyes open, and a set off between them and their creditor is fair and just. But here the fairness of the transaction stops; the few individuals who "get accommodation," pass the bills they receive into the hands of the people for a valuable consideration; and thus these institutions become, in truth, the debtors of the people—their bills being payable to bearer, against which they have nothing to show but the promissory notes of those with with whom they originally exchanged credits. The bill holders, having parted with their property upon the faith of these promises to pay money, demand payment; and are told that the currency, being based on the productive industry of the country, must be paid by the people, and redeemed by the produce of their labor. This is a game, sir, which, if well played, must win every thing for the bank, and lose every thing for the people; for they are not only called on, in the first place, to part with their property for this currency, but are required, ultimately, to redeem that currency with the produce of their industry. If the banks had originally paid out gold and silver, instead of promises to pay, then the productive industry of the country would be properly liable for the repayment of the money loaned, or its equivalent; but until such a state of things can be shown to exist, the banks are the debtors, and the people the creditors.

Sir, said Mr. BLACK, a national bank has ever been, and must still be, a source of oppression to the State banks. As between the two, unconnected with the Government, I shall always be found aiding and supporting our local institutions; and, with the history of the past before me, I should be recreant to their interests if I did otherwise. Let us look at the connection which has existed between some of the State corporations, located in Savannah and the branch of the national bank in the same place. It will be seen, by a resolution of our own Legislature, that the United States Bank was not only willing, but able to oppress and harass our local banks. Not only so, sir, but it actually held the State of Georgia at bay; and her Legislature was fain to advise, that "all collision with the Bank of the United States be eschewed, if possible."

RESOLUTIONS OF THE GEORGIA LEGISLATURE.

"IN SENATE, November 30, 1821.

"The joint committee on banks, to whom has been referred the expositions of the Bank of the State of Georgia, the Planters' Bank, and the Bank of Darien, report:

"That they have, upon a careful examination of the expositions of the state and conditions of the aforesaid banks, found that their capacity to meet their engagements at this time rests upon the basis of a metallic capital of considerable amount. The Planters' Bank, though involved in some embarrassing difficulties with the branch of the United States Bank in Savannah, has made a report evincing the most wholesome condition. The State and Darien Banks, though the claims against them bear a greater proportion to their means of paying, are still considered as being in a state of unquestionable solvency; and it is a pleasing reflection, that amid the trying difficulties which have surrounded the commercial part of the community, a diminution of the usual dividends declared on the stock of the greatest evil likely to result from the present embarrassment of the banks.

"Your committee ask leave further to report: That the State of Georgia, by the establishment of her banking institutions, had two great objects in view. The one to furnish to her citizens a safe and convenient medium of circulation, to the exclusion of the bills of the banks of other States: the other to enable her to have the funds of the States profitably invested in bank stock.

"Both of these objects have either entirely failed, or have been considerably abridged, by the operations of the office of the Bank of the United States at Savannah; which, in the opinion of your committee, having been intruded upon the State of Georgia, without her consent, is an interference with her sovereignty as an independent State.

"Because the aforesaid office of the Bank of the United States, located at Savannah, did, for a long time, refuse to issue its bills; and, by accumulating the bills of the State banks, as the depository of the revenue of the United States, and by other means perfectly within its power, has not only taken from the State her medium of circulation for her valuable products, but by frequent and repeated demands for large sums in specie upon the State banks, had well nigh drained their vaults, thereby threatening their destruction, and compelling them, in order to meet the exigency, to curtail their discounts, insomuch as to deprive the State and the individual stockholders of their usual and expected dividends.

"In such a state of things, your committee would advise no step which might array the State against the authorities of the United States, or injure the credit of the bills of the banks of the State of Georgia. They would advise all collision with the Bank of the United States to be eschewed, if possible. But a proper regard to the safety of their own institutions demands, and imperiously requires, that something should be done for their protection.

"Your committee, therefore, recommend that a law shall be passed establishing a rate of interest between the United States Bank and the banks of the State of Georgia, below the present legal rate of interest of the State, and so low as to prevent the said banks from being benefited by an accumulation of the bills of each other; for which purpose your committee recommend the passage of a law.

"And further, your committee recommend that, while the State banks shall rigidly persevere in paying their bills in specie to all individuals applying therefor, who may not be agents of the Bank of the United States, or either of its branches, that they shall refuse, whenever they may think prudent so to do, to pay specie for their bills to the United States Bank, or its offices or agents, upon giving sixty days' previous notice of such intention.

"And your committee confidently hope that public opinion will bear the State institutions out in such a course of conduct, as none other seems, in the mind of your committee, to be calculated to save the State institutions eventually from utter annihilation, under existing circumstances, to the great injury of the State, and of the individuals who are, or may be, stockholders in the aforesaid banking establishments.

This resolution shows that our local banks once felt the arm of the great regulator; and that even the State of Georgia, while she sought to throw the egis of her Legislative protection over her own institutions, was driven to invoke the aid of public opinion to bear them out in their course of conduct. So powerful was this institution, and so heavily had it oppressed some of the local banks in Savannah, that the Legislature was compelled to interfere, to protect the rights of her citizens. The bank was denounced as an intruder upon the sovereignty of the State, and as exercising its power to destroy those institutions to which I have referred. In the words of Hugh L. White: "This state of things was produced because the directors managed the bank with a view to their own interests and that of their friends, disregarding the interests of that community from which they had acquired their power. MAY THEY NOT DO SO AGAIN? HAVE WE NOT REASON TO FEAR THEY WILL, IF THE CHARTER IS PROLONGED?"

Let my constituents who are interested in the local institutions of the South turn to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made to the Senate of the United States in 1838, showing the comparative price of local bank paper in 1827, when a National Bank was in existence, and when its paper was the "par value;" and in 1836, when the great regulator had ceased to exist:

A table showing the highest and lowest price of bank notes at Philadelphia, in the years 1827 and 1836.

BANKS OF	During the existence of the United States Bank, 1827.	Under the State bank system, 1826.
Maine	2½ to 1½ d.	1 to ¼ a 1 d.
New Hampshire	2½ to 1 d.	1 to ¼ a 1 d.
Vermont	2½ to 1 d.	1 to ¼ a 1 d.
Masschusetts	1 to 2½ a 1 d.	1 to ¼ a 1 d.
Rhode Island	2 to 1 d.	1 to ¼ a 1 d.
Connecticut	1½ to 1 d.	1 to ¼ a 1 d.
New York city	Par.	Par to ½ d.
New York, country	1 to 3 d.	1 to 1½ d.
Philadelphia	Standard.	Standard.
Other Pennsylvania	Par to 1 d.	Par to 2½ d.
New Jersey	Par to 2 a 1 d	Par to 1 d.
Delaware	Par to 1½ d.	Par to ¾ d.
Baltimore	½ d. to par.	½ to ½ d.
Other Maryland	¾ to ½ d.	½ to 1 d.
District of Columbia	½ to ¾ d.	½ to 1 d.
Virginia	¼ to 1½ d.	½ to 1½ d.
Western Virginia	3 to 4½ d.	1½ to 2½ d.
North Carolina	3 to 5½ d.	2 to 3 d.
South Carolina	¾ to 1½ d.	2 to 3 d.
Georgia	3 to 2 d.	2 to 3 d.
Florida	-	No sales.
Alabama	10 to 25 d.	3 to 7 d.
Louisiana	5 to 4 d.	2½ to 6 d.
Mississippi	6 d.	3 to 6 d.
Tennessee	7 to 10 d.	3 to 6 d.
Missouri	-	No sale.
Illinois	-	3 to 5 d.
Indiana	-	3 to 3½ d.
Kentucky	30 to 40 d.	2 to 3 d.
Ohio	4 to 6 d.	2 to 3 d.
Michigan	10 to 13 d.	2 to 3 d.
Canada	6 to 5 d.	2 to 4½ d.

From this table, which is authentic, it appea that, during the reign of the United States Bank, the paper of the banks of Virginia, Maryland, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, and Mississippi, ranged at Philadelphia, in 1827, at from ¼ to 25 per cent. discount. In 1836 they had risen, in the same city, to from ¼ to 7 per cent. discount. Do not these facts speak volumes? Sir, I have nothing to do with our local banks, nor do I own one dollar of their stocks; but yet those who are interested in them are my constituents, and the interest I feel in their prosperity will ever restrain me from voting to recharter a corporation, the past history of which presents one continued series of oppression and injury to the people I represent. I have been charged with a desire to destroy all banks; the charge is false and calumnious. I would reform the abuses which have crept into them. But, relieved of their imperfections, and administered with a view to the welfare and convenience of the community, I would stand by them and defend them from the insidious attacks of pretended friends, who, with the banks ever on their lips, are willing to reinstate a great overshadowing national institution, which, in the language of the Legislature of Georgia, "has not only taken from the State her medium of circulation for her valuable products, but by frequent and repeated demands for large sums in specie upon the State banks, had well nigh drained their vaults, thereby threatening their destruction, and compelling them, in order to meet the exigency, to curtail their discounts, insomuch as to deprive the State and the individual stockholders of their usual and expected dividends."

It is said, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Van Buren had depressed the wages of labor and the price of property—that the results of his administration are seen and felt in the ruin and distress which surrounds us. This charge is easily made; but where are the proofs? Round assertion may astonish, but cannot convince us. What is the cause of this universal distress, which is said to pervade the whole country? Their answer is, the people are in debt, and cannot get money to satisfy their creditors. Admit it to be true—who is to blame for it, Mr. Van Buren, or the banks? Why, sir, if our distresses, as we are told, arise from a scarcity of money, the contraction of the currency is evidently the cause of that effect. The banks, and not Mr. Van Buren, make the currency. They contract or expand it as their pleasure or interest dictates, and I now propose to prove to you, by irrefutable references, that the banks, who alone furnish the medium of purchases, have not only contracted their issues to a fearful and ruinous extent, but that the price of flour, one of the main articles of subsistence, fell in exact proportion to the contraction of the currency. Here, sir, is a Table of expansions and contractions of the Ohio banks for eleven months, from 30th April, 1839, to 31st March, 1840; and the relative prices of flour during the same periods.

Date.		Circulation.	Contraction.	Expansion.	Flour pr bbl
1839.
April	30	$8,240,820 80	-	-	$5 62
June	30	7,947,597 47	$394,233 33	-	4 87
September	30	6,263,454 57	1,684,142 90	-	4 75
November	30	5,047,778 22	1,215,671 35	-	4 20
December	31	4,607,127 62	440,650 60	-	4 06
1840.
January	31	4,183,673 12	423,454 50	-	3 72
February	29	4,745,113 47	-	$561,440 35	3 75
March	31	4,147,766 57	595,346 90	-	2 87

I have selected this table from a number of others within my reach, simply because the distress, of which we hear so much, is said to be mostly prevalent in the West. Thus you see, sir, when the banks contracted, the price of flour fell; and when, in February, 1840, a slight expansion took place, the price of flour rose correspondently!

Let us look further into the state of things in Ohio, a great and central State, exercising an important influence in the fiscal affairs of the West. I read from the "Ohio Eagle:"

"PANIC, PRESSURE, LOW PRICES, AND THE CAUSE.

"No one fact is better established than that the 'pernicious fluctuations' (as honest John Davis says) of our paper money system, exercise a controlling power over the business and values of the country. In the day of 'expansion' when money is made plenty by the banks, property, produce, and labor, are high—the to-morrow of 'contraction' comes, money is made scarce, and all prices of property and rewards of labor are knocked down with the crash.

"Apply this general and acknowledged rule to the condition of things in Ohio. The whole Union is suffering the evils of money contraction; but let us look at our own State for an illustration of the means by which it is brought about. We take the reports of the officers of the banks themselves, made under oath, to the Bank Commissioners, and by them compiled. Their first annual report to the Legislature, shows the circulation of the Ohio banks on the 30th day of April, 1839, to have been - - - - - - - $8,309,141 80
The published abstract of 30th of April, 1840, shows to be - - - - - 4,191,595 00

Contraction of circulation within one year - $4,117,546 80

"Thus, within one year, one-half of the circulating medium of the State of Ohio has been violently withdrawn by the banks.

"Why has this contraction, and the sufferings which are the necessary consequence, been brought upon the country? The Federal apologists and allies of the banks will say, because the Bank Commissioner law compelled them to curtail. But let us take five of these institutions, at the principal points of Cincinnati, Dayton, Columbus, Chillicothe, and St. Clairsville, thus:

	Circulation in 1839.	In 1840.
Franklin Bank, Cincinnati,	$264,383 00	$94,649 00
Dayton Bank,	134,684 00	41,262 00
Franklin Bank, Columbus,	227,954 00	57,256 00
Bank of Chillicothe,	438,831 08	123,246 08
Belmont Bank, St. Clairsville,	125,546 00	39,732 00
	356,145 08
Contraction in one year,	$832,453 00

Eight hundred and thirty-two thousand four hundred and fifty three dollars is the extent to which five banks, at principal commercial points, have applied the screws. Now as to the necessity of this curtailment, look at the following comparative statement of circulation and specie on the 30th of April last:

	Circulation.	Specie.
Franklin Bank, Columbus,	$57,256 00	$78,890 00
Bank of Chillicothe,	123,246 08	153,657 13
Bank of St. Clairsville,	39,732 00	51,260 89
Bank of Dayton,	41,262 00	75,562 58
Franklin Bank, Cincinnati,	94,649 00	144,263 18
	$356,145 08	$503,823 78
Specie more than circulation,		$147,678 70

"One hundred and forty-seven thousand six hundred and seventy-eight dollars and seventy cents is the amount of specie which these five banks have locked up in their vaults, lying idle, unproductive, and useless, while the whole community is suffering around them. Take this amount, and multiply it by three—their ratio of paper to specie, and we find that it would sustain a circulation of $443,096 10—that is, the surplus specie would sustain a greater amount of circulation by nearly one hundred thousand dollars, than the five banks in question have out, and the five banks then have less out by $564,551 46 than would be allowed by the bank commissioner law, about which so much complaint is made.

"Fellow-citizens, here is a reason for the lowness of prices, and stagnation of business that oppress the community. Five banks, taken as instances from among the thirty-seven, and taken because they are located at important points of business, have convulsed the business community around them with a contraction of $832,453 in one year. They have seized the specie of the country, and locked it up in their vaults, giving to the suffering and complaining people that surround them less of their paper by near one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, than they have taken from them in hard money. This warfare and outrage upon the public good is defended by the Federal presses upon the pretence that the bank commissioner law rendered it necessary. That law fixes the safe and proper ratio of three to one, and would allow these five banks to issue $1,511,471 upon the specie which they now have in their vaults. Without necessity, without pretext or excuse, without a feeling of sympathy or compassion for the sufferings they have created, these banks have taken away, and withhold from the people, $1,155,246 of circulation, which their specie would sustain, and which the law would allow them to issue."

Here, sir, is a specimen of the way in which money is made scarce. These are facts and deductions which every man can understand; and yet Mr. Van Buren, who controls no bank, and who has as yet no Sub-Treasury, is accused of lowering prices and ruining the people! I will not detain you by reading the numerous statistics I have collected in relation to the cause of low prices; but as I have already consumed more of your time than I intended, I will pass on to a conclusion as swiftly as practicable.

The bill on your table is about to become a law: instead of increasing the distresses of the country, its beneficial effects are already beginning to be felt. Heretofore, during this winter, gold and silver have been selling in this city at from four to five and six per cent. premium; it now can scarcely be sold on Pennsylvania avenue for three per cent. Is this no gain to the people? Instead of locking up the specie in your safes, it will draw out a portion of it to be circulated among the creditors of the Government. Who are they? Not only the officers who administer the Government, but the workingmen who furnish the supplies of clothing and subsistence to your army and navy; the soldiers and sailors who fight your battles; the laborers who construct your public buildings; who build your fortifications and vessels of war. Every man who sells to the Government either his peronal services, or the produce of his labor will be paid in gold and siver; and this gold and silver will return, in due time, to the Treasury again, to be expended among the creditors of the Government. The amount of specie required for the Treasury will be, by being thus kept in constant circulation, not more than five millions of the seventy or eighty millions of dollars now in the United States. But I am told we are making one currency for the Government, and another for the people. If this were true, I myself would condemn the measure. The bill makes no provision for the currency of the people; it only prescribes the currency which the Government will receive for debts due to it; and which, when received, it pays out again to the people, leaving them free to receive what they please in payment of the debts due to them. And if this be a better currency, do not the men who, I have shown you, ultimately receive it, eventually reap the benefit? Shall the public Treasurer be compelled to receive any thing and every thing that the people choose to receive from each other? If so, we must take bonds, due bills, promissory notes of all sorts, and the irredeemable paper money which is afloat in the country; nay, sir, you must receive your taxes and duties in kind, because you know all these are current among the people; and what is good for the people, say they, is good for the Government. Let us test this objection to the Sub-Treasury system, by a glance at the state of things as they actually exist in the South. I cut from the "Daily Telegraph," published in Savannah, the following advertisements, which will serve to show what sort of currency the people think proper to receive from each other:

"TO THE PUBLIC.

"The subscriber begs of his friends, and of those who hold any of the few shinplasters that he has signed, to send them to his store, where he will pay bankable money for them. On putting those bills out, he thought that it would afford immediate relief, in the way of change, to himself and friends. Finding, however, that it has not this effect, he declines signing any more, but will take, for goods, Mr. Wiltberger's, the City Council's, and Ice House Company of Augusta, Macon, Columbus, Brunswick, Darien, or any other individual shinplasters in our city. "P. HALLIGAN."

"ALL KINDS OF MONEY.

"The subscriber will take Wiltberger's, Dempsey's, Lloyd's, Rogers's, Halligan's, City Council bills, and those of all responsible individuals, whenever offered him for goods.

"M. PENDERGAST."

The above are practical illustrations, drawn from actual life, of the Whig theory, that whatever currency the people think proper to receive, this Government is also bound to receive. How long could we maintain our stand among the nattions of the earth, if your Treasurer was compelled to take "all kinds of money"—"Mr. Wiltberger's, the City Council's, and Ice-house Companies' bills, or any other individual's shinplasters in our city?" Your army would be dispersed, your navy would rot, your forts, arsenals, and public buildings, would be left without a tenant, to decay and ruin; your public officers would seek support elsewhere, and this happy state of affairs, produced by this Whig theory, would bring about precisely that "critical moment" predicted by Mr. Jefferson, "when a series of untoward events, sufficient to bring into doubt the competency of a Republican Government," would transpire, and which a National Bank might take advantage of, to step in and "upset the Government."

The Bank party, so eager to take the public money into their own keeping, now attempt to frighten us with the declaration, that this bill will place the whole revenue in the hands of Mr. Van Buren. Let the bill on your table, and the Constitution, answer this futile and interested objection. Instead of placing the revenue in the hands of the President, it places it in the United States Treasury—the people's strong box—where it ought to be, and where it cannot be loaned out or banked upon for the benefit of speculators and bank favorites. The Constitution provides that no money shall be drawn out of the Treasury except in pursuance of appropriations made by law; and any officer of the Government who shall violate these restrictions, or embezzle a dollar, "or who shall convert to his own use, in any way whatever, or shall use by way of investment in any kind of property or merchandise, or shall loan, with or without interest, any portion of the public moneys intrusted to him for safekeeping, disbursement, transfer, or for any other purpose, every such act shall be deemed and adjudged to be an embezzlement of so much of the said moneys as shall be thus taken, converted, invested, used, or loaned, which is hereby declared to be a felony; and any officer or agent of the United States, and all persons advising or participating in such act, being convicted thereof before any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, and all persons advising or participating in such act, being convicted thereof before any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a term not less than six months, nor more than five years, and a fine equal to the amount of the money embezzled." These are the words of the Sub-Treasury bill. Were any such restrictions or safeguards thrown around the bank when it acted as our agent? Could you execute a judgment of felony on an artificial, intangible, irresponsible corporation, which is not only superior to personal imprisonment, but which converted to its own use the national revenue intrusted to its care, and which had been drawn from the people, nor for the emolument of a corporation, but for the support of the public interest?

But, Mr. Chairman, I have done. I must reserve for some other occasion a more minute exposition of the wisdom of this measure, for I have already detained you longer than I expected. My purpose in addressing this committee was not so much to make proselytes here, as to vindicate myself before the people of my own State. By the facts and arguments I have adduced to you, I have clearly demonstrated, that however I may have erred in other respects, I have neither abandoned my former principles, nor misrepresented the State of Georgia.

SPEECH OF MR. LINCOLN,

OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In the House of Representatives, April 16, 1840—In reply to Mr. OGLE, upon the proposition of the latter to strike out of the General Appropriation Bill a small item for alterations and repairs of the President's House, &c.

When Mr. LINCOLN obtained the floor, it was late in the evening, and, perceiving that he was fatigued by the long sitting, it was proposed to adjourn the debate to the following day, but Mr. L. preferred saying at once what he had to say. He began by replying to some remarks of Mr. OGLE incidental to the main debate, taking occasion, in the course of his reply, to state certain particulars in which his remarks on a former day had been misstated, probably because misunderstood, by the Reporter for the Globe newspaper. After disposing of this preliminary matter, Mr. L. proceeded to the main subject before the Committee of the Whole, upon which he spoke as follows:

The member from Pennsylvania (said Mr. LINCOLN) has insisted that the tendency of my remarks was to justify the purchase of extravagant articles of furniture for the President's house. I repeat that I attempted no such justification, for I had neither seen many of the exceptionable articles nor inquired into their price. The argument, so far as it went, was against that false standard of economy which measures the value of a thing by its cost, and decides upon its fitness with no reference whatever to the place or occasion for its use. The selection of furniture for such an establishment is matter of taste, about which minds may well differ; and I said that while some would consider as most appropriate the rich and showy, others would prefer the plain and simple in fashion; but that, for a mansion so spacious and so magnificent as that which the nation had provided for the residence of the Chief Magistrate, the furniture, so far as I had seen, was neither too good nor too abundant. In this, I am not aware that I alone among the Whigs, although I may not indeed be so happy as to meet the approving voice of all. But does such a difference imply dereliction of principle any where? The member suggests that my manner of life and habits of thinking may have given me a taste for articles of extravagance. What does he know of my habits of life? Sir, I can tell him they have been as honorably laborious, and as plainly republican, at least, as his own. Be it from necessity or choice, I am in no wise ignorant of those duties and offices which become the humblest station. I have been taught to toil as faithfully, and to direct my thoughts as uprightly, as the least proud one here. One lesson more have I learned, that, in reference to the conduct of others, the tongue is an unruly organ, which an evil spirit may indulge, but which candor and a love of truth should at all times restrain.

Mr. Chairman, it can only be necessary to review the remarks of the member to show the absurdity of their intended application. While he condemns the extravagance of the furniture, he is silent in respect to the appropriations through which it was procured. These appropriations are the grants of legislation by the Representatives of the people. Whose was the work of constructing the costly mansion, and to what end was it reared? More than forty years have now elapsed since the building was erected, at the charge of more than half a million of dollars to the nation, and from that time to the present it has been occupied in the manner in which it is now used. Congress, through all this intervening period, have voted the sums for furnishing the house, as they had previously done for its construction. If it were intended that the occupant should himself provide the furniture, wherefore these grants? They commenced before the house was first taken possession of by the elder Adams, and the occasions for further supplies have since been voluntarily anticipated upon every succession to the Presidency Besides, the spacious halls and lofty ceilings of such a mansion require much which would be suited to no other residence. The reasonableness of compelling a President elect to an outlay exceeding his annual salary in the purchase of furniture for a house, the occupancy of which he has not the election to refuse, and the tenancy of which, at the expiration of every four years, is at the disposal of the popular voice, with the certainty of the sacrifice upon the cost of the property in the attempt to dispose of it for any other place or use, cannot gravely be contended for. The credit of the country itself would suffer by such an arrangement; for either the officer, by the absorption of his salary in the purchase of suitable and sufficient furniture for the house, would be deprived of the appointed means for his proper support in the office, or, by the neglect of such provision, would exhibit to the world, in his public station, the discreditable contrast of magnificent apartments meanly destitute or scantily furnished with whatever was appropriate to their occupation. It is a great mistake to suppose that these accommodations are for the personal relief, or to the private advantage of the President. He is made by them, and by the amplitude of his salary, emphatically the host of the nation. His guests are the guests of the people. The Executive mansion is the place for their reception. This house of the people is the fitting position in which, in the person of their Chief Magistrate, they receive from the representatives of other people the homage due to the sovereignty of this great Republic. Here ambassadors and ministers, the accredited messengers from the proudest and most powerful, the enlightened and most refined of the kingdoms of the earth, are received and entertained in the name of the hospitality of the nation! And here, too, the courtesies of official station are exchanged between the high functionaries of the Government, and extended to all classes of the citizens. The House, it is well known, is open to all, and is daily visited by many. Is it too much, then, that the place and its appendages are beyond the requirements of private station? I venture the assertion, that so far as the personal interest of the President is concerned, (I speak not of the present incumbent, but of whoever has been or may be in the office,) it would be preferable, far preferable, to him to occupy, at his own cost, a smaller and more humble humble dwelling, than to submit to the inconveniences and heavy exactions which his required residence in the Executive mansion necessarily imposes. Sure I am that, in a pecuniary point of view, it would be much better for any incumbent in the office to receive ten thousand dollars, and furnish his own habitation, than with twenty-five thousand to maintain the style of living and public hospitality which every President in succession has deemed but in conformity with the design, as well as the liberality of present provisions.

But the member complains of it as a monstrous abuse, that the President of the United States, in addition to his salary, and the use of a furnished house, should have the grounds about the latter kept in order at the public expense. He says the President ought to furnish his own house and employ his own gardener, as his salary is amply sufficient. I have only to add to what I have before said on this subject, that such has not been the judgment or the pleasure of the people. For forty years, their Representatives sitting in these halls, without division in sentiment or vote, have provided the house, supplied the furniture, directed the enclosure and improvement of the grounds, and required their occupation by the Chief Magistrate. The salary may be sufficient for the officer. On this point I take no issue with the member. So may the per diem of eight dollars be ample compensation for a Representative in Congress. But does the scrupulous member himself receive nothing more? I demand of him to say if eight dollars a day is not abundant recompense for the value of his labors here; and yet, does he keep his hands clean from all the perquisites of place? Has he no Government stationery in his room? no Congressional penknife of costly extravagance at this very moment in his pocket? Has he never ordered to his lodgings the beautiful "embossed and lace-edged note paper" and "fancy sealing wax," for the use of any of his family, or received to his own use a distributive share of the "spoils," in costly editions of books printed at the expense of the Treasury? Sir, let me not be misunderstood. I do not condemn him in this, for the legislation of the House allows it. But I say he receives these things by a more questionable authority than does the President of the United States the accommodations which are made the burden of his complaint. When, therefore, the member goes to his constituents and to mine with the objections that the Chief Magistrate of the nation is (in his most courteous language) robbing and cheating the people in receiving, under an appropriation of Congress, the use of a furnished house and the care of a garden, in addition to his salary, let him, at the same time, honestly admit, that to his own pay he adds, at the public charge, perquisites of considerable value, and which a colleague of his, [Mr. PETRIKIN,] on another occasion, pronounced, although I think by gross exaggeration, equal in amount to the per diem. Sir, the President is much rather to be justified in the use of his furnished lodgings than the member in the enjoyment of his perquisites; for the latter may be refused, while the former, consistently with the existing arrangements of the Government, cannot be declined.

I regret, Mr. Chairman, that it necessary for me to pursue this ungrateful subject further. I fear, in doing it, I shall exhaust the patience of the committee. But the member cavils with me for sustaining the appropriation for the salary of the gardener at the President's square. In my remarks, on a former day, to which he excepts, I said that this had been a usual appropriation for many years, and that I saw no new reason, at this time, for its discontinuance. I have now in my hand a certificate from the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, showing that the gardener, the very same individual, with the same character of service, and at the same rate of compensation, has been in the employ of the Government for the continuous period of fifteen years, having been first engaged in 1825. I will read the certificate here, as notice that I shall offer it on the trial of the issue between the member and myself before my constituents:

"OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

"It appears from the books of this office that John Ousley was appointed gardener at the President's square on the 1st of August, 1825, at a regular salary of four hundred and fifty dollars per annum for his services. He has received that salary quarterly, up to the 31st December, 1839, and is at this time the gardener at the President's square.

"W. NOLAND."

In respect to the grounds about the President's house, they, in common with those around the Capitol, are, at all times, open to the public. They have been laid out and ornamented at the public charge, and if not now cared for by Congress, will soon become a neglected and unsightly waste. The President has no motive to the expense of their improvement. Like the spacious walks and cultivated borders of the beautiful enclosure within which we are here situated, they are for the enjoyment of the people, and in the frequency of resort to them, and the freedom with which they are used, it is daily seen how little they are regarded as private. They are, indeed, accessible to all, and I would recommend to the member himself, at some pleasant eventide, to repair to this quiet retreat, and indulge in the meditation to which it invites.

Again: It is made a heinous offence in me that, in addition to all which is now within and about the House, I gave notice that the committee of which I am a member would propose, at the present session, a small appropriation for one of the rooms most frequently in use, and which is now entirely destitute of furniture. The bill which contains that appropriation has since been reported from the committee, and gives a few hundred dollars for the purchase of plain furniture, of American manufacture, for the ante-room to the President's parlor. The member objects that this is altogether unnecessary, and the reason he assigns for this opinion is as singular as the objection is extraordinary in itself. "In the ante-rooms of princes," says the member, visiters are kept standing until they are admitted to an audience." When I addressed this committee, on a former day, I described this room as the apartment into which visiters, whether for ceremony or business, were shown previous to their introduction to the President. Here they dispose of their over garments, in all weather and seasons, and wait, if need be, the previous engagements of the President; and in this room there is not the accommodation of a mirror, a table, or a chair. Whatever may be the forms observed in the courts of Europe, or the habit of princes in the treatment of their subjects—of which I profess to be but poorly advised—it strikes me as hardly becoming that they should be quoted in Republican America as fit rules to be adopted for the regulation of intercourse between free, independent, enlightened citizens, and their elective officers. The courts of Europe, forsooth! And such is the authority relied upon by this Whig from Pennsylvania for denying a chair to his constituents and mine, in the very house provided by the people for their own honor, and in excuse for denouncing me for seeking to make provision for their more suita- accommodation. Because the princes of Europe keep their vassals in servile waiting upon their pleasure, is that a reason why a Republican citizen of the United States should lack the comfort of a seat, while the President may be called from his table or his study to offer him those courtesies to which every freeman is here entitled? It is not thus my Democracy teaches. The free citizens of a Republic are themselves sovereigns, and the measure of their right and the respect which is their due are not to be looked for in the conventional etiquette of courts, nor are they the boon of princes. If the constituents of the member shall visit Washington, and desire an introduction to the Chief Magistrate, and he dare trust himself to accompany them to the "White House," I venture to say he will be made sensible to the deficiency which the committee propose to supply; and whatever may be his own views of subserviency to the customs of Europe, the indignant expression of reproof which he would hear from those to whom he should offer such an excuse for any want they might witness, would bring conviction to his mind that this was not the country of princes. What! himself a Whig, and propose a conformity to the manners and customs of aristocratic power—aping the fashions of a royal court? Himself professing to be a Republican, and condemn that which respect for a Republican people demands? Sir, I repeat, this is a poor concern to be made the occasion of so much clamor. It hardly becomes the member, for such cause, to read homilies upon political consistency to others. The inducement to his gratuitous labors may be found in the narrowness of his own views, rather than in a default of fidelity elsewhere. He mistakes a small matter of mere business expediency for a great question of principle. Mr. Chairman, lest, from the vehemence of his denunciation, any should be led to suppose an abandonment of party by me, I will even volunteer a confession of faith; and I here profess, testify, and declare, that I am no less a Whig than if I had never seen the Executive mansion; ay, that I am as much to be confided in for steadfast opposition to the present Administration as though, like the member, I had the new born zeal of a convert from Jacksonism! Sir, I am as thoroughly opposed to Mr. Van Buren as the member was devoted, at one time, to his "illustrious predecessor!" I regard the policy and leading measures of the Administration as hostile to the best interests of the people, and destructive of the prosperity of the country; and, as such, from the first, I have been their uncompromising opponent, and to the utmost of my power shall continue to resist them. But in this I have not, nor shall I demean myself, by indulging in hard names and coarse invectives against the high officers of Government.

Mr. Chairman, I might now rest. It is not my intention to enter into any defence of the propriety of the particular appropriations which, from time to time, have been made for the accommodation of the Chief Magistrate of the nation. Much less would I attempt a vindication of the prodigal expenditures of the present Administration. They have been extravagant and wasteful enough, in all conscience, and furnish an exhaustless theme for the severest animadversion. When I had the honor of addressing the committee, on a former day, I distinctly presented, in connection with the subject now under discussion, some of the most crying abuses, in the construction of the public edifices in this city, the deceptive estimates, and irresponsible profligate management of those who had direction of the work, and, as I deemed, the wanton and lawless diversion of funds by the Executive, from other and more important objects, to their completion. At the proper time, and on a suitable occasion, I shall be as prompt as another to take to task the Adminstration for any and all other of their misdoings.

There was one remark of the member from Pennsylvania made and dwelt upon with apparent complacency, so extraordinary in itself, (I was about to say, so atrocious, to my mind, in the only application which can possibly be given to it,) that I cannot permit it to pass unnoticed. In referring to the furniture and cultivation of the grounds in the use of the President, the member said, "the receiver was as bad as the——other man." Sir, we all know the words of the adage—"the receiver is as bad as the thief." And who is the receiver, and who the thief? From the days of Washington, through a long succession of illustrious men, every President of the United States, including the elder Adams, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, J. Q. Adams, Jackson, and the present incumbent, have received the benefit of a similar provision in their official station. The house, the furniture, the garden, and the cultivated grounds have been alike the enjoyment of each, and at the public charge. It may be instructive to this committee to be informed of the grants of Congress for some of these objects, during the several periods of the respective administrations. I have now before me a statement, collated from official documents, of appropriations for the purchase of furniture for each Presidential term, after the removal of the Seat of of Government to the Federal city.

By a law of the 2d of March, 1797, just previous to the commencement of the administration of the elder Adams, Congress made the following appropriation:

Proceeds of sale of old furniture, and so much in addition thereto, as the President may judge necessary, not exceeding $14,000.

During the Administration of Mr. Jefferson, the appropriations amounted to $29,000.

In that of Mr. Madison to $28,000.

It was in this period that the house was sacked by the British upon their incursion into Washington during the war, and the furniture, which, from the beginning, had cost the nation upwards of seventy thousand dollars, was wholly destroyed.

After the repair of the House, in the years 1817 and 1818, during the administration of Mr. Monroe, the records show appropriations for refurnishing it to the aggregate amount of $50,000.

In the administration of Mr. John Q. Adams, the grants amounted to $20,000.

In that of General Jackson to $39,000; and

In that of Mr. Van Buren, they have been, to this time, $20,000.

The statement from which I read gives the date of each law, and the precise appropriation under it.

Such, Mr. Chairman, are the sums—whether lavish or not, I shall not stop to consider—which, from time to time, have been voted by Congress; and these are the "receivers" to whom the member refers—men who, for accepting the accommodations provided by law for the office which they sustained, are charged with "robbing the Treasury and fleecing the People." These are they of whom it is said "the receiver is as bad as the thief!" The elder Adams, the dauntless asserter of American freedom; Jefferson, the co-patriot of Adams, the draughtsman of the Declaration of Independence, the great apostle of liberty, the very chief of Democrats; Madison, the champion of the Constitution, the patriot statesman and sage; Monroe, the soldier of the Revolution, the brave defender of the Republic in the first war, the inflexible and uncompromising advocate of national honor, rights, and interests in the last: these are they who received the appropriations, and to whom the adage is applied. Names deathless in fame, immortal in the history of their country's renown! My venerated colleague, too, the learned civilian, the accomplished diplomatist, the incorruptible magistrate, he who on this floor is the most fearless and faithful of the servants of the people, together with the Hero of New Orleans, "the greatest and the best," and the more humble "follower in the footsteps"—they also are within the obloquy of the same reproach.

And who is the thief? The Congress of the United States, the Representatives of the people, in succession, through a series of more than forty years. These are the men who, by making the appropriations, in the sentiment of the member from Pennsylvania, PLUNDERED THE TREASURY AND ROBBED THEIR CONSTITUENTS! Is there an individual within the sound of my voice whose cheek does not burn with indignation at the bare recital of the charge? Where were the sleepless sentinels of the people's rights, the dragon guardians of the public chests, when these spoilers robbed it of its treasure? Was no arm raised for its protection? Search the journals of either House of Congress, and neither voice nor vote is found against one of those appropriations. If they deserve the character now attempted to be given them, how happens it that in forty years there has been no resistance to their passage? How happens it, indeed, that, in the last Congress, of which this Pennsylvanian, of more than Spartan virtue, was a member, no opposition was offered to grants precisely similar to those contained in the present bill? They passed without objection then.

[Mr. OGLE. No; a member near me says he objected.]

Mr. LINCOLN. Who is the man? I heard of no dissentient. If any had the virtue, at that time, to think it wrong, he had not the courage to make it known. Where is the recorded vote at a call even for a division upon the question. Sir, the truth is, such grants were thought proper upon the original consideration of them, and subsequently they have been of course and usual. If the people will no longer approve them, Congress must refer back, by legislation, to their occasion; dispose of the "White House;" send the furniture to auction; and leave the President to provide for himself his place of residence and means of accommodation. When this shall appear to be the judgment of the people, I shall be found among the last to withstand their will.

There is another topic upon which the member has harped loud and long—the style and fashion of the articles which have been purchased under the appropriations. In my imperfectly reported remarks, to which the member so freely refers for a text to his folio annotations, with the reading of which, for hours, he has occupied the time of this committee, not a single article was particularly specified or justified by me. Wherefore, then, does he attempt to make me responsible for such as he has chosen to designate, and for the extravagance of which, upon the fidelity of his description only, he asks a sentence of condemnation? I did say, however, generally, I have already to day repeated, and I now reiterate, that to a casual observer the furniture appears neither too rich nor too abundant for the size and magnificence of the mansion, nor too good for the use of the first representative officer of a free and sovereign people. But of this I make no matter of personal controversy with the member. I understand him now to say that he has never been at the house. How well, then, it may comport with a becoming modesty, or sense of justice even, to denounce unseen that which prudent and honorable men have sanctioned, I leave for others to consider. He condemns the articles as the exhibition of aristocratic pride and splendor Well, sir, I defend not the purchase of these articles, but take my position behind the character of those by whose authority they were procured. I insist that whatever fault has been committed is with those who furnished the means of such extravagance—if extravagance there be—with the Representatives of the people, who, again and again, under every Administration, with a full knowledge of the manner in which the money would be expended, have voted the appropriations without restriction or qualification. I have shown that whatever reproach attaches to the procurement and use of such furniture has been incurred by the head of each successive Administration. If, indeed, the fashion of the House be a display of regal splendor, stern and sound Republicans have been betrayed into this foolish error.

Thomas Jefferson was once accounted a plain and unpretending Democrat, and passed, in his day, for an unostentatious Chief Magistrate, and yet we have seen that the sum of $29,000 was expended for furniture during the period of his Presidency; and this, too, in addition to the $14,000 previously granted to his immediate predecessor. The purity and Republican simplicity of Mr. Madison's life and manners have never, to this time, been questioned; yet to the $43,000 before appropriated, $28,000 more were added to the royal pageantry in the eight years of his Administration. Col. Monroe, too, was he a vainglorious aristocrat? He has the credit, in history, at least, of having resisted to blood, in the Revolutionary conflict, a Government of royal pride and arrogance, and by a life devoted to his country, contributed as largely as any other to the establishment and support of institutions of equal rights and political equality; yet, in his administration, a greater expenditure was made in refurnishing the house, after the late war, than under all his predecessors. What say you, Mr. Chairman, of my venerable colleague? Is he not a good Whig in principle, and a plain Republican in manners? And yet he received whatever benefit resulted from the appropriation of $20,000, during the four years of his Presidency, added to the large expenditure made by Colonel Monroe. But think you my honorable colleague would have consented to this, with a consciousness that it was intended for mere empty display? or that, by doing it, in the language of the member, he was robbing the Treasury and fleecing the people? Sir, my colleague has no occasion to make professions of honesty or respect for the rights of the people, to entitle his course of official action to the confidence due to eminent public services and distinguished private virtue. Of all men, he would be the last to indulge in matters of ostentation and vain show.

[Mr. OGLE. I deny that either Adams or Monroe ever had such trumpery as Van Buren.]

Mr. LINCOLN. And I undertake to say that, during the Presidency of Mr. Monroe, more "trumpery," as the member is pleased to term it, was carried into the Presidential mansion, than under every other Administration, to this time, put together.

Mr. Chairman, it was not my wish to enter at all into this subject. But upon the denial of the member now, I feel bound to refer the committee to the fact, apparent upon the bills, that many of the very articles which have been pointed out as most objectionable, were purchased from the appropriation of $50,000 in the time of Mr. Monroe. In point of truth, they were procured by him, and for his own account, while Minister in France, and were afterwards taken for the Government, by appraisal, on his accession to the chair of State. Ay, sir, this famous golden plateau, and most of these gold spoons, and knives, and forks, and vases, which have so bewildered the imagination of the member, and shocked the simple virtue of his heart, were the purchase of the Republican Monroe! And, in application to these even, there is a lesson of infancy, which may profitably be remembered, that "all is not gold which glitters;" for, if I am not greatly misinformed, the plateau, and spoons, and knives, and forks, are but silver gilded, and the golden vases but china painted!

But the monstrous extravagance of such things! exclaims the member. What is done with the vast amount of these appropriations? he inquires. Sir, I have not peered into the windows of the palace, or moused through the kitchen or the garret, to see whether the people have got their money's worth in the purchases which have been made. This is not the province of the committee of which I am a member; nor, if it were, would I perform the service. Does it require, he asks, such large amounts for mere plain and necessary furniture? No, sir, no; nor is it to be supposed that, by the large appropriations which have been made from time to time, Congress could intend the purchases should be so restricted. Simple, indeed, must he be (I had almost said a fool) who could imagine that, in the authority of an outlay of fifty thousand dollars, as in the case of Mr. Monroe, or of twenty thousand dollars, as in the administration of Mr. Adams, or thirty thousand, as in that of General Jackson, or twenty thousand for Mr. Van Buren, the ornamental was to be excluded. The schedules which the member exhibits may well excite his wonder. I know nothing of their fidelity. But the carpets and the curtains, the candlesticks and the candelabras, the ottomans and the divans, the tables, mahogany and marble, the tabourets (tabby cats, in the member's nomenclature) were all doubtless in the estimates. They may be names of startling sound to an unpractised ear, but they are things of use and no uncommon appearance in many a private parlor.

One thing, above all, seems to have created amazement with the member. He has found, in his manly and dignified research, an invoice of "cups and saucers," which were in the closets of Mr. Adams; and he cries out with astonishment at their number. What the need, he demands, of so many dozens of cups and saucers? Sir, I will tell the member. They were wanted for a purpose which he could never conjecture—the hospitable entertainment of visiters and friends. They were a means, among others, of offering the courtesies of place to those who called upon the President as the Representative of the people. They were used for the refreshment of the nation's guests. To such as witnessed the noble hospitality of my honorable colleague, in his high official station, it need not be told how entirely the accommodations of the house were made but mere appliances to his personal liberality. Sir, I advise the member to study better the manners of the past, before he prescribes a rule of conduct for the future. The public residence of the President of the United States has been, and should ever continue, the seat of a generous hospitality; and representing as I do a free-hearted and liberal constituency, the incumbent in office, whoever he may be, shall never find in my vote an excuse for its neglect. If General Harrison shall succeed to the occupancy of the White House, as I trust he may, and which I shall labor as zealously as any one to effect, my speech shall furnish no argument for leaving him there with only the worn out and cast-off furniture of his predecessor.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the member that he has left us in no doubt of the cause of his grievous complaints in these matters. I understand him to say that he was one of those who joined in the notorious East Room clamor; and by reason of the imputed extravagance of my venerable colleague, in the purchase of a billiard table, some cues and chessmen, at the cost of a few dollars, assisted in displacing one Administration, which taxed the Treasury but twelve millions a year, to introduce a dynasty which now requires more than thrice-told that amount for its annual expenditure. If for such cause he would hurl from place one of the most pure and faithful patriots that ever served the country, there can be no surprise at the weapons he has chosen with which to assail the men now in power. The member once belonged to the school of these same political reformers, and much I fear, in the fault of his early lessons, gives less heed, at this time, to the alarming principles and flagrant misdoings of a vicious Administration, than personal attention to a microscopic search for minor defects in the boastful economy of its disbursements. Sir, I solemnly protest against these things being brought into the politics of the day. They can be made to have no just or proper bearing there. It may seem to us that the salary of the President is too high, and the house and its appendages too splendid and costly; but they were the appointments of wiser and better men than ourselves, in the purer days of the Republic, and they have been sustained and enjoyed as the measure of every Administration, and in turn by all parties. For myself, I am free to confess that, were they at this time original provisions, with present experience, I should be the advocate of neither. But while the salary continues and the house remains, I will not consent that the President shall hoard the one or live like a recluse and niggard in the other.

But one word more, Mr. Chairman, and I have done. If, in sustaining the appropriations to which exceptions have been taken, I differ in judgment from others, it is because I regard the original design of the Government in the arrangement which requires them, and not that I advocate extravagant grants, or have the slightest reference to the benefit of their recipient. Of the particular manner in which the money has been expended, I pretend to know nothing, and I have said nothing. With Mr. Van Buren personally, I have nought to do. Upon his temper and bearing, his habits and manner of living, in private, and with those of his family, whether at home or at the Court of Queen Victoria, the member may as freely descant as his taste shall prompt, or the patience of others bear, without reply or heed from me. To Mr. Van Buren politically, and to his Administration, I am opposed upon other, and, I trust, higher grounds than those which are taken in the speech of the member—upon the broad grounds of constitutional principles, national interests, and the people's rights; and I shall continue that opposition until it shall end in the restoration of the supremacy of law and representative government over Executive usurpation and power.

Mr. Chairman, for the indulgence of the committee in their kind attention to what I have had to say, I pray leave to return my sincere thanks. For detaining them, after the fatigues of a long sitting, to so late an hour in the evening, I owe them an humble apology.

SPEECH OF MR. UNDERWOOD,

OF KENTUCKY.

In the House of Representatives, July 13, 1840—On the amendment proposed to the bill for the support of the army, appropriating $300,000 to carry on the military operations in Florida.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said that there were two things very remarkable growing out of the bill and amendment under consideration and the debate connected with them. The first was, the late period of the session when these subjects were brought up; and the second was, the character of the debate in criticizing the conduct of the officers of the army. He did not object to the criticisms which gentlemen had made. He regarded it the duty of members, when called on to vote the necessary supplies, to inquire whether they were likely to be managed by faithful and competent officers, and honestly applied to the objects intended. It was proper to look into past transactions, as they constitute the basis on which the judgment reposes in coming to its conclusions in regard to future operations; and if in the survey of the past we find that any one of our military commanders is deficient in skill or bravery, or in any respect unworthy of the station assigned him, it is certainly proper to expose his blunders and discountenance the idea of his further employment. But, in doing this, we should proceed with very great caution. We should remember that but few members of Congress were in fact military men, however they may have been honored with military titles. It had been facetiously said that we were all colonels or generals, and of course well qualified to decide the merits of military movements. However that may be, our constituents have reposed confidence in us; and, in conducting their affairs as the grand inquest of the nation, it is our duty to examine every thing, and then publish for their information and ultimate correction whatever abuses we may detect. There is no greater abuse than that of omitting to expose unfaithful or incompetent officers; and if members can detect glaring errors in the campaigns of our generals, or show that their conduct in a moral point of view has been such that they ought not to be trusted, it is their duty to do it. But, in the discharge of this delicate duty, there is every inducement to proceed with the utmost caution.

Those whom we assail are not here to defend themselves against our imputations; and that consideration will induce a man of honorable sentiments and elevated character not to attack the private or official reputation of any one unless upon the clearest convictions of duty.

The officers of our army, and especially the commanders of our forces in Florida, are charged with the performance of very arduous and responsible duties, involving the lives of thousands, and the protection of the property and firesides of tens of thousands. Like ourselves, the soldier feels the value of reputation, and is stimulated to noble achievements by the plaudits of his countrymen. Who among them would continue in the service for the mercenary consideration of pay and rations alone? If there be such a one, he will disgrace the epaulets upon his shoulders on the first occasion. Sir, the true soldier pours out his blood and gives his life for his country, because he is inspired by a love of glory and an ardent patriotism. Take these elevated sentiments from him, and he skulks from the field of battle, loses the enterprise and noble bearing of a hero, and contents himself with the sensualities of a brute. Sir, we shall be responsible for the ruin of the army if we degrade the character of our generals unjustly. No man of proper spirit will command your armies, if Congress or its members should endeavor to bring him into contempt. It is cruel to the individual, but for the sake of the nation I implore members not to strike at the reputation of our generals, unless they are certain that their charges are well founded.

Again, sir, the reputation of the country is to a great extent identified with our army and navy, and he who unjustly depreciates the character of the gallant men who fight our battles, detracts from the reputation of the Republic.

It is my purpose to submit some remarks in vindication of Gen. Jesup against charges which, on former occasions, as well as now, upon this floor and through the public prints, have been reiterated against him. Before doing so, however, I must say, that we exhibit to the country, and especially to the good people of Florida, a spectacle which I fear will be regarded as not very creditable to ourselves.

We are now within a week of the close of the session. We have been here more than seven months; we have been in a state of war with the Seminole Indians during the last five years; we have heard through the newspapers the imploring cries of women and children, calling for protection against the tomahawk and scalping knife, and yet we have postponed acting upon the measures proposed for the prosecution or the termination of the war, until we have but seven days left. Does this look like we were in any haste to stop the effusion of blood? Have our sensibilities been seared by a hot brand from the political furnace? Can we spend weeks in making electioneering speeches, and scarcely give one day to the consideration of the measures proper to be adopted with a view to close a murderous Indian war? Well may the gentleman from Florida [Mr. DOWNING] complain that the Territory he so ably represents has not received that consideration which the circumstances in which she is placed so imperatively require. Well may he suppose that, if she had votes to give in the next Presidential election, her situation would receive more prompt consideration. But, even when we take up the army bill, and it is proposed to appropriate $300,000 for the service in Florida and to discharge arrearages, how do we go into a consideration of the subject? Why, sir, instead of preparing to make war upon the Indians, we attack our own generals, and attempt to bring them and their operations into disgrace; and, in this war against our military commanders, General Jesup has been exposed to a full share of the hottest fire. Would that he were allowed to repel the assault in his own person. But he must remain silent. He has done all that was in his power to place his conduct fairly before his countrymen, but so far no opportunity has been afforded him to vindicate himself against repeated assaults. Sir, he authorized me to say to Congress, years ago, that he courted investigation by any committee that might be appointed to investigate his conduct in the campaigns against the Southern Indians, and I did in my place, on this floor, make known his willingness to meet such investigation. Since his return from Florida, he has asked a court of inquiry, but none has been ordered. Thus, whilst he has manifested a commendable anxiety to meet his accusers in any legitimate mode, no steps have been taken to organize a committee or a court of inquiry to ascertain the facts. His reputation is thus made to suffer, by attacks for political purposes, through a thousand channels, when, if the real truth was known, the country would perceive very little, if any thing in his conduct worthy of censure, and much to admire.

Gen. Jesup is no partisan in politics. I have often heard him say that he never gave a vote in his life, except on courts martial. He is a soldier, and the servant of his country, and does not interfere with the scrambles of politicians for civil offices. He is no brawler in applauding or condemning the measures of any Administration. If he expresses an opinion, it is modestly, yet firmly done; and as long and as intimately as I have known him, I have never detected the least disposition on his part to place any one in unfavorable or odious aspects in the eyes of others.

The two charges of most serious consequence to the reputation of Gen. Jesup are: first, that he intrigued for command, and with a view to supplant Gen. Scott in the confidence of the late President, Gen. Jackson; and, second, that he violated his own principles, so eloquently expressed in the letter read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BIDDLE,) disgraced himself, and tarnished the reputation of the country by making captives of Oceola and others who approached his camp under a flag of truce.

A plain tale will put down both charges.

On the 20th of May, 1836, the following general order issued, assigning Gen. Jesup to command in the Creek country:

GENERAL ORDERS, No. 32. ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE, Washington, May 20, 1836.

1. Brevet Major Gen. Thomas S. Jesup has been assigned by the President to duty according to his brevet rank, and to take command of the troops of the United States, and the militia that may be ordered and called into service, to suppress the hostilities of the Creek Indians. Gen. Jesup will accordingly proceed to Fort Mitchell, Alabama, and there assume command and the direction of affairs in that quarter.

2. The several departments of the staff will comply with such requisitions as Gen. Jesup may make upon them.

By order: R. JONES, Adjutant General.

At the date of this order, Gen. Scott was in command in Florida. Gen. Jesup left Washington city on the night of the 21st of May, in the steamboat; and so sudden was his departure, that I knew nothing of his intention to go, until after he was gone, although I was then a member of Congress, and in the city. I am confident that Gen. Jesup's departure for the Creek country could not have been long agitated previous to the date of the order, because my intimacy with him was such that he would have mentioned to me his intentions; and because I had been many years his agent for the transaction of business in Kentucky, some of which remained unsettled when he left, and about which he ought to have given me instructions before his departure; and which I believe he would have done, had he not been, unexpectedly to himself, ordered to the South. My ignorance, under these circumstances, of his being ordered to the South, until after he was gone, convinces me that he did not seek the service, and that his departure was the act of obedience to the commands of the President, suddenly given. But suppose he had sought active employment in the field, does his going to the Creek country show any disposition to interfere with Gen. Scott, then in Florida? The one might well have conducted operations against the Creeks, whilst the other led our forces against the Seminoles. There was no prospect of interference between them when General Jesup left Washington. But it is said that General Jesup poisoned the mind of General Jackson against General Scott, after the latter retired from Florida, and assumed the chief direction of the operations against the Creek Indians. The letter written by General Jesup to F. P. Blair is relied on as the evidence. It may be that that letter did increase General Jackson's distrust of General Scott's ability to conduct military operations against the enemy with success. But, sir, General Jackson's mind had been operated upon long before the Blair letter was written; and he had actually directed that an order should be issued commanding General Scott "to withdraw from the command in Florida;" which order was issued, bearing date the 1st of June, 1836, and may be found printed on page 476 of volume 3d of Executive Documents, of the 25th Congress, 2d session. This order of the President was founded on a letter addressed by Joseph M. White, the delegate from the Territory of Florida, to the President, bearing date the 28th of May, 1836, requesting that General Scott might be "immediately relieved from the command," and assigning reasons for the request not at all creditable to General Scott's military character. This letter may be found beginning on the same page of the same volume of Executive Documents. Justice to General Scott requires me to state that Mr. White subsequently explained or retracted the charges contained in this letter of the 28th of May, so far as the General's "military operations" were affected. A letter of Mr. White, dated 13th December, 1836, may be found on page 479 of the same volume of documents, in which he refers to a previous letter on the subject, printed in the Intelligencer. To show the true state of these letters, orders, &c. I will read to the committee a recent report made by the Adjutant General to General Macomb, at the request of General Jesup. It is as follows:

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE, Washington, February 12, 1840.

SIR: In compliance with the instructions of the Secretary of War, to report upon the subject of General Jesup's letter of the 7th instant, addressed to the honorable Secretary, requesting to be informed "whether Mr. White, late delegate from Florida, ever withdrew his letter (addressed to the President) asking for the recall of General Scott, and requesting an inquiry into his conduct; and, if so, what was the action of the Executive, if any, on the subject?" I have to state that all I know touching the matter of inquiry is the fact that the letter of the Hon. Mr. White, dated May 28, 1836, to the President of the United States, the same referred to by General Jesup, is now on file in the Adjutant General's office; that it was received there the 3d of June, 1836, and is endorsed by the President as follows; "A copy of this letter to be sent to General Scott, with an order to withdraw from the command in Florida. A. J."

By the endorsement made in the War Office, to wit, "See letter to Gen. Scott, June 1, 1836," it is presumed that a record of the same may be found on the books in the office of the Secretary of War.

I am, sir, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
R. JONES, Adjutant General.

Major General MACOMB.

Thus it is placed beyond all controversy that General Scott, in consequence of complaints made by Mr. White, was ordered to "withdraw," in the endorsement made by the President; or, in the more modest or less offensive language of the acting Secretary of War, C. A. Harris, in his letter of the 1st of June, 1836, told, "under these circumstances, the President deems it unnecessary for you to return to the command in Florida." General Jesup's letter to F. P. Blair was not written until the 20th June, 1836. When White's letter was written, General Jesup was on his road to assume the command in the Creek country, and could not possibly know any thing in regard to that letter, much less be the instigator of it. The conclusion from all the foregoing facts is irresistible, that General Jesup had nothing to do with any movement calculated to reflect discredit upon General Scott in consequence of his operations in Florida prior to the Blair letter.

Now, sir, I wish to exhibit the circumstances to this committee under which the Blair letter was written. I am much deceived if the documentary evidence I shall present does not establish a complete justification in the feelings of every honorable bosom for the contents of that letter. I would have addressed the letter, had I been in General Jesup's situation, directly to the President; but if the contents of a paper be justifiable, it is rather an immaterial issue to cavil about the channel of communication. I will not stop to harp upon that matter.

General Jesup issued orders to his army, regulating the position of the several corps and the line of march, on the 11th June, 1836, in the general order which follows:

ORDER, No. 3. HEAD QUARTERS, 2d ARMY CORPS, Tuskegee, June 11, 1836.

1. The army will march to-morrow morning at 7 o'clock, in three columns. The centre column will consist of the baggage train, the artillery, and a front and rear baggage guard. The right and left columns will be extended into file, and will each consist of three troops of mounted men, and two companies of infantry. Two troops of mounted men will lead each column, followed by two companies of infantry, and a troop of mounted men will complete the column in the rear.

2. Flankers will be detached from the troops and companies respectively to the right and left. The mounted men in front, with one company of infantry of each column, will constitute the first line in the order of battle, if the enemy appear in front; the remaining companies will form the rear line, or reserve.

3. Should an attack be made in the rear, one company of infantry of each column, with the mounted men in the rear, will form the line of battle; the remaining companies and troops will form the reserve. Should an attack be made on the right or left, those columns will respectively form the line of battle and the reserve.

4. The seventh troop will, until Capt. Young joins the army, form the advance, and the fifth company of infantry will form a covering party in the rear.

5. The mounted men will form in the centre or on the flanks in line of battle, according to the nature of the ground and the orders of the General.

6. A corps of pioneers will be formed as Maj. Gen. Patterson may direct.

7. Maj. Gen. Patterson will detach a company to garrison this post. Detailed instructions will be given to the captain by the acting adjutant general.

8. The Indian warriors under Gen. Woodward will march with the army until Opotheolo's warriors arrive, when they will be detached to join Gen. Scott. They will wear white scarfs on their left arms, and white bands around their heads. They will scour the country in front, in the rear, and on the flanks, and perform such other services as the General commanding may direct.

9. The officers and soldiers of the army are desired to treat the friendly chiefs and warriors with kindness and attention.

By command of Major General Jesup:
R. P. PARROTT, Acting Adj. Gen.

In sixteen days, hostilities with the Creek Indians were at an end. The skill and energy of Jesup had triumphed. The hostiles surrendered to him; and on the 27th June he addressed his army in the following general order:

HEAD-QUARTERS, SECOND ARMY CORPS, S. A.
Fort Mitchell, June 27, 1836.

1. The Major General Commanding congratulates the troops under his command upon the success which has attended their operations during the present campaign. Though no brilliant action has been achieved, peace and security have been restored to the country. The Major General, in the course of twenty-eight years' service, has commanded every variety of troops, and in every possible situation incident to peace and war, and he can say with truth, and he says it with pride and pleasure, that he has never seen any body of men animated by a more admirable spirit than the volunteers which he commands. Called suddenly from the comforts and endearments of home to the defence of a bleeding frontier, they put off the character of the citizen and assumed that of the soldier, with a promptitude worthy of veterans; and they have submitted to the privations, exposure, and fatigue of a rapid and difficult march through a wilderness occupied by a savage foe, under the most trying circumstances, with a cheerfulness, alacrity, and gallantry, which proves that they left their homes determined to do their duty. They have performed their duty in the best possible manner, and deserve the gratitude of their country. In the name of that country, the Major General thanks them; and for himself he begs Major General Patterson and the officers and soldiers of his command, to accept his grateful acknowledgments for the kind and liberal support which they have on all occasions accorded to him.

2. Major General Patterson will move his command, by easy marches, to Long's, where he will encamp and await orders. Subsistence and forage will be drawn from the depot at Tuskegee.

By command of Major General Jesup:
R. P. PARROTT, Acting Adj. General.

General Jesup commenced his march from Tuskegee, on the waters of the Tallapoosa river, in Alabama, and marched through the wilderness in the direction of Fort Mitchell, on the Chattahoochee, in the neighborhood of which place General Scott was operating. His headquarters were at Columbus, Georgia, about ten miles above Fort Mitchell, and on the opposite side of the river.

Under date of the 15th of June, General Jesup commenced a letter to General Scott, which was not finished before the 16th, at the "Big Spring," within fourteen miles of Fort Mitchell. In this letter General Jesup tells General Scott that a detachment of Indian warriors had captured Nehomico (Enea Mathla) and his son on the evening of the 15th; that they were then prisoners in his camp and that he should move on Mehomico's (Ena Mathla's) camp the next day, to wit, the 17th. The concluding paragraph of the letter says: "If I should not obtain supplies at Nehomico's (Enea Mathla's) camp, I shall probably be compelled to fall back on Fort Mitchell, or to a position near it."

On the 17th General Jesup wrote a short note to General

Columbus, (Ga.) June 17, 1836.

SIR: I have this moment received your two letters of the 15th and 17th inst. I am infinitely astonished and distressed to hear of your near approach, and in a starving condition, to Fort Mitchell. You knew that your forces were not wanted there. Scott, in the following words:

"GENERAL: I find that we have less than two days' rations, in addition to two days' rations in the hands of the men. Whether successful or not against the force of Neho Emathla, I shall be compelled to go to Fort Mitchell. Can you give us provisions and corn there? By all means do so. I have an Indian force which will enable you to drive the whole country.

Yours, THOS. S. JESUP.

General SCOTT, Columbus."

Up to the writing of this letter, there is not a letter or syllable to be found evidencing the slightest want of respect on the part of General Jesup to his superior in rank, General Scott.

Now, sir, let me call your attention to a letter of General Scott, in reply to those of the 15th and 17th from General Jesup. It is in these words:

"I am informed that, through mistake, the document I consulted has the name of Nehomico in print, when it should have been Enea Mathla.

You knew that no supplies could reach Irwinton from New Orleans earlier than the 21st instant, if so soon; and you knew, by my letter of the 10th, that nothing had arrived as high as Hawkinsville, upon the Ockmulgee, and, consequently, nothing could have reached this place by the present date from that river. I also ought to add, that you knew, when you left here, that the troops, daily increasing, were living from hand to mouth on the precarious supplies of the neighborhood. Under these circumstances, imagine my astonishment to learn that, instead of marching the disposable force of Alabama upon Irwinton, with subsistence for at least ten or five days in advance, to hear that you had come through the heart of the Indian country, seeking private adventures, which, if successful, could hardly have advanced the war, and against my known plan of operations, to Fort Mitchell, forty-five miles out of position! It is precisely General Gaines's movement upon Fort King, where there was no subsistence; and there is none, as you ought to have known, at Fort Mitchell. My grief and distress are at the r utmost height. This strange movement you have made without giving me the slightest notice. Yot had not informed me—you do not even now tell me that you are in command of the Alabamians; and your last letter, of the 8th instant, stated that it was doubtful whether you would ever be invested with that command All this is infinitely strange, and was the last thing in the world that was expected from you.

Well, to prevent starvation, I have called for the Quartermaster and Commissary, and demanded of them what rations and forage they could supply. Lieutenant Waite, the Quartermaster, has, with great difficulty, provided some corn for my movement at the head of the Georgians, on the 21st or 22d; and Lieut. McCrabb has just nearly exhausted the market to obtain two or three days' rations for the troops already at Fort Mitchell. At the risk of starving the troops on the river, (the Georgians and regulars,) I have ordered the Quartermaster to send you five hundred bus nels of corn, and the Commissary to move heaven and earth to send two or three days' subsistence for the troops brought with you. To prevent, however, all further erratic movements, I desire you to encamp your forces somewhere in the neighborhood of Fort Mitchell till further orders, or until I can see you. We will keep your forces, and those previously on the river, from starving, if possible, till the arrival of the Ockmulgee supplies, which, I suppose, will precede those from New Orleans by some days.

The first, and one of the worst effects of your arrival will be to prevent a movement of the Georgians and regulars as early as I intended; the former have pushed their impatience for active operations almost to a state of mutiny; a result which I may not be able to prevent, if they should learn that the arrival of the Alabamians is to hold them in a state of inglorious inactivity many days longer.

I wrote to you yesterday, and despatched the letter by a runner from Fort Mitchell. I shall endeavor to visit Fort Mitchell to-morrow or the next day.

Though in grief, I still remain yours, with great regard,

WINFIELD SCOTT

Maj. Gen. T. S. JESUP,
United States Army, Commanding, &c.

P. S. Some wagons with subsistence are despatched to-night, but cannot arrive, I learn from Mr. Waite, till to-morrow morning. Some corn (250 or 300 bushels) will be down by 10 o'clock to-morrow in the boat. W. S.

I ask you, sir, if a more unprovoked and insulting letter was ever written by a commander-in chief to a subordinate officer? "I am infinitely astonished and distressed to hear of your near approach, in a starving condition, to Fort Mitchell!" Very little like starvation, when each man had two days' rations in hand, and nearly as much more in store. "You knew this," "you knew that," "you knew the other thing;" and, with all this knowledge, you "have come through the heart of the Indian country, seeking private adventures, which, if successful, could hardly have advanced the war, and against my known plan of operations, to Fort Mitchell, forty-five miles out of position." Well, sir, I am glad to find my friend "out of position," "in the heart of the Indian country." When a General is to fight Indians, he can do nothing better than to march right through the heart of their country. If he wants a fight, he is very apt to find one by t king that course. I admire such "private adventures." They generally, as in this instance with Jesup, turn out public blessings. "To prevent, however, all further erratic movements, I desire you to encamp your forces somewhere in the neighborhood of Fort Mitchell, till further orders, or until I can see you." Notwithstanding this order, Jesup went on, I believe, with his "erratic movements" until the hostiles surrendered, and the war was at an end. He may have been amenable to a court martial for disobedience; but I am well assured that he had come to the determination to sacrifice himself sooner than see the interests of the country sacrificed. In doing this, he had to select between degradation and infamy, in case of failure, on the one hand, and the prospect of forgiveness, in case of success, on the other. It requires the highest moral courage to act between such alternatives. Jesup has it. He had seen the necessity for its exercise when a stripling at the surrender of Hull; and, secure in the approbation of his own conscience, he selected between the possible loss of his commission and the interests of his country. He was eminently successful; I have faith in the purity of his motives; and therefore I call on his countrymen to forgive him for not encamping his army and waiting for "further orders." Had Gen. Scott been present, Jesup would not mutinously have refused obedience; but, as Gen. Scott's headquarters were at Columbus, Jesup kept his army in motion until his objects were accomplished.

But, sir, I am not done with the correspondence between these distinguished Generals, which led to the Blair letter. On the 17th June, General Jesup wrote to General Scott as follows:

HEADQUARTERS, SECOND ARMY CORPS,
Camp on waters of the Hatchychubby,
June 17, 1836.

GENERAL: I have this instant received your letter of yesterday. I regret that my operations have met your disapprobation; but they were commenced, and have been continued, for the purpose of staying the tomahawk and scalping-knife, and preventing the devastation of entire settlements or neighborhoods on the frontier; they have had the effect of tranquillizing, in some measure, the frontier people, and of inducing them to remain at their homes. I regret the censure implied in your remarks, because it is unmerited. I acted in accordance with what I believed to be the spirit of your instructions; but, even were my conduct in direct opposition to your instructions, given at a former period, the altered circumstances of the country are, I should think, a full justification. I consider it so; for I have none of that courage that would enable me to remain inactive when women and children are daily falling beneath the blows of the savage. Writing in the open field, while I am interrupted every moment by matters of detail of every kind, even to the placing of a wagon, I cannot now explain the remarks in my letter which you have considered so "enigmatical," further than to say, in justice to Governor Clay, that he made no opposition to my assuming command, but made every effort to sustain me; and to add that, if successful in my present operations, I shall owe much of that success to his able arrangements. The troops, or rather a part of them, were opposed, not to me personally, but to any officer of the United States taking command of them; and I would take command of militia and volunteers on no other terms than their consent. I would resign my commission first.

I am now within five miles of Enea Mathla's camp, with twelve companies of volunteers and four or five hundred Indian warriors; eleven hundred warriors, under Opotheola, will join to-night, and perhaps five hundred volunteers from Alabama. made such arrangements for the defence of the settlements in my rear that I feel assured of their entire security. I would have struck the enemy to-night but for your letter. If he is not struck to-morrow morning, he will escape for the present; but the force I have in the field is sufficient to pursue and reduce him

With every disposition to perform their duty, the volunteers and militia are necessarily extremely irregular in their returns, &c. I am not, therefore, able to send you a return in form of the force under my command.

I am, sir, respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
THOS. S. JESUP, Major General.

Major General SCOTT,
Commanding Southern Army, Columbus, Ga.

This letter is in reply to one written by General Scott the day before, which may be found at page 516 of document No. 78, in 3d volume of Executive Documents for 3d session of 25th Congress.

Those who take the trouble to read Gen. Scott's letter of the 16th of June will find it in tone and manner scarcely less exceptionable than that of the 17th of June, already read at large. In Jesup's letter, he tells his commander in-chief that he regrets his censure, because it was unmerited; that he acted in accordance with what he believed to be the spirit of his instructions; but, even if in opposition, he relied on the altered circumstances of the country as a full justification; and that he had none of that courage which would allow him to remain inactive when women and children are daily falling beneath the blows of the savage He also says: "I am now within five miles of Enea Mathla's camp," &c. "I would have struck the enemy to-night but for your letter. If he is not struck to-morrow morning, he will escape for the present; but the force I have in the field is sufficient to pursue and reduce him."

On the 19th June, General Jesup replies to Gen. Scott's letter of the 17th, in the following manner:

FORT MITCHELL, June 19, 1836.

SIR: I came here with your express, and an escort of an officer and two mounted men, expecting to meet you. I have halted the army under my command on the Irwinton road, below the road to this place. In reply to that part of your letter upbraiding me for asking a small supply of subsistence and forage for the troops and horses of my corps, I owe it to myself to say that I knew supplies ought to arrive from New Orleans before I should want them; and, to show that my calculation was correct, I have to inform you that a steamboat is here from New Orleans with supplies. I have ordered eight days' rations for my command. I took yesterday, from the neighborhood of the hostile camp, upwards of a hundred head of cattle; and, as I had a good supply of rice, I could have reached Irwinton without any supply from this place, had I been permitted to proceed. You have treated me with a degree of harshness which is cruel in the extreme. You charge me with deranging your plan of campaign. I understood one part of that plan to be the protection of the frontier settlements of Alabama. I may have failed in judgment as to the proper mode of protecting it; but give me leave to say the course I adopted has been successful; that frontier is now secure. I have upwards of twelve hundred Indian warriors in my camp. They will not remain inactive. What shall I do with them? Shall I dismiss or retain them, and employ them in scouring the swamps?

You charge me with not communicating with you, and giving you information on several points With the duties I have had to perform, that was impossible. My occupation has been so incessant that I have not averaged three hours' sleep in the twenty-four for two weeks. I have kept you apprised of every thing important to be known. As to the reasons for my own acts, or those of others, I had not thought it necessary to say any thing. You knew me; and, from the perfect candor and fairness with which I have acted towards you, and the efforts I made to sustain you, both with the G orgians and Alabamians, I had a right to expect different treatment from you. Under the circumstances, the harshness with which you have treated me is the extreme of cruelty. That matters not at this time; we have important duties to perform. If you will move to-day, General, with your disposable force, we can end the war before to-morrow night. Captain Page will give you important information. I am not ambitious of the honors of Indian warfare. I am content that the whole of them shall be yours; but let me entreat you to act promptly. I can prevent the escape of the enemy on this side of the country; and, if you attack them in front, they are yours If you hesitate, you are lost. I felt resentment this morning; I feel it no longer. By our former friendship, let me entreat you again to act promptly.

Yours truly, THOS. S. JESUP.

Major General W. SCOTT,
Commanding Southern Army, Columbus, Georgia.

P. S. Let me have two or three companies of regular troops, if you decide to attack these Indians. Page will tell you where they are.

In this letter we see, sir, that General Jesup did not know "that no supplies could reach Irwinton," &c. as was charged. He actually finds a steamboat with supplies at Fort Mitchell the day he wrote, and on the day before he took more than a hundred head of cattle from the Indians. No great danger, I should think, of being in a "starving condition!" In this letter, General Jesup modestly vindicates himself, and tells General Scott, "the harshness with which you have treated me is the extreme of cruelty. That matters not at this time. We have important duties to perform. If you will move to-day, General, with your disposable force, we can end the war before to-morrow night." "If you hesitate, you are lost. I felt resentment this morning; I feel it no longer. By our former friendship, let me entreat you again to act promptly." In this same letter Jesup says to Scott, "I am not ambitious of the honors of Indian warfare. I am content that the whole of them shall be yours," &c. I would ask if it be possible to manifest a stronger desire to put aside a bickering, criminating correspondence, and to unite in the service of the country, than is exhibited in this letter? Well, sir, let us see how it was met by General Scott. He replies to General Jesup's letter of the 17th, under date of the 19th, and, whilst he was writing, he received General Jesup's letter of the 19th, and goes on with a reply to that likewise. Here is his answer:

HEAD QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE SOUTH,
Columbus, Georgia, June 19, 1836.

SIR: In your first letter of the 17th instant, you tell me that you will be compelled to go to Fort Mitchell; and, according to an intimation in my reply to you of same date, I went down yesterday, with great inconvenience, not doubting that I should meet you or hear of you in the immediate vicinity of that place. The only news received of you there was a rumor representing you to be on the return march to Tuskegee, which I could not credit, under the positive declaration in your letter of the 17th, quoted above; and Captain Page reported that he had, a few hours before, forwarded a despatch to Columbus from you to me.

Besides some rations sent down the night before in wagons, the steamboat in which I was a passenger took down a further supply of subsistence, and some corn, all for the use of your troops, and in conformity with your requests of the 15th and 17th instant.

On my return to Columbus, late last evening, I received your second of the 17th instant. This is fully as strange as any of your previous communications. In it you repeat nothing of your previous intention of marching upon Fort Mitchell; but you take care to insert two or three topics which would furnish a good basis for a popular appeal against the hardships imposed on you of undertaking no system of offensive operations without my previous concurrence and readiness to act in concert with you. It would seem to be for this purpose—I can imagine no other—that you tell me that your operations have been "commenced, and have been continued, for the purpose of staying the tomahawk and scalping-knife, and preventing the devastation of entire settlements or neighborhoods on the frontier." Nothing, certainly, could be more meritorious. The direct protection of the Alabama settlements was within your competency, and, indeed, among your paramount duties. But why commence a grand system of offensive operations, which has brought you out on this side of the Creek nation, at a point where I did not want you, without giving me the slightest intimation that you were about to commence, and, of course, without waiting for my approbation and co-operation? To have waited for such co operation, and to have given me notice of your intended movements, were, allow me to say, also among your paramount duties.

Your next popular flourish is in these words: "I have none of that courage that would enable me to remain inactive when women and children are daily falling beneath the blows of the savage." I certainly believe that you have not—and there was not the slightest objection, in any quarter, to your protecting the women and children of the frontier, with the defence of which you were directly charged. Again, nothing could have been more praiseworthy; but how does this excuse your leaving those women and children, and, instead of marching upon Irwinton, where you were required, marching in hostile array, seeking battles, upon Fort Mitchell, where you were neither expected nor wanted?

On the subject of the Alabama frontier settlements, I am happy to learn, by your letter, that you made such arrangements for their safety as to leave you assured on that point.

The last point you make, as if it were for future use against me, is this: "I would have struck the enemy to-night, but for your letter. If he is not struck to-morrow morning, he will escape for the present. But the force I have in the field is sufficient to pursue and reduce him." Here I am made to deprive you and the country of a great imaginary victory. I say imaginary, for I am inclined to think that you are, on this occasion, a little too sanguine in your calculations. But the true answer is this: Who gave you authority to roam at pleasure through the Creek nation, at the head of the Alabamians, and a body of friendly Indians, without giving notice to, and without concert with, the Georgians and regulars brought to this frontier for the same war, and at an enormous expense to the Government? Besides, from the position occupied by you, you are forced to operate down the country, instead of getting below the enemy and operating up. This precisely inverts what you know to be my plan of the campaign—a plan fully developed in conversation with you, and to which you did not in the least object, although you were invited to discuss it freely.

Whilst writing the above, I received your letter of this date, written at Fort Mitchell. You charge me with harshness. I have, certainly, in previous letters, complained heavily of you, as in the beginning of this, and have, in every instance, I think, given the grounds of those complaints. The facts stated by me, I think, bear the construction that I have placed upon them; and I have infinitely regretted the existence of these facts.

You are mistaken in supposing that I upbraided you for asking for small supplies of rations and forage for your troops. I regretted the scarcity of our resources in such supplies, and apprehended a scarcity bordering on starvation for a few days. Fortunately, eighty thousand rations have arrived at Fort Mitchell, and about twenty thousand here, which, yesterday, we e not expected earlier than the 22d instant, perhaps the 23d instant; and I am confident, when here, that we both, by calculation, did not expect any thing from New Orleans before the 21st or 22d. I am rejoiced, as much on your account as my own, that we both have an abundant supply of rations for the present; and we know that one hundred and fifty thousand more will soon follow. I have ordered twelve thousand to be landed from the steamboat at Fort Mitchell, intending to distribute the remainder of that cargo among the posts below, for the ben fit of all the troops in the field equally.

General, in haste, I have not intended to say any thing to injure you. I have shown, in strong terms, the construction I may appear harsh. But, on the other hand, allow me to say that I have the greatest and undiminished confidence in your honor, your intelligence, gallantry, and capacity for war. You use the word friendship. I have cherished for you, for more than twenty-two years, a warm and sincere affection, which I would not part with on any consideration. It has been a little shaken since I saw you; but, one expression in your letter goes far to recall it. I think you have not been attentive to my plans and instructions. In this I certainly think you have erred, and also in your failure to report fully to me. Throwing, for a moment, seniority aside, I ask it of your ancient connection with me to be more careful in those particulars in future. It will give me sincere delight to put down this war with you, and to give you all the fame which I know you are so capable of winning.

I presume that you have approached a little nearer to Fort Mitchell for the convenience of obtaining supplies. Some corn has been sent thither for your use, and I understand eight hundred or a thousand bushels may be had at a plantation below.

I shall not detain you in a state of inactivity many days. The arms, and some ammunition, must reach the place to-morrow, and the troops will march down, on the Georgia side, to place themselves below the enemy on the 22d. I think we shall cross the river about the mouth of the Cow-ag-gee. It is said there are no Indians below. I wish you could come into line with me there; but, as that cannot well be, without crossing you over to the Georgia side, and thence recrossing the river, I shall wish you to act downwards, as soon as the Georgians are in position to march in the opposite direction. More particular instructions you will receive from me, on this point, in a day or two. In the mean time, I wish you to send a force to the foot of the Uchee shoals, (which, I understand, is just about a mile above the creek of the same name,) in order to construct at that place a shed, closed at the ends and sides, capable of receiving and sheltering (say) one hundred thousand rations, with about five thousand bushels of corn. The lumber, (boards and scantling,) as also nails, shall be shipped from this place to-morrow or the next day. The number of men to be sent for this purpose, and to remain as a guard, you will please designate. Axes, spades, saws, and hammers, shall also be sent to the spot by Tuesday evening. A field work, of slight construction, will no doubt be necessary for the guard; and you will give instructions accordingly.

I shall have to leave not less than fifteen hundred Georgians to guard the left bank of the river. The Alabamians may protect the depot at the foot of the Uchee shoals.

You shall hear from me again, probably to-morrow. Let me have a report from you on the above subjects, and suggestions as many as you please.

With renewed regard, I remain with great respect, your most obedient servant,

WINFIELD SCOTT.

Major General T. S. JESUP,
Commanding Division Army of the South.

Now, sir, in this letter, Jesup is told that his letter of the 17th is "as strange as any" before written; that he is making "popular flourishes" and "dead points" for future use against his superior commander; and that the "facts stated by him" (Scott) justified his "complaints." The subsequent part of the letter expressly acknowledges that his "affection," cherished for more than twenty years, has been "a little shaken." And although there was "one expression in your (Jesup's) letter (which) goes far to recall it," yet there is no open acknowledgment of cordial reconciliation. It is manifest that a lurking suspicion still rankled in the heart. But what does the letter say relative to future operations? What response does it give to the recommendation of Jesup to move his army, and "end the war before to-morrow night?" Hear him! "I shall not detain you in a state of inactivity many days. The arms and some ammunition must reach this place to-morrow," &c. "I think we shall cross the river about the mouth of the Cowaggee" Still uncertain at what point he would cross! "More particular instructions you will receive from me on this point in a day or two." "In the mean time I wish you to send a force, &c. to construct a shed capable of receiving and sheltering (say) one hundred thousand rations, with about five thousand bushels of corn!!!" "You shall hear from me probably to-morrow!" Well, sir, Jesup could stand it no longer; he preferred attacking the Indians to building "sheds" and longer delay. On the 20th he reported to his commander, as he was ordered to do, and, in the conclusion of that report, stated to him: "As I was placed on this service by the express order of the President, I shall apply to him to be relieved, and shall demand a court of inquiry." And on the same day he wrote a letter to F. P. Blair, which has travelled the rounds in every newspaper, and which being laid before Gen. Jackson, he immediately ordered the recall of General Scott, and invested Gen. Jesup with the command.

I have thus given the correspondence which led to the Blair letter; and it seems to me, sir, that no one can read it without saying that there is an entire absence of every thing like intrigue on the part of Jesup, and that he was forced to write as he did, "to be relieved" from the goading censures, if not the official insolence, of superior rank.

After General Jesup had terminated the Creek war, he was placed in command of the Florida army. This was not done, however, until the 4th of November, 1836, when the following order was given him by the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Nov. 4, 1836.

SIR: Before this communication reaches you, you will have become fully acquainted with the retrograde movements of Gov. Call, and the other events connected therewith, which have recently occurred in Florida. These circumstances have, for a time, suspended offensive operations; and, from the feeble state of Gov. Call's health, it is to be feared he will not be able to prosecute the campaign, when resumed, with that promptitude and energy which the crisis demands. The President has, therefore, determined to commit to you the command of the army serving in Florida, and the general direction of the war against the Seminoles.

You will accordingly, on the receipt of this communication, should you then be at Gov. Call's headquarters, (and if not, so soon as you can reach there, or can communicate with him,) assume the command of all the forces in the Territory.

The hostile Indians having been discovered in considerable force on the banks of the Withlacoochie, and it having been also ascertained that their principal camps and settlements are situated on the south side of that river, you will immediately make all suitable arrangements for a vigorous attack upon their strongholds, and for penetrating and occupying the whole country between the Withlacoochie and Tampa Bay. With a view to this end, you will first establish posts at or near the mouth of the Withlacoochie, at Fort King, and at Volusia, and you will take the proper measures for securing, through them, the safety of the frontier. You will also, through the same posts, and by such means of transportation as may be most certain and economical, make permanent arrangements for procuring sufficient and regular supplies. So soon as those dispositions shall be completed, you will concentrate all your disposable forces, and proceed, without delay, to cross the Withlacoochie, and to possess yourself of the positions now occupied by the Indians, attacking and routing them in their strongholds, and scouring the whole country between the Withlacoochie and Tampa Bay.

Should you succeed in bringing the Indians to a general engagement, and in defeating them therein, the ready submission of the tribe may probably be expected. If, however, they should abandon their present position on the Withlacoochie before you reach it, or you should drive them from it without entirely subduing them, you will then take such advanced positions towards the south of Volusia, and to the east and south of Tampa Bay, as the nature of the country may admit, and push from them such further operations as may be necessary to the most speedy and effectual subjugation of the enemy.

The above direction to attack the enemy in his strongholds, and to possess yourself of the country between the Withlacoochie and Tampa Bay, you will regard as a positive order, to be executed at the earliest practicable moment. In other respects, you will exercise a sound discretion, and will adopt such measures as you may deem best calculated to protect the frontiers, and to effect the subjugation and removal of the Indians.

Great confidence being reposed in your prudence, energy, and skill, it is deemed unnecessary to urge you to promptitude or activity, or to impress on you the importance of early and frequent communications. B. F. BUTLER.

Major Gen. THOS. S. JESUP, U. S. Army, Florida.

No one can examine the documents, without being convinced that General Jesup did not get into Florida as an intriguer for command. Having traced him there, I shall now notice the charge of his having violated the white flag, and committed an act of treachery in the capture of Powell, or Oceola.

In March, 1837, the Seminoles, by a treaty made with Gen. Jesup, at Fort Dade, capitulated. The nation was represented in this treaty by Micanopy, their king or principal chief. In August following, at Fort King, Gen. Jesup had a conference with Coehadjo and other chiefs, and there told them that they must not attempt to come in unless they were prepared to fulfil the treaty and go west of the Mississippi, for he would hold no more "talks" with them. The Indians suggested that, if they came in with a view to go West, they might be fired upon by Jesup's men. To prevent this, Jesup gave them muslin with which to make white flags, and told them to hoist such flags, and they should not be fired upon. With these flags Coehadjo, Oceola, and others, came in. Oceola was worn down and sick, and died not long after he came in. Coehadjo was afterwards sent after his people, all of whom did not come in with him, and they removed west of the Mississippi. Gen. Jesup received information that Oceola and his associates, who then came in, intended to deceive; and that their motives were probably hostile, and that they did not intend in good faith to fulfil their engagements. Under this information they were seized and confined, and this is the whole of the matter about which so much clamor has been made. Sir, these Indians had no right to use the flags which had been given them for any other purpose than that stipulated; and if they came in as spies or for hostile purposes, as Gen. Jesup was informed and believed, the violation of faith, the act of treachery, was on their side, not on Jesup's. Permitting Coehadjo afterwards to go at large and bring in his people, is conclusive evidence that there was no disposition on the part of Jesup to violate a flag, or to confine those whom he had taken, on being satisfied, that they were acting in good faith.

Did Oceola come under his flag to negotiate peace, or to exchange prisoners, or to do any other business usually transacted by the commanders of hostile armies under a flag of truce? No, sir; he, through Coehadjo, was no doubt informed that there was to be no more negotiation, and that when they used the flag, it must be done for the purpose only of securing their safety in coming in to emigrate. I will not detain the committee by detailing the various acts of Indian treachery in disregarding their capitulation, disregarding their parole, and inducing their hostages to fly from our custody, in consequence of all which, by the rules of civilized warfare, Jesup might legitimately have sacrificed the lives of his prisoners, instead of simply confining them with a view to make them perform their engagements. I only allude to these things to show that, when the whole are taken in connection, there is ample ground to justify the conduct of Gen. Jesup. But does any, here or elsewhere, inquire into these things? Do his assailants seek for the truth? If they do, why not raise a committee to investigate all the incidents of the Florida war? Why not get up a court martial? Jesup will no more shrink from either tribunal than he did from the fire of the enemy at Chippeway or Bridgewater.

Mr. Chairman, it is extreme cruelty to the officers of the army to attack them here before taking the proof. Raise your committee, ascertain the facts, and then, if they have disgraced themselves or their country, handle them as roughly as you please; but I beseech gentlemen not to strike at random for political and party purposes. I beg them not to aim a blow at the Administration by calumniating the officers of the army. They only help the Administration when they assault the reputations of officers who are unassailable.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. MONROE) seems to think that General Jesup is indebted to General Scott for the laurels he won during the last war. I would sooner undertake to prove the converse of the proposition. Sir, my object is to defend Jesup, who has, I think, been greatly wronged, and not to assail Scott. But if the gentleman from New York will take the trouble of looking into the official reports of the battles of Chippeway and Bridgewater, he will find that Jesup acquired imperishable renown, not by merely obeying the orders of General Scott but by originating and executing, in the most brilliant manner, movements which conduced as much as any others to win for our arms those glorious victories. It is true that General Scott assigned to General Jesup (then a major in rank) his post in the battle of Chippeway; but the order to "support arms and advance" which Jesup's men executed in the face of a tremendous fire from the enemy, the repulse of the enemy's right wing, and the attack of his right flank, was all the work of Jesup and and the brave 25th, and gave the first evidence that the victory was ours. In the battle of Bridgewarer, the brave 25th, with Jesup at their head, was "thrown to the right, to be governed by circumstances." Never did commander use his discretion more for his own fame or the glory of his country than Jesup did on that day. General Brown, in the official report, says of him, "He had succeeded in turning the enemy's flank, had captured (by a detachment under Captain Kechum) General Riall and sundry other officers, and showed himself again to his army in a blaze of fire which defeated or destroyed a very superior force of the enemy." Yes, sir, in that "blaze of fire," two horses were shot under him, and four balls penetrated his body, and yet he remained on the field of battle, giving orders, until the work was complete.

The gentleman from New York seems to think that General Jesup has encountered but little personal risk or danger, except when he was serving under General Scott. Not so, sir; General Jesup has, on many occasions, gallantly presented himself to the enemy, when he was not acting under the orders of General Scott. When a lieutenant under General Hull, he acted as adjutant general, and, in the discharge of his duties, was much exposed to the cannonade of the enemy across the river Detroit, prior to Hull's surrender. Yes, sir, and at Detroit he conceived and would have executed, had General Hull permitted, a daring enterprise, which in all probability would have saved his commander from his disgraceful surrender. He proposed to cross the river, attack and capture the enemy's battery before the main army could relieve it. After his exchange, he was placed in command at Cleveland, and there superintended the building of the boats which afterwards transported Gen. Harrison's army to Canada. He went with Gen. Harrison, and was the first who landed on the shore of the enemy from the boats he had built. He was at the Thames with General Harrison. He was then transferred with his men to the Niagara frontier, and placed in Scott's brigade, and whilst that brigade brought on most of the important battles fought on that frontier, Jesup's regiment was at least equal to any other in rendering service. He received the enemy's fire at Fort Erie on the 3d July, 1814, when that post surrendered. On the 17th September, 1814, he was placed in command of the reserve at Fort Erie, when General Brown's sortie was made; three of his wounds yet unhealed, and his arm in a sling. His situation would have excused him from this service, had he asked it; but he sought the post of danger and of honor. He was afterwards with General Izard at the cannonading across the Chippeway river. Well might he say, after these services, "I am not ambitious of the honors of Indian warfare."

But, sir, Gen. Jesup has acquired honor in his campaigns in the Creek and Florida wars, the honor of doing his duty, and accomplishing all that he could to carry into effect the objects of the Government. The soldier has nothing to do with the policy of the Government, nor is he responsible for it. His duty consists in conquering the enemies of his country, whether they have been made enemies properly or improperly. In quelling disturbances with the Creeks, General Jesup met with entire success; and although he has not caught and sent out of Florida all the Seminoles, still, sir, he has caught and sent away more than any other General, if not more than all the rest put together. He has killed, captured, and sent off 2,383 altogether, of whom more than 700 were fighting men. Look at the results of his operations, judge him by what he has accomplished, and his friends may justly claim for him an exemption from reproach, although they do not boast of his victories over Indians in general engagements. It has not been his fault that he could not find a skulking enemy. He spread his troops over five degrees of latitude. He made battle wherever he could find the foe. He poured out his blood on the scorching plains of Florida, as he had done in Canada. Meet General Jesup, and shake hands with him, and you grasp a hand mutilated in the service of his country. Look him in the face, and you see the the scar of an Indian bullet. Sir, he has been upon more bloody fields, and received more wounds in battle, than any of your generals; and these wounds are trumpet-tongued, crying shame! shame! upon those who assail his character without knowing the facts, or, knowing, disregard them.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE,] in the course of this debate, has read various parts of the correspondence between General Jesup and the Secretary of War, in the course of which correspondence, he supposes, General Jesup browbeats the Secretary, and even insults Congress. General Jesup, like most soldiers, speaks plainly and directly to the point; but in the language used I cannot perceive any intention to insult or defy the authority of Congress, or to overawe or contemn the authority of the Secretary of War. Certainly the General has not spoken of us and our doings in any thing like as harsh terms as we are in the habit of hearing applied by members on this floor to each other, and to our public acts. I certainly should not commend him for following our example; but I must say it is a hard rule which tolerates us in saying what we please of the officers of the army, whilst they are required to submit to the gag in respect to us. Some allowance should be made for the circumstances under which General Jesup wrote, even if he had used harsh expressions. His incessant engagement, his loss of sleep, his fatigue and exposure, must have placed him in a condition in which he would not be much inclined to study phraseology, or to deal in compliments. Even if his letters do contain rough or hasty expressions, inserted under the impulses of the moment, I cannot look upon them as unpardonable sins.

But what has General Jesup said? Why, that he thinks Congress has got us into the Florida war, and must make heavy appropriations to get us out of it; and that Congress ought not to have disbanded or reduced the army in 1818. Well, sir, there are many, very many, of General Jesup's opinion. We all know that we have made appropriations to get out of the war, amounting to twenty millions, or near it; and the amendment now under consideration, is to appropriate $300,000 more to carry it on. We also know that a large portion of this enormous expense has been incurred in taking armies of militia and volunteers to and from the scene of active operations, and might have been saved by a regular army, kept constantly in the field. I can readily perceive in these considerations, in connection with the attachment which General Jesup naturally must feel for the regular army, growing out of past associations, reasons which induced him to think it was bad policy in Congress to reduce the army. I also see the force of these reasons; but although I acknowledge their force, I think Congress was right in reducing the army. I am opposed to large standing armies in time of peace; and, in time of war, I admire the practice of beating up for volunteers among the citizens. I wish the people to cherish the idea that every man is a soldier, and will fight the battles of his country, when required. As long as that idea is cherished and acted upon, the nation will be able to defend itself against all assaults, foreign and domestic. But just as sure as we depend alone on standing armies to fight our battles, whenever it is understood that citizens cannot fight, we shall invite aggressions, and pusillanimously surrender our liberties into the hands of a despot at the head of a standing army. In time of war, I am in favor of the citizen shouldering his musket, and when the war is over, letting him return to his shop or his plough.

I have understood that, in consequence of the reduction of the standing army, it became necessary to withdraw two regiments which had been stationed in Florida and the Southern States, and to transfer them to the Northeast; and that it was the withdrawal of these troops, and the consequent inability of the Government to strike a decisive blow at the first hostile indication, which, in the opinion of General Jesup, operated with other causes to produce hostilities. He thought that the Indians would not have taken up arms in the face of a regular force capable of immediate action. Whether the reduction of the regular army, and the transfer of the Southern regiments, had any influence upon the minds of the Indians or not, it is very certain, I think, that the conduct of the President and Congress had a powerful influence in producing the Florida war. I will state the facts which the records prove; and after you have heard them, sir, I venture to predict that you will say General Jesup was at least half right, if not entirely so, in his statements on the subject.

In 1823, the Government made a treaty with the Florida Indians, by which they were to retire from the seacoast into the interior of the peninsula. They were not to occupy (except certain reservations) any lands nigher than twenty miles to the shore of the Atlantic, and nigher than fifteen miles to the Gulf of Mexico.

In May, 1832, at Payne's Landing, the Seminoles cede all claims to land in Florida, and agree to emigrate west of the Mississippi, provided the Creeks would receive them as a constituent part of their nation. The Seminoles were to remove in three years after the ratification of the treaty, and the removal was to begin "as early as practicable in 1833, with those Indians at present occupying the Big Swamp and other parts of the country beyond the limits" defined in the treaty of 1823.

In March, 1833, the Seminole chiefs sign a treaty expressive of their satisfaction with the country assigned to their nation west of the Mississippi, and agree to commence removing to their new home "as soon as the Government will make arrangements for their emigration satisfactory to the Seminole nation."

From these treaties, it is clear that Congress ought to have provided the means for removing the Seminoles, and to have commenced the work in 1833; but, instead of doing so, the Government made no preparation, and appropriated no money for that object until the 3d of March, 1835. Thus the Government was culpably negligent in the fulfilment of its obligations, and sorely have the people of the United States been punished for it. The delay was so great, that when we began to make preparations to send the Indians west of the Mississippi, they said we had trifled with and disregarded the treaty so long that they would not be bound by it. Hostilities commenced in 1835, and the next thing the statute book exhibits, is the appropriation of $120,000, to compel the Seminoles to submit. This appropriation was made on the 14th of January, 1836, since which time we have expended about twenty millions in the prosecution of the war, and sacrificed hundreds of valuable lives, of whom ten fell victims to the climate for every one killed in battle! Nothing like this war can be found in history. We have had in the field from five to ten thousand troops, and yet this mere handful of savages are not conquered. Truly may it be said that "the race is not to the swift, or the battle to the strong." Sir, I regard the disasters of this war as a just punishment for the criminal negligence of the last Administration. President Jackson was so devoted to the personal glory of electing his successor, that he could not attend to the fulfilment of the Seminole treaties in proper time. His faithful followers in Congress were as intently engaged in the same glorious work! All were so engrossed with the ideas of "retrenchment and reform," (which terms are now understood to have meant from the beginning, in the party vocabulary, increase of the expenditures and division of the spoils,) and the regulation of the succession, that no attention was given to the treaties with the Seminoles. When the Indians exhibited their resentment by refusing to emigrate, instead of approaching them in kindness, acknowledging our negligence, and offering to pay them for the disappointment and delay, the Administration gave orders, like a gasconading bully, and resorted to force. A hundred thousand dollars would probably have healed the breach, if paid to the Indians in the way of damages for unjustifiable delay in executing the treaty on our part. But that could not be done, because it would be an open confession of the faithlessness of the Administration! Man will not take blame to himself, although he knows he is criminal! Well, sir, we have carried on the war nearly five years, and what have we got by it? We have experienced the truth of the declaration from Heaven, "When the wicked are in authority, the people mourn."

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania reads the orders of the Secretary of War to General Jesup, directing him to disband a portion of his forces, and complaining that he had called out too large a force; and he read from General Jesup's communications, showing that he could not end the war, because he was not furnished with troops at the proper time. I see in all this nothing dishonorable to General Jesup. All that any one can say is, that he may have erred. I am not willing to concede that much. Before the Indians dispersed over the whole country, it might have been practicable to put an end to hostilities by a decisive blow. Had Jesup been furnished with troops at the time mentioned by him, he might, for any thing we know to the contrary, have given that blow. Since the Indians scattered, it has been impossible to strike them. One-fourth of the men we have had in Florida, under General Jesup, would have put an end to the war, in half an hour at any time, if they could have brought the Indians to a general engagement in an open field. But the Indians would not meet them in that manner. The Indians dispersed, and scattered through their swamps and hammocks. How, then, were they to be caught? Not by following or seeking them by large armies. As well might you call down the eagle from his azure height, to attack a tomtit in a brush-heap: as well might you set a pack of bloodhounds to catch bullfrogs in a Florida pond, as to march large armies after single Indians scattered through a thousand hammocks. If General Jesup's object in calling a large force into the field was to keep them together, and march them by regiments in pursuit of the skulking foe, I should think his plan a miserable one; but if it was to divide them out into small detachments, and cover a large extent of country, and to hunt the Indians in scouting parties, the plan was reasonable, and deserves our approbation. Did he call for more troops than were necessary to cover the country with scouting parties? No, sir. We have been told in this debate that large bodies of Indians have lain snug in a hammock, without detection, between the parallel lines of our marching armies as they passed on either side. Now, sir, there are 45,000 square miles of wilderness in Florida, within the hiding places of each of which the Indians may shelter themselves: and if you had a man for each square mile, even then there would be no certainty of finding the foe. Did Jesup call for 45,000 men, or the half of them, or the fourth of them? No, sir.

Mr. Chairman, this Florida war will never end until we cease to make war upon the character of our generals—until we cease to expect impossibilities at their hands. We must, moreover, adapt our operations to the character and mode of warfare of the enemy. We must hunt him and fight him by small scouting parties, and by single men, and we must do this systematically. The conduct of the Government has made it a war of extermination. The Indians so regard it, and we must prepare for it accordingly. When Gen. Jesup thought he could make a lasting peace with the Indians, by allowing them to retain a part of the territory, the present Administration would not listen to his proposition, but recalled him; and I am not certain but it was done in consequence of this proposition. Afterwards, Gen. Macomb was sent out with power to treat, and he reported that he had made a verbal bargain with the Indians, by which they agreed to stay on one side of Pease creek, and he on the other, and fight no more. Well, sir, this bargain was not observed by the Indians. It is now a war of extermination, and how shall we bring it to a close? The Indian wars of the "dark and bloody ground" give the necessary instruction, if we were but wise enough to receive and obey it. Sir, we must cover Florida with old fashioned log forts, within which twenty or thirty men can defy the attack of every Indian in Florida. I have made the calculation, and I find that less than one hundred of these log forts would cover the peninsula of Florida in such a manner as to leave no one of them more than 25 miles distant from those nighest to it. Five thousand troops, being about half the number we have usually kept in the service, would supply a garrison of 50 men for each fort. Now, sir, if you wish to end the Florida war by killing or capturing the Indians, build such forts all over the country about 25 miles apart, being an easy day's march on foot from the one to the other. Station at each 50 men; not men without spirit, or character, or activity, such as are picked up in the filthy lanes and gutters of large cities, but men who are bold and active, respectable and aspiring, such as may be had in our mountains and plains, if you will adopt proper means to obtain them. Let these men, in scouts of six, or a dozen, or two dozen, hunt through the swamps and hammocks between the forts. Let them meet on half-way ground and encamp all night together. Let them exchange visits and tell their adventures. Let them fight whenever they could do so on equal terms; and when they could not, retreat to their forts for protection, and take measures to concentrate from the different points a force sufficient to meet any number of the enemy which may embody. Let this system be adopted, and you will bring the war to an end in the most economical manner possible. Such a system would soon discover all the hiding-places of the enemy, all his resources, and he would either fall under the blows which would reach him, or surrender in despair. But, instead of adopting a system like this, we have entertained the vain desire of conquering Indians as we would civilized nations—by splendid campaigns and pitched battles, in which we were to reap a harvest of glory and renown; and we have avenged ourselves for the disappointment by abusing our generals!

The gentleman from Pennsylvania read a letter from General Jesup, in which he says he would employ bloodhounds, if the inhuman massacres of the savages could not be arrested without using such means. I thought, when the letter was first read, that the General was to be made answerable for the introduction of the dogs now operating in Florida; but, as he made no recommendation to engage the services of such auxiliaries, and as no reflections were cast on him in the course of the debate, on account of his allusion to the bloodhounds, I see no motive in reading that part of his letter, unless it be to furnish the groundwork of prejudicial inferences, although no comments are made upon it. Now, sir, I feel, as General Jesup expressed himself, that if there were no other means of saving the lives of women and children from the scalping-knife and tomahawk, or of avenging their murder than the use of the bloodhound, I would employ him. I will go even further and say, if there are other means, but not so effectual, I would use the bloodhound. Savages, who are not governed by the rules of civilized warfare; who gibbet their prisoners; who pay no respect to a flag of truce, (the melancholy fate of Colonel Hardin and Maj. Trueman is ample proof on these points;) who spare no age nor sex; who murder and burn at midnight, must be made to feel the vengeance of the civilized man, by the utmost severity. They cannot be taught to stay their murderous hands until they feel that destruction awaits them. They have no sympathy for their enemies. The shriek of the victim is music to the ear of a savage. Such being the nature of the fiend we must encounter, I look upon it as a sickly, mawkish sensibility, to weep if he is throttled by a bloodhound, when we should rejoice if he was trampled to death by the charger of the dragoon. The true philanthropist and Christian laments the calamities resulting from war, and does all he can to avert them; but, when I see one so very refined in sentiment as to exult without bounds when a squadron of horses or elephants are so managed as to trample the enemy to death, and to grieve themselves without measure at the idea of hunting the lurking foe with a pack of dogs, I cannot help regarding such person as of weak mind, or hypocritically canting upon a distinction without a substantial difference. Genuine humanity adopts every means to put an end to war as speedily as possible. With savages, the surest way to end a war, or to keep them in peace, is to convince them that they cannot escape your vengeance, and that they will always receive justice at your hands. Give them confidence in your honesty, and make them know that they can be caught and punished, and you will have no difficulty with them. That master spirit of the world, Napoleon, quelled a mob by pouring upon them a shower of balls, without previous notice. The falling of a few killed produced a panic, and the multitude dispersed immediately. Others sent to do the same thing, got the passions of the multitude excited by firing blank cartridges upon them, and when it became necessary to use balls, hundreds were slain before the mob was dispersed. True humanity is always consulted by never trifling. If dogs could be found to track and take the Indians, it would be humanity instead of cruelty to use them; because the conviction thereby produced on the minds of the Indians that they could not escape, would bring the war to a speedy termination. As it is and has been, your efforts to drive them from their fastnesses have been like firing blank cartridges upon a mob; you have only incensed them, and made them more resolute.

Now, sir, I look upon the employment of bloodhounds in this Florida war with great contempt, simply because I have not a particle of confidence in the efficiency of that kind of force. It is, like all the other experiments of the past and present Administrations, a failure. The dogs have not earned their rations! And then the instructions given as to the manner in which they were to be used are supremely ridiculous! The soldier must follow the dog, which slowly follows the Indian trail, being restrained by a leash! And thus dog and man are both shot, before either sees the Indian!

It is the most difficult thing on earth to discriminate in cases seemingly analagous. You might make a successful hunt of naked Indians in the time of Cortez and Pizarro with bloodhounds; but they will not seize Indians with rifles and tomahawks in their hands. I am yet to be convinced that the bloodhounds will stand before fire arms. If, however, the people of Florida can, to any extent, protect themselves by using bloodhounds or any other kind of dogs, I shall not blame them for doing it. The dog is our protector under many circumstances. He keeps a faithful watch around the domicil at midnight. He warns us of the approach of the thief. He is the hunter's friend. He helps him in his wars upon bear and buffalo; and if he can be made serviceable in the Florida war, I shall shed no crocodile tears for political effect.

The colonial authorities of Massachusetts, in 1744, declared war against certain Indians, and offered rewards for their scalps. One hundred pounds (bills of credit) were to be paid for each scalp of a male Indian, over twelve years old, killed in battle; and half that for those under twelve years, and for women killed in battle. One hundred and five pounds were to be paid for Indian male prisoners over twelve years old; and fifty-five pounds for women, and children under twelve years old, made prisoners. So our Puritan ancestors made only five pounds difference, for humanity's sake, between living and dead Indians. I do not find that the Indians were not to be caught with bloodhounds. The reward was to be paid to all "who shall voluntarily, and at their own proper cost and charge, go out and kill," &c. Really, sir, it might be a saving to the Treasury to let out the Florida war upon such terms. We have already paid more than $2,000 for every Indian and negro, male and female, big and little, in hostile array in Florida; and we have only killed and taken, so far, about a fourth part of them. At the same rate, by the time we kill or catch the whole, each man, woman, and child, will cost us about $10,000.

In 1764, John Penn, Lieutenant Governor of the Colony of Pennsylvania, issued his proclamation offering premiums and bounties for Indian prisoners and scalps, and did not prohibit the use of dogs of any sort. One hundred and fifty Spanish dollars, or pieces of eight, were to be paid for male prisoners above ten years old, and one hundred and thirty dollars for squaws and girls, and boys under ten. For the scalp of each male Indian above the age of ten years, one hundred and thirty-four dollars were given, and fifty dollars for each female scalp above the age of ten years. I mention these things to show what has been done by respectable communities in defending themselves against savage enemies. Now, although I would prefer following other examples, and taking prisoners and scalps without any fee or reward, except that of saving the country and protecting our wives and children, still, in looking into the past history of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, I think the Representatives of these highly respectable and Christian Commonwealths ought not to condemn, with unmitigated severity, the people of Florida for seeking the protection of their own scalps by the attempt to use dogs in attacking and hunting a savage foe.

When I was under General Harrison in the Northwest, during the last war with Great Britain, I was informed that General Proctor paid the Indians a stated reward for every scalp. That was a crime. It was a very different thing from paying members of the same community for protecting the weak and feeble against the torch and scalping knife, by killing, or capturing, or hunting the savage foe with dogs. It was the example of a civilized nation paying for and rewarding savage brutality, instead of teaching mercy and humanity! It was a retrograde movement which disgraced the fast anchored Isle. Instead of being the reformer, she became the ally and encourager of barbarians!

I have performed an act of duty and justice in making these remarks in defence of General Jesup, whose conduct has, I think, been greatly misunderstood and misrepresented. The character of the country and of the army is identified with the conduct of our generals, and I will not sit by and see them sink—yes, sir, manacled and thrown overboard—when truth and honor can save them.

SPEECH OF MR. M. P. GENTRY,

OF TENNESSEE,

In the House of Representatives, May 19, 1840—On the bill to secure the Freedom of Elections.

Mr. GENTRY addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I had not intended to participate in this debate, until my colleague (Mr. WATTERSON) addressed the House, some days ago. Up to that time, I had felt no disposition to submit my views upon the merits of this bill; not because I did not appreciate the magnitude and dangerous tendency of the abuses which it is intended to reform, but because I was not very sanguine in the belief that the bill, if passed into a law, would prove an effective corrective of those abuses. And, sir, if my colleague (Mr. WATTERSON) had confined himself in his remarks to the question before the House, I would not have changed my original purpose, and would have been content to give a silent vote upon this question, as I have done upon most of those which have been disposed of by this House. But he chose to wander off from the question before the House, to give a history of the late political canvass in the State of Tennessee; in the course of which, he felt himself called upon to animadvert, with as much severity as he could command, upon the course of the political party in that State to which he is opposed, and to denounce, in the most offensive and unsparing terms, two distinguished individuals of that party. But a little while ago, my colleague was identified with that party in Tennessee which he now opposes, and professed to be the ardent friend and admirer of the distinguished individuals whom he now denounces with so much bitterness. But a little while ago he pretended to be devoted—most earnestly and zealously devoted—to the maintenance of the principles which the Whig party of Tennessee are struggling to maintain; and he is not more unscrupulous in denouncing the distinguished individuals of that party now than he was servile in fawning upon and flattering them then. Knowing this to have been the position which my colleague very recently maintained in reference to the political party which he now opposes, and the individuals whom he now denounces, I obtained the floor, when my colleague concluded his remarks, at a late hour, some weeks ago, under an impulse of feeling which prompted me to give utterance to that resentment which the character of his remarks was so well calculated to inspire, not having noticed that the consideration of this bill would be superseded in the order of business, and that I would thus long be deprived of an opportunity of replying to my colleague. The lapse of time has soothed into quietude the angry feelings which were excited into action by the remarks of my colleague; and, since his speech has been published, I am convinced that it carries within itself its own refutation, and that it contains nothing which makes a reply from me necessary; and if I had not then announced my determination to do so, I would not now seek the floor for that purpose. But fearing that my colleague might misconstrue the motive which governed me, if I was now to decline replying to his speech, I have determined to execute the purpose which I then announced, however loathsome and unprofitable the task may be.

I am aware that my colleague, in the furious onslaught which he made against the political party of which I am an humble member, and certain distinguished individuals of that party, to whom I shall presently allude, did not seek a conflict with me. It was quite obvious that he desired to "break a lance" with the distinguished gentleman [Mr. BELL] who introduced the bill now under consideration. He was animated with that kind of ambition which glowed in the bosom of Prince Hal, when, on the famous field of Shrewsbury, he encountered the Percy, determined by one brave fight to pluck from that warrior's brow the laurels which he had won in many a hard-fought battle, and place them on his own; but my distinguished colleague, who introduced the bill, has given no evidence that he felt the blows that were aimed at him, nor evinced the slightest disposition to repel them; and my colleague [Mr. WATTERSON] must curb his "high vaulting ambition," and for the present be content, by slow degrees, and must be satisfied with such victories as he can win over adversaries of less distinction than the mover of this bill.

——"To climb

My colleague greeted this bill as an old acquaintance, and announced to the House and the country "that it had its faint and comparatively harmless prototype in the sedition law of the elder Adams." He labored to prove an analogy between that odious law and the bill under consideration; and maintained that the sedition law, when compared with this bill, was "comparatively harmless." The object of the sedition law was to protect the office holders of the Government from such strictures and animadversions as the people might see proper to make upon their official conduct; the object of this bill is to protect the people from the office holders by "securing the freedom of elections, and preventing the abuse of Executive patronage." The object of the sedition law was to protect the office holders and to punish the people for freely expressing their sentiments in relation to the official conduct of those officers. The practical tendency of the sedition law was to make those who administer the Government irresponsible to the people by shielding them from the public censure and disapprobation; whilst the tendency of the bill now under consideration would be, if passed into a law, to increase the responsibility of public officers by securing to the people the independent exercise of the elective franchise, free from all undue official influences. The tendency of the sedition law was to protect the office holders from the influence and control of the people; the object of the bill is to protect the people from the influence and control of the office holders, who, in all countries, and under every form of Government, acquire interests antagonistical to those of the people, and seek to increase and extend the power conferred upon them by the Constitution and laws, that they may aggrandize themselves by oppressing the people. I cannot conceive of two things more opposite in character—more widely different in their nature and tendency—than the bill under consideration and the law to which my colleague compares it. Yet, disregarding, overlooking, defying the palpable dissimilarity in the tendency and objects of these measures, my colleague insults the public intelligence by insisting that they are identical in principle, with the single exception that the bill under consideration is more odious in its provisions than the sedition law, which he said was "comparatively harmless." The positions which my colleague endeavors to maintain, and the sentiments which he expresses, harmonize well with the principles and practices of the party to which he belongs; but are totally repugnant to the doctrines and principles of true Republicanism as taught and practised by the "Fathers of the Church."

My colleague assumes that Congress does not possess the constitutional power to pass the bill under consideration; and argues, with much gravity, that the power of prescribing the qualifications which shall entitle an individual to the right of voting in elections belongs exclusively to the States. If the bill proposed to do what my colleague contends that Congress has not the power to do, no one would more readily than myself agree with him that it was unconstitutional; but my colleague cannot be ignorant of the fact that the bill proposes nothing of that nature. He knows that the bill does not propose to deprive any office holder of the free and independent exercise of the elective franchise. He knows that one object of the bill is to give the law to the office holders of the Government, as a shield to protect them from the tyranny and caprice of the President, and relieve them from that slavish dependence upon his will which is now so debasing to them, and so injurious to the public interests. He knows full well that the bill does not attempt or propose to limit or restrict the right of suffrage; and when, in giving his views upon this question, he gravely made the argument to which I have alluded, he could have been actuated by no other motive than the disingenuous one of misleading the public mind in regard to the true character of this bill; and to elicit from public opinion a verdict against it, by presenting it to the public view in an aspect quite the reverse of that which is true. He knew that many would see and read his speech who would never see the bill; and, if I may be allowed to judge of the object which my colleague had in view, I think I am safe in concluding that it was to deceive his constituents, and the country generally, in regard to the true character of the bill, rather than to prove to the House that its provisions are unwise and impolitic, and that it ought not to pass into a law. The offices which are filled by the individuals upon whom this bill is intended to operate, were created by Congress, and might at any time be abolished; and surely the power which created the offices, and which may abolish them, can regulate by law, to the extent which this bill proposes, the conduct of the officers, without violating the Constitution.

To prove that those abuses which this bill is intended to correct have no existence, my colleague adduces the fact, that majorities have occasionally been against the President in the large cities of the Union, where the patronage of Government is greatest, and where office holders are most numerous. And, as a further proof of his position, he informed the House that here, in the District of Columbia, where the seat of Government is located, and where the people are within the immediate range of Executive influence, three-fourths of the population are opposed to the re-election of Mr. Van Buren. At the first view there seems to be some plausibility in this position; but, when we bear in mind the fact, that the cities to which he alluded are in a high degree commercial, and that a sound currency and a healthy condition of trade are indispensable to the prosperity of their citizens, and that this Administration has waged a constant exterminating war upon the commercial interests of the country, the facts so much relied upon by my colleague, far from proving the impotency of Executive patronage, furnish conclusive evidence, to my mind, that it has been powerfully felt in those cities, or else the President would not be able to command the support of so large a portion of their population.

In regard to the state of public sentiment in this city and District, which my colleague says is so much in opposition to the present Administration, it is satisfactorily accounted for by the opportunities which the people of this District enjoy of seeing and knowing the corruption and mal-practices which are practised and tolerated by those who administer the Government; and I cannot permit myself to doubt that the people in every State of this Union would be equally unanimous in opposing the party now in power, if they possessed the same means of arriving at correct conclusions. This fact, then, whilst it is in a high degree complimentary to the virtue and patriotism of the citizens of this city and District, does not sustain the position assumed by my colleague. The title of the bill bespeaks its object, and supersedes the necessity of an explanation on that subject. It is "to secure the freedom of elections, and to provide more effectually for the faithful administration of Executive patronage." Some of the most illustrious of those statesmen who achieved the independence of our country opposed the adoption of the Constitution upon the ground that it conferred too much power upon the President. They foresaw that, by means of the patronage which would concentrate in the Executive department of the Government, and the abuses in the administration of that patronage which would probably be practised, the power and influence of the President would be augmented to an extent dangerous to the public liberty. The wisest Republican statesmen who have lived since the adoption of the Constitution, have felt themselves bound, by the highest and most sacred obligations of patriotism, to resist every thing in the action of our system of Government which tended to bring the "patronage of the Federal Government into conflict with the freedom of elections," or which tended to increase the power and influence of the President.

My colleague is wiser, or more courageous, than the sages to whom I have alluded. The dangers which were so clearly seen by them are invisible to my colleague; and those abuses in the administration of Executive patronage which they believed would lead to results, debasing to the public virtue—corrupting to the purity of the elective franchise—subversive of the freedom of elections, and dangerous to the public liberty—the interference of Federal office-holders in elections—appointments to, and removals from, office for opinions' sake; and, in short, all the abuses which the bill under consideration is intended to reform, are justified and defended by my colleague, who thus identifies himself in position, fully and completely, with that class of politicians whose motto is, "To the victors belong the spoils," and who hold that the offices and honors of this Republic are merely political capital which a party President may rightfully employ to reward those partisans who have rendered him service in elevating him to or sustaining him in power. So harmless does my colleague deem the patronage of the President to be, that he says in his speech, "in the interior of the country a Government officer is scarcely seen; nor is the power of the Executive, in any way, seen or felt." This declaration of my colleague is true only in part. It may be true that the power of the Executive is often unseen in the interior, but it is equally true that it is often most powerfully felt. When Philip of Macedon determined to conquer and subjugate the liberties of Greece, he bribed into his service certain Athenian orators, and induced them to persuade their countrymen to turn a deaf ear to the counsels and advice of Demosthenes, who urged them to adopt the most vigorous measures for defending themselves against the insiduous designs of that ambitious monarch. The glittering gold with which Philip tempted those orators into treason, was unseen by the Athenian people, but it was felt by the orators; and so in regard to the patronage of the Federal Executive of our own country. The promises of office and preferment with which the President seduces ambitious, aspiring, and unprincipled men from their duty to the country, are unknown to the people; and when such men go forth among them, to make them believe that all is right in the administration of the Government, and that the President is the purest of patriots, and more than all other men devoted to their happiness and welfare, the people, ignorant of the mercenary motive which prompts them to a zeal seemingly so patriotic, confide in their declarations, and are deceived. I therefore conclude that the invisibility of Executive power and influence, which my colleague seems so much to admire, does not diminish the danger to be apprehended from that source, nor lessen the obligation which rests upon the legislative department of the Government, to limit and control that power and influence by every constitutional means.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to notice in detail the various sophistical and futile arguments employed by my colleague to give plausibility to his opposition to this bill, and justify his denunciations of its advocates; nor do I propose to enlarge upon the fatal consequences which must inevitably result if the principles and practices put forth and defended by my colleague, and openly avowed and acted upon by the party which now wields the political power of this Government, shall receive the sanction and toleration of the country, and become permanently engrafted upon our political institutions. The most gifted eloquence cannot portray, nor the richest imagination conceive, the extent and fatal character of those consequences. In that political corruption which has, within the last few years of our history, practically decided that talents, integrity, fidelity, and trustworthiness, are no longer to be regarded as virtues which constitute a passport to honor and preferment; in those enormous defalcations, embezzlements, and peculations of every grade and character which have astounded, shocked, and blunted the moral sensibilities of the nation; and in that general political and moral debasement which must mark the present as an era in our history, we have but a faint foreshadowing of the consequences which will ensue, unless those abuses in "the administration of Government patronage," of which these evils are the natural results, shall be corrected. Whether such penal enactments as the bill under consideration proposes will prove an effectual corrective of those abuses is, I think, questionable. However well guarded and wisely framed its provisions may be, still, if you pass it into a law, you must rely upon officers to execute it—officers who are themselves interested in the continuance of those abuses which it seeks to correct, and who derive their appointments to office from the President, and who are liable at all times to be removed from office by the same power which appointed them. Hence I conclude that the law would not be executed so as to accomplish the object in view. I apprehend that the disease has fastened itself too deeply upon our political institutions to be reached by such a remedy. It can only be reached by a legislative enactment, which shall require of the President, in all nominations made by him to the Senate, to fill vacancies occasioned by an exercise of his power to remove from office, a statement of the reasons for which such removal was made; and by such a modification of the Constitution as will limit the Presidential service to one term of four or six years. The former would cut down and destroy, to a considerable extent, those means of influence which are wielded to vitiate and corrupt the ballot box, and subvert the freedom of elections; the latter would remove the most powerful inducements to prostitute the patronage of the Federal Executive to the accomplishment of party or political objects which now exist.

But, though I do not believe that the bill under consideration would effectually arrest the abuses complained of, if passed into a law, yet the moral force of such a legislative declaration of opinion would be highly salutary in its effects. It would be a just rebuke to those who at present administer the Government, and would aid the exertions of those patriotic citizens in every part of the Republic, who are struggling to restrict the several departments of this Government within those limits prescribed by the Constitution, by resisting the encroachments of Executive power; and who are striving to restore to our political institutions the purity of which they have been despoiled. I shall therefore give my support to the bill; and I am happy to have such an opportunity to attest the sincerity of my conviction that Executive power and patronage "have alarmingly increased, are increasing, and ought to be diminished."

My object, however, in addressing the House, is not so much to discuss the question which is before it, as to reply to that portion of my colleague's speech which related to matters which have no connection with the merits of that question. It will be remembered that my colleague did not confine himself to the question before the House, but availed himself of that question to go at large into a discussion of party topics; in the course of which he felt himself called upon to entertain the House with a history of the late political canvass in Tennessee; to boast of his own achievements in that canvass; to denounce in unmeasured terms the political party which he now opposes; and to stigmatize two distinguished gentlemen who recently represented that State [Judge WHITE and Mr. FOSTER] in the Senate of the United States, as FEDERALISTS and APOSTATES. I have already informed the House that, until a very recent period, my colleague professed to be the warm friend and admirer of those gentlemen, and to be politically identified with them in feeling and in principle. I regret that he did not specify what principle they have abandoned; what pledges they have violated; and what duties they failed to discharge, that this House and the country might understand the reasons which have induced him to withdraw from them his friendship and support, and to denounce them as "apostates and Federalists." But he has failed to do so; and, in the absence of such specifications, it is fair for me to conclude that the course which my colleague has thought proper to pursue is attributable to the difference of opinion which exists between him and those whom he denounces, in relation to the propriety of correcting those abuses "that have brought the patronage of the Federal Government into conflict with the freedom of elections." I am justified in this conclusion by the remarks which my colleague made upon the bill now under consideration. He justified and defended the abuses which it is the object of that bill to prevent, and made it the subject of complaint against the President that he does not pursue the course which my colleague says "he would urge," and proscribe, for opinion's sake, more universally and indiscriminately than he does. I cannot suppose that my colleague would have turned with such vindictive fury upon those with whom he had been so recently associated in a common cause, and with whom he had claimed congeniality of principles, merely on account of a difference of opinion in regard to the mode of accomplishing an object, about the wisdom and propriety of which he and they entertained the same views. If the bill is defective in its details, let my colleague propose such amendments as will correct its defects; but let him not denounce its advocates as Federalists and apostates, for I shall prove that the bill only proposes to carry into practice principles which have been held by the most illustrious statesmen, who have shed lustre upon the past history of our country; principles which were professed by the most distinguished leaders of the political party to which my colleague now belongs, when that party was seeking power; and principles to the maintenance of which my colleague himself, not long ago, professed to be most ardently devoted. A demonstration of these truths will constitute a successful vindication of the two distinguished individuals who recently represented the State of Tennessee in the Senate of the United States, and the political party in that State with which they are identified; and will enable this House and the country to determine who have abandoned their principles, and who are "apostates and Federalists."

Mr. Speaker, my colleague began his harangue by saying that he would not weary the patience of the House by quoting the opinions of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Jackson, "upon the principles embraced in the bill now under consideration;" but he said he would content himself with stating, "in plain language," his own views; and for them he would be responsible "to those who sent him here and to the country." I admire the prudence of my colleague in declining to place the opinions of the illustrious men to whom he alluded in contrast with his own. It proves that he yet retains sufficient respect for the intelligence of the people, to believe them capable of making a just discrimination between wisdom and folly, demagoguism and patriotism. I propose, sir, to do that which my colleague declined to do, that his constituents and mine, and "the country," may have an opportunity of deciding whether the opinions of my colleague, or those of the illustrious men to whom he alluded, are most entitled to their respect and consideration. The political party to which my colleague belongs claim to be the disciples of Jefferson. Let us see whether they practise his principles. In a letter which that great man addressed to Gov. McKean, of Pennsylvania, he says:

"The event of the election is still in dubio. A strong portion in the House of Representatives will prevent an election if they can. I rather believe they will not be able to do it, as there are six individuals of moderate character, any one of whom, coming over to the Republican vote, will make a ninth State. Till this is known, it is too soon for me to say what should be done in such atrocious cases as those you mentain, of Federal officers obstructing the operation of the State Governments. One thing I will say—that, as to the future, interference with elections, whether of the State or General Governments, by the officers of the latter, should be deemed cause of removal; because the constitutional remedy by the elective principle becomes nothing if it may be smothered by the enormous patronage of the General Government. How far it may be practicable, prudent, or proper, to look back, is too great a question to be decided but by the united wisdom of the whole Administration when formed."

This letter was written by Mr. Jefferson, before it was certainly known that he would be elected President of the United States. After he was installed into office, unlike those who call themselves his disciples, he acted out the principles which he professed, as will appear from the following circular, which he caused to be issued to the officers of the Federal Government:

"The President of the United States has seen, with dissatisfaction, officers of the General Government taking, on various occasions, active parts in elections of the public functionaries, whether of the General or of the State Governments. Freedom of elections being essential to the mutual independence of Governments, and of the different branches of the same Government, so vitally cherished by the most of our constituents, it is deemed improper for officers depending on the Executive of the Union to attempt to control or influence the free exercise of the elective right. This I am instructed, therefore, to notify to all officers within my Department, holding their appointments under the authority of the President directly, and to desire them to notify to all subordinate to them. The right of any officer to give his vote at elections as a qualified citizen, is not meant to be restrained, nor, however given, shall it have any effect to his prejudice; but it is expected that he will not attempt to influence the votes of others, nor take any part in the business of electioneering, that being deemed inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution, and his duties to it."

Mr. Speaker, it will be seen by the circular from which I have read, that Mr. Jefferson required the officers of the Government who held their appointments under the authority of the President, "not to take any part in the business of electioneering, nor attempt to influence the votes of others—that being deemed inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution, and their duties to it." But now an attempt to prevent, by legislative enactment, those abuses which Mr. Jefferson declared to be "inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution," is denounced as a flagrant violation of that instrument, and is declared to be a measure as odious as the sedition law; and the officers of Government, amounting in number to nearly one hundred thousand, are required to contribute regularly a portion of their salaries for electioneering purposes, and are taught to know that they cannot render a more acceptable service to the President than by taking an active "part in the business of electioneering," and by successful exertions "to control the votes of others." With what propriety, sir, can those who practise and tolerate abuses so corrupting in their tendencies, claim to be the disciples of Jefferson and denounce their political opponents as "apostates and Federalists!" But, sir, I forbear to comment upon such glaring inconsistency, and will proceed to draw, from a more recent period of our history, facts to sustain the positions which I have assumed. My colleague, no doubt, remembers well the famous report made by a select committee of the Senate during the first session of the Nineteenth Congress, to which was referred a proposition to inquire into the expediency of reducing the patronage of the Executive Government of the United States. That committee was composed of the leading men of the Jackson Democratic party of that period. Mr. Benton was its chairman, and Mr. Van Buren and Judge White were members of it. That committee, after examining carefully into the degree and amount of patronage "then exercised by the President," arrived at the conclusion that it "might and ought to be diminished by law;" and for that purpose the committee reported six bills, and proceeded to urge reasons for their adoption, as follows:

"The committee do not doubt but that there are other branches of Executive patronage, in addition to those which are comprehended in the provisions of these bills, which may be advantageously regulated by law. Far from thinking that they have exhausted the subject, they believe that they have only opened it, and that nothing more can be done at this time than to lay the foundation of a system, to be followed up and completed hereafter. In coming to the conclusion that Executive patronage ought to be diminished and regulated on the plan proposed, the committee rest their opinion on the ground that the exercise of great power, in the hands of one man, has a constant tendency to sully the purity of our institutions, and to endanger the liberties of the country."

How different were the opinions entertained by that committee upon the subject of Executive patronage from those expressed by my colleague in this debate! But I will proceed with the report. After descanting upon the jealousy of power, and of the influence of patronage, which had charecterized our ancestors; and attributing to that jealousy many of the safeguards which the Constitution provides for the preservation of freedom, the report proceeds as follows:

"The committee believe that they will be acting in the spirit of the Constitution in laboring to multiply the guards and to strengthen the barriers against the possible abuse of power. If a community could be imagined in which the laws should execute themselves—in which the power of Government should consist in the enactment of laws—in such a state, the machine of Goverment would carry on its operations without jar or friction. Parties would be unknown, and the movements of the political machine would but little more disturb the passions of men than they are disturbed by the operations of the great laws of the material world. But this is not the case. The scene shifts from this imaginary region, where laws execute themselves, to the theatre of real life, wherein they are executed by civil and military officers, by armies and navies, by courts of justice, by the collection and disbursement of revenue, with all its train of salaries, jobs, and contracts, and in this aspect of the reality we behold the working of patronage, and discover the reason why so many stand ready in any country, and in all ages, TO FLOCK TO THE STANDARD OF POWER, WHERESOEVER AND BY WHOMSOEVER IT MAY BE RAISED."

The report then proceeds to portray the great and dangerous extent of power and patronage, then wielded by the Federal Executive; and predicts its rapid increase to an almost incalculable extent, unless Congress could be prevailed on to interpose its power to restrain that tendency in the action of our system of Government. And to exemplify their view of the subject, the committee read from the "Blue Book" of the Republic, which corresponds with the "Red Book" of Monarchies, to show the greatness of Executive power and patronage, by exhibiting the extent of that power and influence in a single branch of the public service, in the custom-house at New York. At that time, (1826.) there were employed in that custom-house one hundred and seventy-four officers, whose annual salaries amounted, in the aggregate, to the sum of $201,682; and the amount of revenue collected at that custom-house, in the same year, was $8,766,753 32. In the year 1839, the number of officers employed in the custom-house at New York was four hundred and ninety-seven, whose annual compensation amounted, in the aggregate, to the sum of $540,615; and the amount of revenue collected at that custom-house, in the same year, was $7,856,826 77. Mark the enormous increase in the number of officers, and the amount of their compensation! whilst the amount of revenue collected at that custom-house is less in 1839 than in 1826! Yes, sir, those who were so much alarmed at the extent of Executive patronage, power, and influence, can see nothing in its rapid and unparalleled increase to excite their fears. It was then dangerous to the public liberty, but now it is a most harmless thing. After making this exhibit, the committee proceed to comment upon it as follows:

"A formidable list indeed! formidable in numbers, and still more so from the vast amount of money in their hands. The action of such a body of men, supposing them to be animated by one spirit, must be tremendous in an election; and that they will be so animated, is too plain to need demonstration. Power over a man's support is power over his will. The President has power over the support of all these officers; and they again have power over debtor merchants to the amount of ten millions of dollars per annum, and over the support of an immense number of individuals, professional, mechanical, and day laboring, to whom they can, and will, extend or deny a valuable private as well as public patronage, according to the part they shall act in State as well as Federal elections. Still this is only a branch—a mere prong—of Federal patronage in the city of New York. The same Government has, in the same city, a branch of the United States Bank, wielding a capital of many millions; a large military, naval, and post office establishment; a judiciary, with its appropriate officers; presses which print the laws and public advertisements; and a long list of contractors and jobbers."

Such, sir, was the frightful picture of Executive power and patronage in the year 1826, as drawn by a committee of the Senate of which Mr. Benton was the chairman, and Mr. Van Buren a member. The committee then proceed to warn the Senate and the country of the fatal consequences which were likely to result from such an accumulation of power and patronage in the hands of the President, as follows:

"Every where, to the extreme frontier of the remotest State or Territory, Federal patronage will be found, in degree and force, proportionate to the population of the place, and forever augmenting with the increasing power of the Government. Diminution of patronage is not thought of; the state of the custom-house in New York is already pregnant proof of this. The power of patronage, unless checked by the vigorous interposition of Congress, must go on increasing, until Federal influence, in many parts of this Confederacy, will predominate in elections, as completely as British influence predominates in Scotland and Ireland, in rotten borough towns, and in the great naval stations of Portsmouth and Plymouth."

And again, in another part of the report, the committee say of Executive patronage, that—

"Its workings will contaminate the purity of all elections, and enable the Federal Government eventually to govern throughout the States, as if they were so many provinces of one vast empire. The whole of this great power will centre in the President. The King of England is the 'fountain of honor;' the President of the United States is the source of patronage. He presides over the entire system of Federal appointments, jobs, and contracts. He has power over the support of those who administer the system. He makes and unmakes them. He chooses from the circle of his friends and supporters, and may dismiss them, and, upon all the principles of human action, will dismiss them, as often as they disappoint his expectations. His spirit will animate their actions in all the elections to State and Federal offices. There may be exceptions, but the truth of a general rule is proved by the exception. The intended check and control of the Senate, without new constitutional or statutory provisions, will cease to operate. Patronage will penetrate this body, subdue its capacity of resistance, chain it to the car of power, and enable the President to rule as easily, and much more securely, with than without the nominal check of the Senate. If the President was himself the officer of the people, elected by them, and responsible to them, there would be less danger from this concentration of all power in his hands; but it is the business of statesmen to act upon things as they are, and not as they would wish them to be. We must look forward to the time when the public revenue will be doubled; when the civil and military officers of the Federal Government will be quadrupled; when its influence over individuals will be multiplied to an indefinite extent; when the principle of public action will be open and avowed—the President wants my vote, and I want his patronage—I will vote as he wishes, and he will give me the office I wish for. What will this be but the government of one man? and what is the government of one man but a monarchy? The nature of a thing is in its substance, and the name soon accommodates itself to the substance. Names are nothing. The first Roman Emperor was styled Emperor of the Republic, and the last French Emperor took the same title; and their respective countries were just as essentially monarchica before as after the assumption of these titles."

The report from which I read then proceeds to expatiate at length upon the necessity of diminishing Executive patronage, and concludes as follows:

"In the country for which the committee act, the press, (with some exceptions,) the post office, the armed force, and the appointing power, are in the hands of the President; and the President himself is not in the hands of the people. The President may, and in the current of human affairs will, be against the people; and, in his hands, the arbiters of human fate must be against them also. This will not do. The possibility of it must be avoided. The safety of the people 'is the supreme law;' and, to ensure that safety, these arbiters of human fate must change position, and take post on the side of the people."

Mr. Speaker, the principles contained in the report from which I have been reading were promulgated to the people of the United States by the Jackson Democratic party, in the year 1826, as the true creed of their political faith; and the people were taught to hope and believe that, by entrusting the powers of the Government to that party, they would secure the correction of the abuses so ably set forth in that report, and save the free institutions of their country from the corrupting and fatal consequences which they were assured would follow, if they failed to elevate the reformers to power. In short, sir, they were made to believe that, by bestowing the confidence which was asked at their hands, all abuses in "the administration of Executive patronage" would be reformed; that the expenditures of the Government would be retrenched to a most economical standard; and that the Federal Government, in all its various departments, would be so administered as to restore it to its primitive SIMPLICITY AND PURITY. The people approved the principles which were thus professed, and confided in the promises which were thus made. The people of Tennessee, especially, were almost unanimous in thus approving and confiding; and, to secure the triumph of principles so sound, to accomplish reforms deemed to be so necessary, they rallied with unexampled unanimity and enthusiasm to the support of Andrew Jackson for the Presidency. He was elected by an overwhelming majority; and, in his inaugural address, he acknowledged the object which the people had in view in elevating him to that high and responsible station, by saying:

"The recent demonstration of public sentiment inscribes on the list of Executive duties, in characters too legible to be overlooked, the task of reform; which will require, particularly, the correction of those abuses that have brought the patronage of the Federal Government into conflict with the freedom of elections, and the counteraction of those causes which have disturbed the rightful course of appointment, and have placed, or continued, power in unfaithful or incompetent hands."

Mr. Speaker, these were the principles which brought Gen. Jackson into the Presidential chair. Ten years have elapsed, during which time the party which professed so patriotic a devotion to the maintenance of these principles have been in possession of all the powers of this great Government. Have they redeemed the pledges which they made to the people? Where is the retrenchment, the reform, which they promised? They have violated and disregarded all the pledges which they made. They have repudiated all the principles which they professed when they sought the confidence of the people. They now practise, justify, and defend all the abuses which they pledged themselves to correct; and denounce as Federalists and apostates all those who still adhere to the principles which they hypocritically professed, and who insist upon carrying those principles into practical operation. Surely, sir, the time has come when public sentiment ought again "to inscribe upon the list of Executive duties, in characters too legible to be overlooked, the task of reform; and especially the correction of those abuses which have brought the patronage of the Federal Government into conflict with the freedom of elections; and the counteraction of those causes which have disturbed the rightful course of appointment, and have placed or continued power in unfaithful or incompetent hands."

Does my colleague require additional evidence to establish my position that the Whigs of Tennessee, whom he denounces so bitterly, are contending for the same principles, in regard to Executive patronage, which have ever been professed by the true Republican party, and which were professed by the leaders of that party to which he belongs, when they were seeking power? If he does, I furnish it to him in the following extracts from the speeches and circulars of a man whom my colleague delights to eulogize—I mean Governor Polk, of Tennessee. In a speech which that gentleman delivered on this floor, March 13, 1826, whilst the contest for the Presidency between General Jackson and Mr. Adams was pending, he said:

"I am bold to say I am of the number who are of opinion that, if this happy Government is ever destroyed, which God forbid, it will be by encroachments and abuse of power, and by the alluring and corrupting influence of Executive patronage."

And in a circular which he addressed to his constituents in 1827, he expressed his opinions in relation to the power and influence of the Federal Executive as follows:

"In relation to the extensive patronage of the Executive, my opinion is that it is already 'too great, is increasing, and ought to be diminished.'"

"This is not a contest between men alone. Great and vital principles are involved. It is a contest between power and right. The issue is in fact joined between the people in vindication of their rights on the one side, and the power and patronage of public rulers on the other."

"Those who are not for the people, and for popular rights, are against them, and may be justly termed servile adherents of power, however obtained, and by whomsoever exercised."

Let my colleague contrast these sentiments and opinions with those advanced by him, and entertained and acted upon by the party to which he belongs; and he will then be able to determine, with accuracy, who have apostatized. It is certainly true that these principles were deemed to be Republican in 1826-'27; and that they are now opposed by my colleague and his political coadjutors. But lest my colleague should endeavor to break the force of this array of evidence by saying that these declarations of opinions and principles are general in their character, and do not apply to the question before the House, I respectfully invite his attention to an extract from a speech, delivered in the Senate of the United States in 1834, by the Hon. Felix Grundy, then, as now, one of the main pillars of Van Buren Democracy. It is as follows:

"I concur entirely with Mr. Jefferson in his sentiments as to what should be the conduct of Federal officers in relation to the politics of the country. That enlightened statesman was of opinion that it was 'highly culpable in Federal officers to interfere in the business of electioneering.' When writing upon this subject he says: 'Freedom of election being essential to the mutual independence of Government, and with the different branches of the same Government so vitally cherished by most of our Constitutions, it is deemed improper for officers, depending on the Executive of the Union, to attempt to control or influence the free exercise of the elective right.' He further says to the officers under him that 'he expects they will not attempt to influence the votes of others, nor take any part in the business of electioneering, that being deemed inconsistent with the Constitution, and their duties to it.'"

"In support of the opinion I entertain, I refer you to another high authority. The present Chief Magistrate (General Jackson,) in his Inaugural Address, when speaking of Executive duties which demanded particular attention, refers directly to the 'correction of those abuses that have brought the patronage of the Federal Government into conflict with the freedom of elections.' Strengthened, as I am, by these expressions of opinion, I feel the less hesitation in saying that every officer of the Federal Government is entitled to a free and uninterrupted right of suffrage, and should not be disturbed in the exercise of it; but when they become partisans in elections, and attempt to control the elective franchise in others, they should be dismissed from public employment; and I should be gratified to see this principle acted out to its fullest extent, whether the officer thus engaged act with or against the party to which I belong. When I see an office-holder interfering in elections, the first idea that strikes me is, that he is thinking of his office and his bread; and, therefore, an unfit adviser of those whose only object is the public good."

Mr. Speaker, these are principles which have ever been held by the true Republicans of our country, and they are precisely those which are now entertained by the Whig party. They are repudiated by the supporters of the present President, because they know that he was elevated to the Presidency by the violation of these principles, and that he relies upon the same "abuses in the administration of Executive patronage," which elevated him to power, to secure his re-election. Hence his partisans are driven to the necessity of renouncing the principles which they once professed, and of defending and justifying those corrupting abuses from which they formerly pretended to apprehend so much danger to the public liberty. But, sir, I have yet in reserve an authority to sustain and justify me in the position which I take upon the subject of Executive power and influence, for which I am confident my colleague feels a higher and more profound respect than for the distinguished individuals whose opinions I have brought to my aid in this discussion. It is the opinion of one no less distinguished than my colleague himself. I have already informed the House that my colleague is a new convert to Van Buren Democracy; and, like most new converts, his present zeal and devotion is in exact proportion with his past wickedness and infidelity. It will be remembered that, towards the close of General Jackson's administration, when the public mind was directed to the choice of his successor, the people of Tennessee, believing that they saw in his effort to control the selection of his successor a violation of those principles which had elevated him to power, rose up in noble resistance against his arrogant attempt to dictate to them, and nominated a distinguished citizen of their own State (Judge White) for the Presidency. Popular enthusiasm rose high in his favor; and, with few exceptions, the people of that State were united in his support. No one was louder in professions of admiration for the character and services of Judge White, and of devotion to the principles with which he stood identified, than my colleague, and no one was more bitterly vehement than he in denouncing and opposing Mr. Van Buren. He threw himself into the current, which was running strong in favor of Judge White, and was triumphantly borne by it into the Legislature of Tennessee. I was also a member of that Legislature, and was an humble co laborer in that good cause so zealously espoused and supported by my colleague.

In obedience to the mandate of the popular will, that Legislature adopted a preamble and resolutions formally presenting Judge White to the people of the United States as a candidate for the Presidency, in which they enumerated the objects which they had in view in seeking to elevate him to that high station, as follows:

"1. To secure to the people the exercise of the right of suffrage in the election of the President of the United States, independent of the influence and dictation of caucus nominations.

"2. To resist the establishment of the practice of electing the President according to any plan of regular succession among the great functionaries of the Government.

"3. The limitation and control of Executive patronage within such safe and expedient bounds as to secure the freedom and purity of the elective franchise against all undue official influences."

Mr. Speaker, I need not say that the bill under consideration aims at the accomplishment of the object last specified in the extract which I have just read. My colleague voted for that preamble; and so conspicuous had been his zeal on that occasion, that he was selected by the presiding officer of the House of Representatives to be one of a committee which was appointed to inform Judge White of his nomination by the Legislature as a candidate for the Presidency; and as my colleague has thought proper to denounce that distinguished individual in the grossest and most unsparing terms, on more than one occasion during the present session of Congress, I will read the letter which that committee addressed to him, that the House may see how great has been the change in the opinions of my colleague in relation to men as well as principles:

"NASHVILLE, Oct. 23, 1835.

"To the Hon. HUGH L. WHITE:

"SIR: The undersigned have been appointed a committee of the General Assembly to inform you that the people of the State of Tennessee have, by their Representatives, nominated you to their fellow-citizens of the United States for the office of Chief Magistrate. This duty we conceive will be best discharged by communicating to you the preamble and resolutions adopted by both Houses of the General Assembly. From them you will learn the principles upon which the nomination was made. These, as also the attending circumstances, we take leave to say, appear to us no less honorable to the people of the State than to yourself. By this act they have shown a discrimination and devotion to principle worthy the imitation of posterity.

"We avail ourselves of this occasion to tender to you the assurances of our esteem and veneration for your character, and our ardent wishes for your personal happiness."

Then follow the signatures of the committee, my colleague [HARVEY M. WATTERSON] being one of the number.

Such, sir, was the political position of my colleague in 1835; and such the evidence upon which I rely to sustain the position which I assumed in reference to him at the outset of my remarks. What new lights have beamed upon his vision to work such a marvellous change in his principles, and in his opinions of men, I will not conjecture; but, when I shall have finished his political history, I think it probable that every gentleman on this floor will be able to judge of that question in a manner quite satisfactory to himself. The great political battle was fought, and victory perched upon the standard of Mr. Van Buren. His predecessor, at the head of his trained band—his corps of a hundred thousand office holders, whom Mr. Buchanan (a leader of the Van Buren party) once styled "the hired soldiers of the President," proved to be an overmatch for those who struggled against a combination so powerful. But the political banner which Tennessee had unfurled was nobly upborne by her sons; and though struck down elsewhere, it waved in proud and glorious triumph within her own borders. In the summer of 1837, another election was held in that State for members of Congress and the Legislature. The same questions entered into that election which had controlled the preceding one. Those who had opposed the election of Mr. Van Buren, with few exceptions, stood forth in opposition to his Administration, declaring that the war against him should never end until the principles of Republicanism, which had been violated in his election, should be vindicated and re established, and the injuries inflicted upon the spirit of the Constitution repressed and repaired. The people rallied to the support of their principles, and returned to the Legislature a large majority of members opposed to the Administration of Mr. Van Buren. My colleague was not a candidate for re-election; but, very soon after the result of the contest was known, he forwarded to me his congratulations upon the success of the Opposition, with an announcement that he would be a candidate for clerk of the Legislature, of which I had been elected a member. The Legislature convened; a large majority, as I before remarked, being opposed to the Administration of Mr. Van Buren. My colleague, in accordance with the previous intimation which I had received from him, became a candidate for a clerkship, and was elected. I will not say, nor do I believe, that his opposition to Mr. Van Buren was the only merit which gave him a claim to that station; but, certain I am that he could not have procured it if he had occupied even a doubtful position on that question. Meanwhile, the supporters of Mr. Van Buren, though repeatedly defeated, had never despaired of ultimately effecting a political revolution in Tennessee. The patronage of the Federal Government was steadily and effectively employed for the consummation of that object.

By artfully addressing himself to the cupidity of the avaricious, and to the ambition of the aspiring spirits of that State, the President succeeded in enlisting to his support some of the most talented and influential men in Tennessee, who, with zeal, sharpened and stimulated by the hope of reward or promotion, effectively exerted themselves to induce the people to believe that it was their interest and their duty to ground the arms of opposition to Mr. Van Buren, and give him their support. By such means as these, a considerable diversity of political opinion was created in the public mind; and, in some parts of the State, very great changes in favor of Mr. Van Buren had been effected. In the Congressional districts which was then represented by Mr. Polk, but which is now represented by my colleague, [Mr. WATTERSON,] a complete revolution in public sentiment had been effected. In the autumn of 1838, James K. Polk, then Speaker of this House, announced himself as a candidate for the office of Governor of Tennessee, for the well understood purpose of revolutionizing that State in reference to national politics, with a view to the accomplishment of ulterior objects connected with his own political aggrandizement. His character as a popular orator, and the extraneous aid which it was known would be brought to his support, inspired the Van Buren party with lively hopes of success, and stimulated them to another desperate struggle. Throughout the length and breadth of Tennessee, "the busy note of preparation" sounded; and the champions on either side were girding themselves for the conflict. It was obvious to all that a struggle for political supremacy between the two parties, more fierce and terrible than any which had preceded it, was about being made. It was a time to "try the souls of men." It was a time when "summer soldiers and sunshine patriots" would shrink from the severe encounter, and when each "ture man" would nobly and fearlessly stand forth to maintain and defend, at all hazards, the cause and the principles which his conscience and his reason approved.

At the moment when the first battle call rose upon the breeze—when the first war cry of the enemy was heard in the distance, and answering shouts of defiance from those whose souls were determined and unterrified, gave evidence that the battle was about to begin, and that "danger and death" would be the order of the day—my colleague skulked away from the standard which he had followed so long—abandoned the cause and the principles to which he had professed to be so warmly devoted—deserted his friends in their hour of utmost need and peril—joined the enemy—took a commission in his service—turned his sword against his friends, and became the slanderer and revil er of those for whom he had previously professed the warmest personal and political friendship!!

Mr. Speaker, my colleague took occasion, at an early period of this session, upon a question about which he and myself differed in opinion, to express his regret that we could not "stand shoulder to shoulder" upon a subject in relation to which the interests of our constituents were the same. Sir, I do not desire to offend my colleague; but, after the experience I have already had of an alliance with him, I cannot resist the impulse which prompts me to tell him that it can never hereafter be a cause of regret with me to find him in opposition to me upon any subject whatever. I deem it safer to contend with him as an adversary, than to rely upon him as a friend. No man fears to encounter an enemy who advances boldly and undisguisedly to the front, challenging to the conflict; but the bravest may well fear the stiletto thrusts of falsehearted and perfidious friends. I am contending now for the same principles for which I contended when my acquaintance with my colleague commenced in the Legislature of Tennessee, in 1835. Nothing has transpired since that time to weaken my convictions of the correctness of those principles, or create a doubt of the propriety of the opposition which was then made by the people of Tennessee to the election of Mr. Van Buren. I can conceive of no cause which can justify my colleague in the course which he has thought proper to pursue; and I tell him again, once for all, that I cannot and do not appreciate the regret which he expressed. Not content with having renounced principles the maintenance of which he once declared to be essential to the preservation of the public liberty, and with having abandoned friends for whom he professed the highest esteem, he seeks to commend himself to the favor of his new political associates, by violently denouncing his former principles, and vilifying the friends to whom he pretended to be so much devoted. When he addressed the House upon the bill now under consideration, he alluded to the votes of the two Senators who recently represented the State of Tennessee in the other end of this Capitol, upon a bill introduced in the Senate by Mr. Crittenden of Kentucky, somewhat similar in its provisions to the one under consideration. He characterized those Senators, and their political friends in Tennessee, as apostates and Federalists, and informed the House that the votes which they gave in favor of that bill had been fatal to them—that they were politically dead. If they are indeed dead, why does my colleague assault them so furiously? Does my colleague [Mr. WATTERSON] possess that unenviable courage which prompted Falstaff to thrust his sword into a dead hero? Does he delight to mangle dead bodies? Will he, like Falstaff, claim to be made a Duke, as a reward for his chivalry? Or to be appointed Receiver General? Or have his services requited by any other office within the gift of the Executive? If those gentlemen are, as my colleague says, politically prostrate in the State of Tennessee, why does he travel out of his way to denounce them? Is he under the control of that principle of human nature which makes a man, who is conscious of having injured another, pursue the injured individual with unrelenting and unforgiving hatred? One of the Senators whom he denounced [Judge White] was, at that time, confined to a bed of sickness, from which it was not expected he would recover. Since that time, he had paid the last debt of nature. He has passed the "Undiscovered bourne, whence no traveller returns."

He has stood before that dread tribunal before which all must stand. He is a tenant of the tomb. Will the grave shelter him from that malignity which in his lifetime never slept? May he not find a refuge in death from that storm of slander and detraction with which his political enemies sought to overwhelm him, before death had robbed them of their victim? But sir, I deny that he is politically dead. The purity and severe simplicity of his life—the stern integrity of his character—his incorruptible patriotism—his long and illustrious services to his country, remain the property of his countrymen, in whose gratitude and affection he will live forever; and fathers and mothers will point their children to his history, as furnishing an example for them to imitate, when the names and memories of those who reviled him while living, and who will slander him when dead, shall be buried in the grave of eternal oblivion. The other distinguished individual to whom my colleague alluded as being politically dead, [Mr. FOSTER,] is not dead, physically or politically. True, his political opponents, through a combination of adventitious circumstances, which will never again exist, obtained a majority in the last Legislature of Tennessee, and gave instructions to Mr. Foster and his colleague (Judge White) which honor and patriotism forbade them to obey. They resigned their seats, and appealed from the Legislature to the people—from a packed jury to an honest one. Judge White was not permitted to live until the verdict of the people was rendered; but Mr. Foster is before them, ably and manfully vindicating himself and his deceased colleague. The people have awarded to him the privilege of speaking for himself. He is speaking to them the words of "truth and soberness," which sink deep into their hearts and understandings. He is scattering the seed of truth upon good ground, which will bring forth the fruit of political regeneration and redemption, to the mortification of my colleague [Mr. WATTERSON] and his political coadjutors in Tennessee.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am aware that it is quite unnecessary for me to defend Judge White or Mr. Foster from the denunciations of my colleague. Their fame and characters rest upon a basis too broad to be shaken by his puny arm. I will therefore proceed to notice other matters introduced by him into this debate, many of them of a character so paltry and contemptible that I feel it to be a humiliating necessity which imposes upon me the task of discussing them. He undertook to defend the Administration of Mr. Van Buren against the charges which have been made against it in relation to the extraordinary defalcations of public officers which have occurred; and for this purpose he read from an official communication made by Levi Woodbury, purporting to show that the losses to Government, on account of the defalcation of public officers, had been greater under the Administration of Mr. Adams than under that of General Jackson, in proportion to the amounts collected and disbursed. Without saying any thing in read to the credibility of the evidence which my colleague introduces to sustain his position—but, for the sake of argument, admitting it to be true—does it constitute a defence of Mr. Van Buren's administration? The same officer has informed us that the whole amount of losses to the Government, on account of defalcations, from its commencement up to 1837, the beginning of Mr. Van Buren's administration, was 2,038,594 81; and we know that accident has developed to our knowledge the defalcations of two individuals, who have plundered from the public Treasury since that time $1,297,829 75! How many millions have been plundered of which we are uninformed, and will ever remain uninformed, I will not undertake to conjecture. But, sir, let justice be done. Let not the partisans of Mr. Van Buren be permitted to throw around him the character and popularity of General Jackson, to protect him from the public indignation and disapprobation.

The next great question which my colleague introduced to the consideration of the House was a Whig committee of Cincinnati, which he says have taken General Harrison under their especial keeping, and will not permit him to write or speak, or in any manner publish to the world the principles which will govern his administration, in the event that he is elected President of the United States. I reply to that portion of my colleague's speech by reading a short extract from Gen. Harrison's letter accepting the nomination of the Harrisburg Convention as a candidate for the Presidency. It is as follows:

"It may, perhaps, be expected that I should embrace this occasion to declare the principles upon which the Administration will be conducted, if the efforts of my friends to place me in the Presidential chair should prove successful. But having, in a letter to the honorable Harmar Denny, and in another to the honorable Sherrod Williams, both of which have been made public, given my views at some length of the character and extent of powers vested by the Constitution in the President, I consider it unnecessary to repeat them here."

If my colleague desires to know what are the principles of General Harrison, let him read the letters to which he refers, in the extract which I have read; let him read the speeches of Gen. Harrison, made in Congress and out of Congress; let him read his country's history, made bright and glorious by the DEEDS of General Harrison; and if all this will not satisfy him, let him go to those fields where the bloodiest battles have been fought in defence of his country: and he will find the principles of Gen. Harrison written upon them in characters of blood. The illustrious deeds of Gen. Harrison, in the Senate Chamber and upon the battle fields of his country, give to his friends satisfactory assurance of the soundness of his principles, and the exaltation of his patriotism, and furnish a better guarantee than written or verbal declarations, that if he shall be elected to the Presidential chair, he will so administer the Government as to promote the happiness and prosperity of the people, and advance the honor and glory of the nation.

My colleague has applied to Levi Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury, for a statement of the compensation which General Harrison has received from the Government for the services which he has rendered in the various public stations which he has filled during a long and eventful life, most of which has been spent in the service of his country. It would seem that the accommodating Secretary was quite happy to have it in his power to furnish the information sought for by my colleague; and the musty records of the past not having been destroyed by the fire which consumed the Treasury building in 1833, the whole clerical force of the Treasury Department seems to have been brought into requisition, by order of the Secretary, to furnish to my colleague the desired official statement, from which it appears that General Harrison has, during his life, received from the Government, as compensation, an aggregate sum of upwards of seventy thousand dollars. This official statement is embodied in the speech of my colleague, and sent forth to the people, for the double purpose of correcting the impression which is abroad in the land, that Gen. Harrison is not wealthy, and to satisfy the people that he has no claim upon their gratitude. This grand political movement of my colleague and the Secretary of the Treasury will doubtless constitute an era in the annals of political warfare. When the people are hereafter called upon to decide between the conflicting claims of rival aspirants to the Presidency, they will, I suppose, only have to ascertain the respective amounts which the rival candidates have received from the Treasury, and give their votes to him who has received the smallest sum. This new mode of testing merit emanates from a source so high and respectable, that it is certainly entitled to serious consideration. For my own part, I desire to see an immediate experimental application of the principle. I have not applied to the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish to me statements of the compensation which Mr. Van Buren has from time to time received. But we know that, when the present year shall have expired, he will have been four years President of the United States, receiving an annual salary of twenty-five thousand dollars, making an aggregate of one hundred thousand dollars which he has received for his services as President of the United States. We know that he has been four years Vice President of the United States, receiving an annual salary of five thousand dollars, making an aggregate of twenty thousand dollars which he has received for his services as Vice President of the United States. We know that he has been minister to England, receiving for his services in that capacity the usual outfit and salary, making an aggregate of eighteen thousand dollars which he has received for his services as minister to England. These items, added together, amount to the sum of one hundred and thirty-eight thousand dollars. If to this was added the compensation which Mr. Van Buren has received for his services in various other public stations, it would appear that he has received from the Government a sum more than double the amount which has been received by General Harrison. Thus you see, sir, that, under the new test of merit which my colleague and Mr. Woodbury seem disposed to introduce, General Harrison still occupies the vantage ground. Compare the services rendered to his country with those of Mr. Van Buren, and the contrast will be more striking in favor of Gen. Harrison. What public service has Mr. Van Buren ever rendered which conferred honor upon his country, or dispensed blessings to his countrymen?

Mr. Speaker, my colleague was pleased to treat the House with a review of several Whig conventions which have recently assembled in different parts of the United States, and to favor us with sketches of the lives and characters of the individuals who composed those conventions. He read a statement from a newspaper in Ohio, (the publishers of which have, for many years past, been quartered upon the public Treasury, and have received from it large amounts of money,) in relation to a convention which recently assembled at Columbus, in that State. That statement is so glaringly and extravagantly false, that I deem it unnecessary to notice it. I cannot forbear, however, to express my surprise and astonishment that my colleague should have felt himself authorized to embody that statement in his printed speech, and suppress the remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. BOND,) exposing the falsehood of that statement, and the infamous character of its authors. But my colleague, no doubt, thinks he has a right to select for himself a code of morals by which to govern his own conduct; and I therefore, without further remark upon that part of his speech which related to the Columbus convention, proceed to notice his review of the Harrisburg convention, which nominated Gen. Harrison as a candidate for the Presidency. That convention consisted of 240 or 250 members—gentlemen of character and distinction from almost every State in the Union, who met together for the purpose of securing harmony and concert of action upon a subject of absorbing interest to themselves and their countrymen generally. They were not the "hired soldiers of the President," who met to devise measures to sustain power in its encroachments upon popular liberty; but they were FREEMEN, who, in the exercise of a constitutional right, met together to devise measures for the perpetuation of that freedom which they inherited from their ancestors. A man who could number among his phrenological developments the organ of conscientiousness, would feel it to be a delicate task to undertake, upon his own responsibility, to publish histories of the past lives, the present political position, and future purposes and objects of such an assemblage of gentlemen. Biographical historians generally devote much time and labor to the collection of materials for writing the life of a single individual, and are careful to know that their information is collected from authentic and reliable sources. But my colleague, being gifted in a peculiar and extraordinary manner with unparalleled unscrupulousness, and reckless of the injustice which he is likely to inflict, enters upon the task of giving to the public the private and public history of 240 individuals, with whom he is unacquainted, and of whose lives and characters he knows nothing. Surely my colleague will secure to himself all the benefits of his new discovery in literature, by procuring a patent right. Certain I am, that his friends will insist upon his persevering in this new field of ambitious adventure. They will conclude that, if he cannot win a fame as immortal as Plutarch's, he may, nevertheless, reasonably hope to achieve a notoriety as enviable as that of Baron Munchausen. It is a maxim, sir, the truth of which is, I believe, generally conceded, that no man is so entirely vicious as not to possess some redeeming virtue; or so good as not to possess some vicious frailty. But it seems that this maxim does not apply to the members of the Harrisburg Convention; for my colleague has not been able to find in the character of any one of the individuals who composed that convention, a single redeeming virtue upon which to bestow his commendation; but, on the contrary, he finds, in the character and history of each one, something which he seems to imagine will disparage him in public estimation. Some of them he writes down as lawyers, some as traders and speculators—others as merchants, Abolitionists, Federalists, Aristocrats, men of pleasure, men of leisure, &c.—all of which terms he seems to use as if they implied odium and disparagement. If all that my colleague has published in relation to the pursuits and avocations of those who composed the Harrisburg Convention be true, what does it prove? What does it establish? How does he intend to apply his facts, if they be facts? What is the argument? It is all quite incomprehensible to me. I regret that my colleague was not more luminous. What does he mean? Are they not all American citizens? Would my colleague proscribe them on account of their avocations or pursuits? Is it thus that his Democracy exhibits itself? I had believed that true Democracy recognised as true the maxim that "worth makes the man, and want of it the fellow;" and I had supposed it to be a cardinal principle in the creed of Democracy that all men are entitled to equal political rights, irrespective of their trades, callings, pursuits, or professions. I am, therefore, unable to understand why my colleague seeks to disparage the nominee of the Harrisburg Convention, because there were lawyers, doctors, merchants, &c. &c. in that Convention; and I am surprised beyond expression that he should labor to excite public prejudice against lawyers: for, if I am not much mistaken, some very generous judge has given him a license to practice law in the courts of Tennessee. Whether he has ever found an individual so simple and credulous as to become his client, I am uninformed. Nevertheless, he is a member of the legal profession; and "'tis strange, passing strange, pitiful, wondrous pitiful," that he should seek to accomplish a political object by disparaging the profession of which he is a member. My colleague, in his extreme anxiety to find something to disparage each member of the Harrisburg Convention, writes down some gentlemen as men of pleasure, and others as men of leisure! Sir, these terms are exceedingly vague. They do not convey to the mind a distinct idea of the characters which he attempts to delineate. They may apply to me: for, when at home, I am not a day laborer, and am quite fond of leisure. Does my colleague mean to convey the idea that it is criminal to indulge in leisure? Does he use the term in an odious sense? These terms might, with much propriety, be applied to my colleague, or to any lawyer who, like him, has no professional duties to perform, except to make a daily visit to his office, to see that the sign board maintains its place over the door, to give notice to the world that the occupant is a waiting candidate for "fees and fame." A man of leisure! I know of none who enjoy so much leisure as the planters of the South, who have been generally admitted to be pre-eminent in those noble qualities and manly virtues which give dignity to human nature. I do not comprehend my colleague. I am sorry that he was not more intelligible. After completing his biographical view of the members of the convention, he condenses an expression of his object into one sentence, by saying that they are men "who have no interests in common with the great body of the people." The farmers were not there in their proper persons, and my colleague no doubt hopes to induce them to vote against the nominee of the Harrisburg Convention, by exciting their prejudices against those who nominated him; by telling them that the convention was composed of lawyers, doctors, merchants, &c. "who have no interests in common with the great body of the people." Is he not aware of the fact that it is very much the custom of the American people to entrust the performance of public duties to lawyers and other professional characters? Let him look around this hall—upon his own political friends, and he will see that the proportion of lawyers, merchants, &c. is as great upon this floor, as it was in the Harrisburg convention. I am a farmer—my colleague is a lawyer. I arrogate to myself no superior claim to public confidence over him on that account. On the contrary, I do not hesitate to declare it as my opinion that the study and practice of the law give a training to the mental faculties, a discipline to the mind, which, when united with talents and integrity, qualify a man better than any thing else can for usefulness in public life. Talents, integrity, and patriotism, are confined to no particular profession or avocation; and, wherever found, the possessor is entitled to honor, to trust, and to confidence. But, sir, if my colleague will insist upon establishing an arbitrary test of merit, which shall exclude all who are not farmers from participating in public affairs, he will find that it will be very fatal to that political party whose ascendency he seems to have so much at heart. Mr. Van Buren, the chief of that party, is a lawyer, as also are a large majority of his supporters in both Houses of Congress. General Harrison is a farmer; and although I am not prejudiced against lawyers, I most sincerely believe that the farmers of the United States will very much promote their own interest and that of their countrymen generally, by elevating to the Presidency the man who has faithfully served the Republic in many important civil stations; who nobly and valiantly defended his country when the storm of war raged within its borders; and who now, when peace blesses the land, lives in republican simplicity, upon his own farm, devoting himself to the pure, virtuous, and manly pursuits of agriculture.

Mr. Speaker, it is the habit of Mr. Van Buren's supporters to rely very much upon the force of names. They entertain an opinion very different from that of the poet, who said, "What's in a name? A rose by any other name would smell as sweet." And they hope to disguise the enormity of their principles and practices, and render their political opponents odious to the people, by applying to them unpopular names. Hence, they assume that all who oppose the re election of Mr. Van Buren are Federalists, and that all of his opponents who live north of Mason and Dixon's line, are Abolitionists. Proceeding upon these broad and false assumptions, my colleague, in his review of the Harrisburg Convention, writes down many of the gentlemen who composed that assemblage as Federalists and Abolitionists, hoping thereby to aid the exertions which the leaders of his party are making to induce the people of the Southern States to believe that General Harrison is an Abolitionist and a Federalist. My colleague did not openly and manfully make the charge that General Harrison is an Abolitionist, because he knew that the charge would be promptly met, and its falsehood proven; and therefore, he chose to deal in "damnable hints and diabolical muendoes," accomplishing his object by indirection, and avoiding the responsibility of making a false charge. I propose, sir, to expose the injustice of this disguised imputation. No gentleman upon this floor has ventured to make the charge that General Harrison is an Abolitionist. No man of common sense and common information believes him to be one. No man who will refer to the course which he pursued in this House, upon the application of Missouri for admission into the Union, and take the trouble to examine his opinions, as expressed in various letters and speeches, can for a moment doubt that he is as free as any living man from this odious imputation; and I do not hesitate to declare it as my opinion, that not one of the gentlemen of this House who have garbled his letters and speeches for the purpose of making the people believe him to be an Abolitionist, do themselves believe it. Yet they do not hesitate to inflict the deepest injustice upon General Harrison, by making the people believe him an Abolitionist. I am not so profoundly versed in ethics as to be able to draw the distinction between the moral guilt of originating an untruth, and that of endeavoring by such means to make the people believe a falsehood.

[Mr. COOPER of Georgia rose, and, in substance, said that without undertaking to say whether or not General Harrison was an Abolitionist, his party was identified with them; and that, if elected President, his administration would be controlled by them; and that this was the issue which he desired to present to the country.]

Mr. GENTRY resumed his remarks. I understand the gentleman from Georgia to say that, while he declines to make the charge that General Harrison is himself an Abolitionist, he contends that he is supported by them for the Presidency; and that Abolition influence will control his Administration. In some of the States of this Union the people are very equally divided between the two great political parties, and the Abolitionists hold the balance of power between them, and can, by uniting with the one or the other party, control the election; and doubtless Mr. Van Buren or General Harrison will be very willing to receive their support in any of the States thus situated. As for myself, solemnly believing that the defeat of the party which has for so many years wielded the power of the Government is demanded by the best interests of the people and the Government, I sincerely hope that the Abolitionists will co-operate in the accomplishment of that object in all the States which are situated as I have described. But, sir, we have the most indubitable evidence that such will not be the case; for the leaders of the Abolitionists have nominated candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency of their own party, and, at this time, are making vigorous and successful exertions to establish a separate and independent political organization. The premises of the gentlemen are false, and his conclusion is absurd. It is not true that General Harrison is the candidate of the Abolitionists; and, if it was true, that they are supporting him for the Presidency, it would still be absurd to conclude that they would control his Administration. It is an undeniable truth, that the leading men and principal newspapers of the Abolitionists have been actively and zealously opposing the election of General Harrison, and have denounced him for his ultra opposition to their views. Yet, in defiance of these well known facts, gentlemen iterate and reiterate the charge that General Harrison is the candidate of the Abolitionists; and that the Southern States of the Union cannot, consistently with their peculiar interests, support him for the Presidency. Who can believe that General Harrison would, in any event, countenance the schemes of those fanatics?—schemes which jeopard the integrity of the Union—that Union which he has made so many sacrifices to maintain, and so often perilled his life to defend.

Sir, it is a well known fact that the Abolitionists have never been united upon political questions, but have co-operated with the one party or the other, and been governed in their party associations, like other citizens, exclusively by local circumstances—by their individual opinions, partialities, or prejudices; and it is extremely absurd to make the charge of Abolition against either of the candidates for the Presidency, because they are or have been supported by Abolitionists. We may, more reasonably, look upon the conduct of those distinguished individuals, in relation to the admission of Missouri into the Union, as furnishing a true index to their principles upon that question, so peculiarly interesting to the Southern portion of this Republic. At that time, neither of them were aspirants to the Presidency; and there was no motive to induce either one of them to conceal his true principles, or profess those which he did not in truth entertain. What, sir, was the nature of that question? The people of Missouri applied for admission into the Union as a State. The Northern portion of the Republic insisted upon making it a condition of that admission that slavery should be prohibited within the limits of Missouri. The Southern States regarded this movement as a development of principles and purposes of a most alarming character, and as vitally involving that peculiar interest which is now attacked by the Abolitionists. They stood forth, as one man, in indignant opposition to the restriction which the North desired to impose. The North was equally earnest and uncompromising in its opposition to the admission of Missouri, except upon the condition which I have mentioned. In this conflict of opinions, of feelings, and of interests, between the Northern and Southern sections of the Union, each became furiously excited—excited to a degree which menaced civil war, and imminently threatened a dissolution of the Union. At that most perilous period of our history, when the peculiar institution of the South was in such imminent jeopardy, where was General Harrison? He was a member of this House—the Representative of a constituency whose opinions and prejudices were adverse to the feelings and interests of the South upon the pending question; but he, like a true patriot, nobly stood forth to maintain the compromise of the Constitution, and sacrified himself in the performance of a duty which patriotism enjoined. Where was Martin Van Buren, and what was his conduct upon that memorable occasion? He was in the Legislature of New York; and, deaf to the calls of patriotism, but obedient to the promptings of a selfish ambition, he voted to instruct the Senators of that State to vote against the admission of Missouri into the Union, except upon the condition that slavery should be prohibited within her borders. These facts present the character and conduct of General Harrison in most favorable contrast with Mr. Van Buren. To charge that General Harrison is an Abolitionist, or that he would in any event countenance their foolish and diabolical schemes, is a violation of truth and justice—of common sense and common decency.

During the political canvass in Tennessee last summer, when it was supposed that Mr. Clay would be supported for the Presidency by the Whig party, in opposition to Mr. Van Buren, the partisans of the latter gentleman declared to the people that Mr. Clay was identified with the Abolitionists; and he was slandered and reviled by that party then, upon the subject of Abolition, as much as Gen. Harrison is now. But so soon as it was ascertained in that State that General Harrison had been nominated by the Harrisburg Convention, they changed their ground, and wept crocodile tears over the fate of Mr. Clay, who, they said, had been sacrificed in deference to the Abolitionists, on account of his warm and noble devotion to Southern interests. The people of the South remember these things, and will no longer be deceived upon this subject by a party which practises such gross inconsistency, and which is willing thus to violate truth and justice, to accomplish a party object. This question, in all its bearings, has been so fully discussed before the people that they can no longer be deceived in relation to it. Politicians affect to be in extreme agony because, as they pretend, they do not know the opinions of Gen. Harrison upon the subject of Abolition. Those of the people who are most interested in that question are well satisfied about it. They have General Harrison's speeches and letters, openly disavowing and denouncing Abolition schemes and doctrines; and they ask no renewal of these pledges. That pledges should be exacted from Mr. Van Buren was just and natural, for the obvious reason that his votes and previous course had been against the South. In reply to inquiries put to him before his election, he declared that he would veto any bill that should propose to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, without the consent of Maryland and Virginia; and very safely might he give that pledge, because it referred to a state of things which he well knew would not come to pass. But when pressed with the constitutional question, whether Congress had the power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, the wary gentleman said: "I would not, from the lights before me, feel authorized to pronounce that Congress does not possess the power of interfering with or abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia."

What was the response of General Harrison to a similar question? In his letter to Judge Berrien, of Georgia, and in a letter to Mr. Slos, of New Orleans, he has expressly denied the constitutional power of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia: and yet, with preposterous folly, the South is invoked to support Mr. Van Buren, and to reject General Harrison, upon the ground that the former is sounder upon the subject of Abolition than the latter.

But there were Federalists in the Harrisburg Convention! So says my colleague; and he is very unhappy because General Harrison has not given a new confession of his political faith—as if there could be any doubt about his principles after he has avowed and been openly contending for them for so many years. But there were "Federalists" there! Horrible, indeed!! What do gentlemen mean by that term? As employed in the writings and speeches of modern times, the word "Federalist" seems to mean any thing or nothing, as party expediency dictates. So various are the senses in which it is employed, that I think there ought to be a convention of learned men assembled to settle and define its meaning. But admitting that there were Federalists at Harrisburg—what then? It only shows that there was a diversity of sentiment among the friends of General Harrison—and what of that? My colleague seems to think it very criminal that they did not happen to think exactly alike upon all political questions. Did a political party ever exist who were perfectly agreed in all their opinions? Is the Van Buren party thus united? They all call themselves Democrats; but a Democrat in South Carolina is a man bitterly opposed to a protective tariff, while a Democrat in Pennsylvania is in favor of a high protective tariff. And will my colleague deny the Democracy of the Keystone State? Does he mean to put Pennsylvania out of his political church?

Democracy in Pennsylvania can sanction that which Democracy dare not sanction in any of the Southern States. Yet I hear no complaint from my colleague about diversity of opinion in the Democratic family. In the Southern States General Harrison is called a Federalist because he was in favor of a protective tariff. What has been the course of Mr. Van Buren in relation to the tariff? It has been said that the election of General Harrison is to revive the protective tariff; now, on that point, I ask, what is the difference between the two candidates? Has Harrison ever gone further than Van Buren in favor of protection? I answer, no! Mr. Van Buren voted for the tariff of 1824; and he did it without instructions, from his own personal conviction of its propriety. And he voted for the tariff of 1828. To make this vote of Mr. Van Buren acceptable to the South, it was proclaimed that he voted under the constraint of instructions from his State, but directly contrary to his own personal convictions. But who does not know that this is untrue? Who will deny, here in his place, that those famous instructions which, they tell us, laid such violent constraint on Mr. Van Buren's will, were, in fact, made to order? It has been openly averred, and never yet contradicted. I repeat the assertion, here in my place, justly estimating the responsibility which the declaration imposes, that those instructions were got up in the Legislature of New York at Mr. Van Buren's own suggestion; that the action of the New York Legislature was suggested by Mr. Van Buren, and approved by him after the instructions had passed.

Yes, sir, whilst Mr. Van Buren was making in the Senate, to the Representatives of the South, hypocritical professions of hostility to that measure—knowing that he would, in due time, receive instructions from the Legislature of New York—he was, at the same time, writing home to his friends in Albany, assuring them that, if the bill did not pass into a law, it should not be for the want of his most earnest exertions!!!

His confidential friends at Albany knew that he desired the shelter of such instructions, and they urged the Legislature to pass them with the express understanding that they were needed as an apology to the South for his voting for the "bill of abominations." Will any gentleman here deny it? Will any Representative from the State of New York rise and contradict this statement? If he does, I will prove it in the most authentic form. Let not the South be longer deluded by Mr. Van Buren's pretended devotion to Southern interests; for I repeat that, in relation to the tariff and abolition, Mr. Van Buren's claim to Southern support is not so strong or well founded as General Harrison's; and the preposterous absurdity of the position maintained by the supporters of Mr. Van Buren in the South, that to have been favorable to the policy of a protective tariff and internal improvements by the General Government constitutes a Federalist, is proven by the course of Mr. Van Buren in reference to those questions, and by the various and discordant opinions of his supporters in different sections of the Union. But when my colleague fancies that he has discovered some contrariety of opinion in the Whig party, he affects the utmost horror and dismay, and forthwith blows a blast, loud and long, upon his alarm trumpet, to frighten the good people from the support of such a party. I see sitting by the side of my colleague the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOWARD,] who made, upon this floor, some weeks ago, a most able and eloquent argument to prove that the Constitution has conferred upon the Federal Government the power to make internal improvements; and that it is expedient to exercise that power. Is he denounced as a Federalist because he entertains these views? No, sir, no; he is a favorite of his party. Yet, in the Southern States of this Union, the supporters of Mr. Van Buren, who claim to be the only true Democrats, assert that the doctrine urged with so much ability by that gentleman is the most damning proof of Federalism. Thus it is, sir, that in different parts of the country different standards of political orthodoxy are erected to suit the purposes of party: whilst every where the supporters of the Administration claim to be the only true Democrats, and denounce their opponents as Federalists. It is by the application of this rule, I presume, that my colleague proves that there were Federalists in the Harrisburg Convention. Yet it is true that there are individuals co-operating with the Whig party who were originally Federalists; and it is equally true that very many of the most distinguished leaders of the Van Buren party were originally Federalists. Need I refer to the long list of such gentlemen who are prominent supporters of Mr. Van Buren, so triumphantly produced, some days ago, by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MORGAN?] To affix the term Federalist to either of the rival parties which now struggle for political supremacy, as a party designation, is an absurdity. It suits the purposes of the Administration party to employ the word to disparage their opponents, but, in so doing, they reflect upon the most prominent men of their own party.

Every well-informed man knows that the questions which led to the adoption of the terms "Democrats" and "Federalists," as party designations, have long ago been settled. So far, however, as the principles which originally led to the adoption of the terms are involved in the political contest which is now pending, the Whig party maintain the principles of the old Republican party, and our modern self-styled Democrats are advocating, in some very important particulars, the principles of the old Federal party. The Republican party of our early history were opposed to the extension of the Executive power. Their great dread was the concentration of power in the Executive, and the breaking down of those lines of separation which the Constitution had established between the different departments of the Government. They were essentially and in principle Whigs. The term Whig implies opposition to the encroachments of power against popular rights. It is a term gloriously associated with the struggles of freedom against tyranny in England and in our own country. It is, in truth, but another name for that party in a state which, to protect the rights and liberties of the people, firmly resists the encroachments of power. But, sir, by the grossest perversion of terms, the attempt is pertinaciously made by those who tamely and unscrupulously support the President in all his measures, to deceive the people in relation to the principles and objects of the contending political parties, by applying to the opponents of the Administration epithets which are used by unprincipled partisans to convey the idea of enmity to popular liberty and to the rights and happiness of the people. That man has studied the pages of history and the volume of human nature to but little purpose, who has not learned that ambitious and unprincipled men always seek their own aggrandizement, by making hypocritical professions of love for the people, and of devotion to their rights and liberties. The people of the United States are awake to the hypocrisy of such pretensions, and can no longer be deceived. They have learned, by bitter and severe experience, that this eternal cry of Democracy, Democracy, and these false professions of love of the people and devotion to their liberty and happiness which are constantly dinned into their ears by that party which has so long wielded and abused the powers of Government, are like the song of the Syrens, which enchanted but to destroy. And, sir, they have aroused, like a giant from his slumber, to burst asunder the shackles of party, and to prove the legitimacy of their descent from the heroes and sages of the Revolution by redeeming the free institutions of their country from the hands of the "spoilsmen." They can no longer be deceived with a false issue. The evils which misrule has brought upon the country are now so severely felt by people that demagoguism can no longer conceal from them the true causes of those evils. They will remember that the party in power won their confidence by loudly promising retrenchment and reform, and a faithful administration of the Government for the happiness and welfare of the people. They see and feel that these promises have been shamefully broken; that the expenditures of the Government have been increased beyond all former precedent; and that vast sums of the public treasure have been wasted in the most wanton and profligate manner; and, instead of a correction of abuses in the administration of the Government, they see corruption walking abroad in the land, with bribes in her hand, debasing the public morals, and lowering the standard of public virtue. It is vain to tell them that the exigencies of the public service have demanded so profuse an expenditure. What have you to show for it? Where are your achievements? Where shall we look for them? Have you provided for the public defence? Let the official communications of the Secretaries of War and of the Navy, telling us of the dilapidated condition of our fortifications, and the decaying condition of our navy, answer the question. Have you, after expending more than twenty millions of dollars in the prosecution of the Florida war, conquered the Seminoles? Let the blood which is streaming from innocent women and children, murdered by the tomahawks of unconquered savages, answer the question. What have you achieved to compensate the people for the immense expenditure of their money? You can make no satisfactory response to the question. No subterfuges or sophistries which your ingenuity can invent will satisfy them that you have not been criminally faithless to the trust which has been confided to you. The people will look back to the period of the last war, when our country contended with the most powerful nation of the world, whose fleets rode upon every sea, and hovered around every harbor; and whose armies, flushed with European victories, and leagued with a savage foe, traversed our territory, and ravaged our country; and they will not fail to demand of you to explain how it happens that the expenditures of the Government, during that gloomy period of our history, are exceeded by those of the present Administration in a period of peace. They will compare your promises with your performances—the flattering hopes which you raised with the bitter disappointments which you have made them feel. They will compare their present condition with what it was when the reformers came into power. They will remember that they were then blessed with a steady and healthy prosperity; they feel that they are now overwhelmed by adversity and pecuniary difficulties to an extent which finds no parallel in the history of the past. They remember that they had a paper currency, which was convertible into specie in every part of the Union, and equal to it in value in the most distant nations of the globe. You promised to improve it—the people confided in your promises, and submitted it to your experiments; and they now see and feel the result, in the destruction of credit, in the banishment of gold and silver from circulation, the ruin of the banking institutions of the country, and in a depression of prices, which has destroyed the inducements to industry, and brought universal distress and embarrassment upon the people. The thriving of brokers, of marshals, and sheriffs, the frequency of bankruptcies, and the daily sacrifices of property sold under execution to discharge pecuniary liabilities, bear witness to the public misrule, and call loudly upon an injured and betrayed people to visit retributive justice upon that political party which has inflicted upon them calamities so severely disastrous. Who that believes in the truth of the theory that man is capable of self-government, can doubt that the people will heed that call, and perform that duty? And, in addition to this long list of injuries which it is their duty to redress, they will not fail to remember the extraordinary means which have been employed to force upon the country a fiscal system which the people have again and again condemned and rejected, and which virtually places the entire revenue of the country within the control of the President. And when they associate with this the monstrous project for raising a standing army of two hundred thousand men, brought forward by the Secretary of War, under the deceptive disguise of "a plan for the reorganization of the militia," which the President in his message says he cannot "too strongly recommend to the consideration of Congress," they will believe that there is just cause of alarm for the safety of the public liberty; they will feel that the free institutions bequeathed to them by a glorious ancestry are menaced with imminent danger, and they will uprise, in the majesty of their strength, to rescue and defend them. My colleague deceives himself with a vain hope when he lays "the flattering unction to his soul" that there are triumphs in the future for Mr. Van Buren and his party.

Sir, the signs of the times are too emphatic to be misunterpreted—the handwriting is upon the wall—the Republic is safe; and when the election shall come in November next, the people will pronounce, in tones of thunder, their disapprobation of an Administration whose policy is at war with their interests, and of a political party whose principles and practices are dangerous to constitutional liberty. When this "consummation so devoutly to be wished" shall have been achieved, I expect to see the Government once more faithfully and honestly administered for the happiness and welfare of the people. I hope to see the heavy cloud of adversity which now darkens our horizon rolled away, and the sun of prosperity again shine forth—that the people, under the genial influence of its beams, may advance to wealth and happiness, and our country resume her onward march to increased power and greatness.

REMARKS OF MR. ALLEN,

OF OHIO,

In the House of Representatives, June 24, 1840—On the Sub-Treasury bill.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: When I first endeavored to obtain the floor several days ago, I intended to speak at length upon some topics that have since been discussed with very great ability by gentlemen who were more fortunate than myself in catching the Chairman's eye; and at this stage of the debate, and of the session, it would be an unjustifiable waste of time for me to travel over ground so ably pre-occupied by others. I shall, therefore, omit mentioning some matters that had occurred to me, and shall be more brief in my remarks upon some to which I propose to allude than I otherwise should be.

It has been said that every gentleman here was elected with special reference to the vote he would give upon the bill under consideration, and that he could not now vote otherwise than was expected at the time of his election without a violation of the understanding, express or implied, that existed between himself and his constituents. There may be some force in this remark, but it must be greatly qualified; if we come here with our minds fixed, our opinions unmoveable, our ears closed against all argument, we can hardly be entitled to the appellation of a deliberative assembly. Whatever weight may be attached to the proposition by some gentlemen, for myself I do not feel its force to any embarrassing extent. I was elected as an opponent of the Administration and its measures generally, but whether I should support or oppose this or that particular measure, neither my constituents nor myself knew with certainty. They knew I was originally and strongly opposed to this bill, but since the time, now almost two years, that judgment was passed upon me and upon that, many occurrences may have taken place to induce a change in some individuals of the opinion then entertained, both by its friends and its enemies.

I have, therefore, been an attentive listener to some of the arguments that have been presented by the advocates of this proposition, with an anxious desire to ascertain its real merits, if I had before misapprehended them, and to review thoroughly the opinion heretofore entertained and expressed; its friends urging its adoption after repeated defeats, with a pertinacity showing their confidence in its expediency to be unimpaired.

If fully satisfied that the welfare, present and prospective, of the country, demanded its adoption, I might be constrained, by a high sense of patriotism and duty, to disregard the entanglements of party alliance and all personal considerations, and adopt a course of action diametrically opposite to that I have heretofore pursued.

I was opposed to the Sub-Treasury plan when presented at the extra session of Congress in 1837, and have so continued to this time, and for these reasons among others: Because it will expose the money of the Government to new hazards of loss; because it will tend to make two currencies, the better one for the Government, and the poorer one for the people; because it will involve at the commencement, and annually thereafter, a great expense, for which there is not the slightest necessity; because of the enormous patronage it will put at the disposition of the Executive: because, practically, it will put the public money under his absolute control, thereby, contrary to all sound Republican doctrine, to the lessons taught us by history, and in utter contempt of the dictates of common sense, uniting the purse and the sword in the same hands; and, finally, because it is one of a series of experiments that has been in process of execution for eight years back, and which has proved little else than a series of disasters and misfortunes to the country, alike destructive to the morals, the prosperity, and the happiness of our people.

These were some of the objections I had to the proposed measure, and after again hearing and considering the arguments presented by its friends, I am obliged to say that my objections, instead of being obviated, have received additional strength.

The questions now in issue, I understand to refer to the mode of keeping the public funds between the times of collection and disbursement, and to the kind of currency in which they shall be received.

And simple and isolated as they appear at first sight, it seems to me they involve considerations of the highest importance to the safety and perpetuity of our institutions, and the welfare of our people.

If I had the ability to examine them all as they merit, time would not permit at this late period in the discussion and of the session; and I shall therefore very briefly allude to but a few of them, and to some of the reasons urged by the friends of the bill in its behalf. We were told, sir, by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ATHERTON] that the banks claim the custody and use of the public money. All the banks, or but a part? and if a part, which? When and how did they do it, and by whom and to whom was the claim preferred? This is a question of fact, and, like other matters of fact, it must be susceptible of proof. Where, I ask, then, is the proof? Let it be shown, or let the charge be withdrawn. I do not believe it is well founded, or that a particle of evidence can be adduced to warrant such an inference, and my opinion is, that the banks would be reluctant to take the public money at all; and they certainly would refuse it if they were to be vilified as they have been for three years past, by the party in power. But if I am incorrect as to the fact, the banks have preferred a claim for which there is no foundation whatever. A claim presupposes a right; and the banks have no more right to the custody of the public funds than has a turnpike company. It is not upon any basis of right that the opponents of this measure would place the money in them, nor on account of the banks as such—but for its safety, and for the benefit of the people, and to avoid the manifold dangers incident to the contemplated system.

We were further told by the same gentleman, that the public money should be in the hands of officers responsible to the people. Will this object be accomplished by the adoption of the Sub-Treasury plan? How, I beg to know, are these Sub-Treasurers to be made responsible to the people? The President is to appoint the Receivers General and their subordinates; he can make and unmake them at his pleasure. I say the President appoints, for although affirmative action by the Senate is required, we will know nominations to that body have very rarely been rejected from the organization of the Government down. General Jackson asserted the doctrine for the first time, that the Executive was a unit, and that all the subordinate Executive officers were responsible, not to the people, but to him, the grand focus of responsibility; and that he, himself, was alone responsible to the people. But, under the most orthodox doctrine of responsibility, the subordinate officers of this Government are responsible to the people, but very remotely and circuitously. The President holds his station for the term of four years; he may, on the day of his inauguration, appoint a very improper man to office, and the people cannot reach him before the expiration of the Presidential term, and then only through the President, and by ousting him only can they oust the objectionable officer; and as a thousand considerations are necessarily taken into view at the Presidential election, it seems to me obvious that this idea of responsibility for all practical purposes is entirely fallacious.

It is said that, by depositing the Government funds in banks, we imply a grant of political power. How, sir, can political power in this country be created or granted by implication? and how can corporations, having no souls and no bodies that are tangible, receive or exercise political power? Under our Constitution and laws, every citizen having certain prescribed qualifications possesses not implied, but actual political power; and so may the stockholders and officers of banks, not by reason of their connection with banks, however, but without any reference to them. If it were said that men with money have more power, politically and otherwise, than men without money, it would be unquestionably true, because a rich man has more means for conferring benefits and for inflicting injuries, than a poor one. But this power does not depend upon the nature of his investments, for the man having money will have the influence pertaining to it, whether it be used for banking purposess, or for manufacturing purposes, or be lent to his neighbors.

It is urged that the Sub-Treasury system should be adopted, to prevent the use of the public money; and how long, let me ask, has it been the doctrine of the Administration party that the people should be deprived of the benefits resulting from the employment of their own money? What said President Jackson, in his celebrated manifesto, after the removal in 1833 of the deposites from the Bank of the United States to the State banks? It was, that "The funds of the Government will not be annihilated by being transferred. They will immediately be issued for the benefit of trade; and if the Bank of the United States curtails its loans, the State banks, strengthened by the public deposites, will extend theirs."

But the extraordinary circular of Mr. Taney, then Secretary of the Treasury, is still more to the point; it is conclusive. He said to these banks:

"The deposites of the public money will enable you to afford increased facilities to the commercial and other classes of the community; and the Department anticipates from you the adoption of such a course respecting your accommodations, as will prove acceptable to the people, and safe to the Government."

And what said the President two years after, when the process had been going on for more than three years by the State banks?

"To retain the public revenue in the Treasury, unemployed in any way, is impracticable. It is considered against the genius of our free institutions to lock up in vaults the treasure of the nation. Such a treasure would doubtless be employed at some time, as it has been in other countries, when opportunity tempted ambition."

General Jackson says it is "impracticable" to prevent the use of the public money; and I ask those gentlemen about me who believe in the infallibility of his judgment, why it is that we should attempt to do that which was pronounced impracticable by such authority?

If the money be used by a Sub-Treasurer, it will be for his own benefit, or that of his friends; if by a bank, then for the benefit of the stockholders on the one side, composed of rich men, poor men, widows, children, charitable associations, and the like, and the profit derived is the equivalent for the labor and responsibility of managing the funds. But other than the interests of the stockholders are to be looked to in the investigation of this question. Our country, like all other new and sparsely settled countries, is deficient in capital. We have fertile land in abundance, and the means of acquiring wealth without stint; but we must have time to produce such a result, such a supply of money, that it may be cheap, as, in Holland and England, and on the Continent, results from the industry and economy of ages. In the United States, money has always commanded a high rate of interest, because the supply fell short of the demand for profitable investment. If the public money be deposited in banks, the average amount constitutes the basis of discounts for the benefit, directly or circuitously, of manufacturers, mechanics, merchants, planters, and every body who wishes to buy or sell labor, merchandise, cotton, wheat, tobacco, or any thing else; and while the most beneficial effects thus flow through a thousand channels, "the Republic receives no detriment," so long as its drafts are duly paid; and if we look at the Government as distinguished from the people, odious though the distinction be, we find that that, too, receives great benefit from the increase of the means of its citizens further to contribute to the public necessities.

But, without reference to the high authority cited, let me ask if Sub-Treasurers will not use the public funds; for Sub-Treasurers we always have had, and must have, for collecting and disbursing the revenues.

In December last, Mr. Woodbury made a report to the House of Representatives, (Doc. No. 10,) which contains a table showing the losses of the Government by disbursing officers, and by collecting officers, in each case, from 1789 to 1836, inclusive, which presents the following results:

1. Disbursing Officers.

Aggregate amount of loss in civil department	$898,023 59
Aggregate amount of loss in military and naval	4,058,549 97
	4,956,573 56
Number of defaulters, civil department		244
Number of defaulters, military and naval		2,516
		2,760
Loss per head, civil department		$3,680
Loss per head, military and naval		1,613

2. Collecting Officers.

Aggregate amount of loss by collectors of the customs	$1,198,979 91
Aggregate amount of loss by collectors of internal revenue and direct tax	442,265 76
Aggregate amount of loss by receivers of sales of lands	397,304 14
	$2,038,549 81
Number of defaulters in the custom house		87
Number of defaulters in the internal revenue, &c.		243
Number of defaulters in the public land receipts		27
Loss per head among collectors of the customs		$13,781
Loss per head among collectors of internal revenue, &c,		1,820
Loss per head among receivers of public lands		14,715
		5,737

Making a total loss of seven millions of dollars, within a fraction.

And it must be recollected that the above does not include the losses that have occurred or been discovered since Mr. Van Buren came into power, known to amount to about two and a half millions, and how many millions may be discovered under some searching operation by and by, no one can tell.

An important item to be taken into consideration, too, is, that the losses prior to 1837, occurred among agents presumed to have the public money in their possession but temporarily; whereas the proposition now is, that the collecting agents shall continue to keep in their hands the money till paid to disbursing agents, and the danger must thereby be greatly increased. In addition to hazards of loss by fraud and violence, a sub-treasurer must be made of sterner stuff than most men, if he can resist opportunities that will always be urged upon men in possession of large sums of money, to advance his own fortune, or to relieve the distresses of a friend by the use, for a brief time, of a small part of the money rusting in his vaults; fully confident of his ability to replace it whenever it may be wanted, and this he probably will do for a season. But repeated experiments, successfully practised, will beget confidence; the sums so abstracted will become larger, and the time longer; and, in the end, nine out of ten of your agents will be found, in spite of all barriers you may erect to prevent it, to have used your money, and nine out of ten of those who do so use it will prove defaulters.

A paternal Government, duly appreciating the morals of its citizens, should be studiously careful to put no unnecessary stumbling blocks before frail humanity, especially when elevated to positions where pernicious examples may have so much more influence than in the humble walks of life. "Lead us not into temptation," is one of the best injunctions of the best prayer that falls from human lips.

It has been said, in the progress of this debate, that money in the hands of a sub-treasurer will not be so liable to embezzlement as in a bank, because fewer persons will have access to it. The idea thus indicated may be well founded as a proposition, but I am not satisfied it is well applied. The bill provides for ten clerks for the four Receivers General. Does any body suppose that a number like this will be found physically competent to transact the business under their charge? Bank notes, bank checks, transfers of credit, and every thing of the kind, are to be superseded, and coin must be counted, twice at least; and this will be no light labor at the important offices. How are the three, possibly four clerks, assignable to the New York office, to count one, two, and, perhaps, sometimes five hundred thousand dollars, in a day, in coins from sixpences up to eagles, in addition to their other duties? And, if justice be done to the persons transacting business there, there must be force enough, at all times, to do the maximum labor of any day. Why, sir, it is absurd to suppose that ten clerks, or ten times ten, will be physically able to do the work at the four great offices, if the collections are to be in specie; and the friends of the bill know it.

But, in the smaller offices it is not proposed to have clerks; and is it expected, Mr. Chairman, that a receiver at a land office is to mount guard, every day, in proper person, over the fifty or one hundred thousand dollars in his custody; or that he is to sleep every night under his own roof; or that he is to be specially exempted from the attacks of disease or of death itself, because he happens to hold a commission from the Government to collect, and safely to keep, its revenues?

How is the comparative safety in other respects? What is the safe and expedient practice for individuals may be such for an aggregate of individuals as a political community. What do you, Mr. Chairman, with a considerable sum of money when paid you? Do you, sir, carry it about your person, or even lock it up at home, exposed to the thief by day, the robber by night, and to the flames that may consume your house and its contents at any hour? or do you deposite it forthwith in the Bank of Virginia? I venture to say, sir, you do the last, or I have much mistaken your character for prudence, good judgment, and common sense; all so frequently exhibited on this floor.

And how stands the question in other and much higher respects than as to the mere security of the public money?

In 1834, when a plan, substantially like this, was introduced by Gen. Gordon, a Whig member of this House from the Ancient Dominion, the Globe, then, as now, the organ of the Administration, declared it "revolutionary and disorganizing, and subversive of the practice of the Government, from '89 down." And again:

"It is as palpable as the sun that the effect of the scheme would be to bring the public Treasury much nearer the actual custody and control of the President than it is now, and expose it to be plundered by a hundred hands where one cannot now reach it."

And as spoke the great Globe then, so spake all the little Globes through the country.

What, too, said the venerable editor of the Richmond Enquirer, always the supporter of the ruling party, who opposed the plan in 1834, when presented by a Whig, and in 1837, when urged by Mr. Van Buren, but who has since been induced by some magic influence to reconsider his opinions, and now avers his determination to sink or swim with the Administration and its measures?

"We have objected to the Sub-Treasury scheme (so called) that, in the first place, it will enlarge the Executive power, already too great for a Republic; secondly, that it contributes to endanger the security of the public funds; and, thirdly, that it is calculated to produce two currencies—a baser one for the people, and a better one for the Government. The more we reflect upon the matter, the more we read the speeches of the orators on both sides, the more firmly are we satisfied of the strength of these objections."

"It is certainly subject to very strong objections, not the least of which is the very great increase of patronage to which it must give rise, and a patronage of the most dangerous influence, as being so immediately connected with the public money."

And again:

"But I can see no advantage, and, on the contrary, a fruitful source of mischief, in making Government officers the keepers of the cash. Place about them what guards you may, in the shape of commissioners, inspectors, of whatever else, peculation will be endless. There is no security in it, and it will involve heavy and unnecessary expense. The chief and overruling objection, however, is the endless source of patronage to which it would give rise. Make the machinery as simple as you may, and open to view, wherever money is, temptation will creep in, and corruption in every form follow at its heels."

"Truth without fear" is, I believe, the motto flung to the winds at the head of the Enquirer. If I am wrong, you, Mr. Chairman, can correct me. And when its editor felt the healthy invigarating influence of it, he boldly proclaimed that the new device would prove the "fruitful source of mischief"—that, place what guards you may, "peculation would be endless"—that "there was no security in it"—that "it would be an endless source of patronage"—and that "wherever money is, temptation will creep in, and corruption in every form follow at its heels." Yet, with that extraordinary pliability that has ever enabled Mr. Ritchie to adapt his course to the exigency of the occasion, he now ardently supports the plan he so warmly condemned, and is exerting every faculty of body and mind to keep its authors in power. Sir, if that wonderful character, John Randolph, of Roanoke, were here striding across this floor, with whip in hand and spur on heel, as in days gone by, he would point to that as additional evidence, if it were needed, to show the truth of what he once said, that Mr. Ritchie was a man of seven principles, to wit, five loaves and two fishes.

When individuals or communities are inclined to change long and thoroughly established habits, it is well to consult their own observation and experience, and the lights of history too, that they may see the dangers of the path they propose to tread, if any there be, and perhaps be induced thereby to avoid it altogether.

By a report of Mr. Secretary Woodbury made to the House of Representatives December 12, 1834, it seems that, under the Confederation, what little money Congress had was deposited wherever the finance committee directed, depending upon accidental circumstances. When the Bank of North America, the first in the country, was established by a few wealthy citizens of Philadelphia at a time when the public credit was at its lowest ebb, and through the instrumentality of which funds were provided to enable Congress to prosecute the war at the South with vigor, gloriously terminating it by the capture of Cornwallis at Yorktown, the public money was deposited in it. Subsequently, as the three banks of Massachusetts, New York, and Maryland were successively established, they were made depositories. In 1791 the first Bank of the United States was chartered, and in that were the deposites made by order of Gen. Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury. We have heard much lately, Mr. Chairman, in this debate, of Hamiltonian Federalists, and this Gen. Hamilton, I understand, was the founder of the sect, and his name is to live in that connection so long as there are demagogues to prate about Federalism and Monarchy as synonymous terms, and that must be, I suppose, as long as the Government stands.

Well, sir, it seems by a late discovery in the other wing of this Capitol, that the world has been entirely in error for half a century in the estimate it has placed upon the mental capacity of this Gen. Hamilton; for it has been foolishly believed that he was a man of transcendent abilities, especially in matters of finance; at any rate, we know, sir, that he created our Treasury system out of chaos, and gave it form and comeliness, and breathed into it the breath of life, and stamped the impress of his own genius, whatever it may have been, upon every feature so effectually that it has never been effaced; and hence, sir, in the apparent success and brilliancy of his career, it is not singular that men's minds lost that balance so essential to preserve in order to arrive at just conclusions. But now, Mr. Chairman, late as it is, the verdict and judgment of the world, unanimously rendered, and sanctioned by the lapse of fifty years, is to be "set aside, reversed, and altogether held for naught," by virtue of a discovery of an honorable Senator whose constituency and mine are in part the same, that Gen. Hamilton was at best but a third-rate man; thus most conclusively showing that we are growing wiser and wiser as each day's sun rolls over us; and that Mr. Jefferson was not so much mistaken as has sometimes been pretended, when he said that "error of opinion may be safely tolerated when reason is left free to combat it."

But, sir, pardon this digression, and I will return to my historical reminiscences.

In 1909 was the first legislation on the subject of the deposites of the public money—Congress then requiring the disbursing officers of the Government "to keep" the money under their control in some neigboring bank whenever practicable. In 1811 the charter of the Bank of the United States expired, and Mr. Gallatin, then Secretary of the Treasury, selected State banks as depositories; and so the law and usage remained till 1816, when the late bank was chartered, and made, by the terms of its charter, the depository of the public funds, though State banks, in some portions of the country remote from the branches of the United States Bank, continued to be used. Of the banks so selected between 1811 and 1816, but continuing depositories for some years thereafter, none failed till 1817, when there were seven, owing collectively $139,000, of which they soon paid all but $6,000. During that most embarrassing period in our financial and commercial relations, from 1817 to 1821, four more failed, three of which paid in full, and the amount due by the other was small.

The following extracts I read from the report refrered to, which indicates great research and labor by Mr. Woodbary:

Extract from Woodbury's Report, December 12, 1834.

"Justice to the State banking institutions, as a body, whose conduct in particular cases has certainly been objectionable, but whose injuries to the Government have been almost incredibly exaggerated, and whose great benefits to it, both during the existence of our two national banks, and while neither of them existed, have been almost entirely overlooked, has led me to make this scrutiny, and submit its results, under a hope that it will, in some degree, not only vindicate them from much unmerited censure, but justify this Department for the confidence it formerly, and in the great improvement of their condition and of the financial affairs of the Government, has recently reposed in them.

"Under these circumstances, so very favorable with the new security and examinations provided for, if our former small losses by them, in keeping and paying over the public revenue, under circumstances so very adverse, are compared with our large losses, either in collecting or disbursing that revenue, their present safety seems to be as great as is consistent with the usual operations of the paper system, or with the credit which must always be entrusted by Government in some way or other, to agents of some kind, in keeping the public money."

Extract from Mr. Woodbury's Special Report, December 12, 1834.

"It is gratifying to reflect, however, that the credit given by the Government, whether to bank paper or bank agents, has been accompanied by SMALLER losses, in the experience under the system of State banks, in this country, at their worst periods and under their severest calamities, than any other kind of credit the Government has ever given in relation to its pecuniary transactions." * * * * "Thus the truth on this much misunderstood and misrepresented subject appears to be, not only that one failure of a selected bank did not occur within the period while no United States Bank was in operation, but that of those which afterwards stopped payment within three or four years, chiefly from the causes before mentioned, and a part of which causes produced eight or tenfold as many failures in England, under the full control and influence of a national bank there as well as here, four of the number have since discharged all their liabilities, and the residue of the liabilities of all the others as deposite banks, in the manner before estimated, is less than $35,000. This is not the tithe of the sum which has frequently been lost to the Treasury by the failure of individual merchants to discharge only their obligations for imports; not equal to the sum frequently lost by the failure of many single disbursing agents connected with the different departments of the Government, and under larger bonds for security. Whether they [losses by State banks] arose from an unsound policy pursued by the United States Bank, or from circumstances which, under the paper system, neither legislation nor caution can always avert, or from less justifiable reasons, and in spite of all the salutary influence the National Bank could exercise, it is a singular fact, in praise of this description of public debtors—the selected banks—that there is not now due on deposite in the whole of them which have ever stopped payment from the establishment of the Constitution to the present moment, a sum much beyond what is now due to the United States from one mercantile firm that stopped payment in 1825 or 1826, and of whom ample security was required, and supposed to be taken, under the responsibility of an oath. If we include the whole present dues from the Government from discredited banks at all times, and of all kinds, whether as deposites or not, and embrace even counterfeit bills, and every other species of unavailable funds in the Treasury, they will not exceed what is due from two such firms. Of almost one hundred banks, not depositories, which, during all our wars and commercial embarrassments, have heretofore failed, in any part of the Union, in debt to the Government, on their bills or otherwise, it will be seen by the above table [annexed to the report] that the whole of them, except seventeen, have adjusted every thing which they owned; and that the balance due from them, without interest, is less than $82,000."

There is some obscurity about the results, as exhibited by these extracts, but a reference to the tables appended to the report will show losses of all kinds to have been $1,157,000. In December last, Mr. Woodbury stated that of that amount about $300,000 had been collected since his former report, leaving about $900,000 actually due from the State banks with which the Government had had any business transactions whatever, whether by using them as depositories or by the receipt of their notes, and "embracing even counterfeit bills."

True it is, that in December, 1838 and 1839, Mr. Woodbury asserts the losses to have been six and a half millions, adding to his former calculation five and a half millions for loss sustained by the receipt of the depreciated notes of the banks during the war. I ask, sir, if it is not strange that an item so important as this, being five times as great as all the losses reported in 1834, should have been so overlooked by Mr. W. in making a special report of nearly fifty closely printed pages, in which he undertakes to "give information to the Legislature respecting all matters which shall pertain to his office" in relation to the advantages of the State bank deposite system, as contrasted with any and every other.

This most important item, to which he before made no allusion, he tells us does not appear on the Treasury books, or any where else, and therefore he jumps to his conclusion, and which might, upon his own showing, have been any thing or nothing, much or little, as suited the occasion. Hence, in 1834, this newly vamped up loss had no existence; in December, 1838, and 1839, it was five and a half millions; and when we come back here next December, we may find it down to cipher or up to fifteen millions, varying, as the interests of the party may require, vastly more than the length of the English Chancellor's foot.

If a loss had actually occurred that was in any way tangible, I ask if it must not necessarily have been shown on the books of the Department; for how otherwise could its accounts be balanced? I understand the pretence for setting up this claim is based upon the fact that the Treasury notes during the war were sold for bank bills which were at a discount for specie, the banks south of New England having suspended, and the difference between specie and the bank bills is charged as the loss. But, Mr. Chairman, what was the relative value of the Treasury notes and bank notes during the war? The last were from five to ten per cent. discount for specie, and the former at from ten to twenty-eight per cent. thus making the difference between Treasury credit and bank credit greater than between bank credit and specie; the people believing the notes of the banks would be paid with greater certainty and less delay than those of the Government. And what time the credit of the Government was at its lowest ebb, I do not know, nor is it material; but my impression is that it was soon after that most distressing and afflicting period of the war, in August, 1814, when our coasts were lined with British ships filled with the victors of Napoleon, annihilating our commerce, destroying our towns, and disgracing themselves and us, by reducing this magnificent edifice and the other public buildings here, used for civil purposes merely, to ruins. Then it was our Government appealed to the banks to furnish the means, as they had already partially done, to enable the Government to protect the country; and their "patriotic efforts," as Mr. Woodbury styles them, were put forth to their great loss and embarrassment, as most clearly evinced on the attempt subsequently to resume specie payments. During the war specie was an article of merchandise exclusively; all the business of the country had reference to and was transacted upon the paper currency, and the paper received by the Government, excepting to a limited extent, was paid away at its nominal rate.

I reject, therefore, sir, this claim of five and a half millions, not thought of in 1834, and now first presented by a Secretary of the Treasury, only because it might help to bolster up this new project, thrice rejected by the representatives of the people; and I hold Mr. Woodbury to the account as stated in 1834, making a balance then of about $1,100,000, from which is to be deducted about $300,000, paid between 1834 and 1837, showing an actual loss to the Government, from its foundation down, of $900,000 in round numbers.

The loss by collecting and disbursing officers between 1789 and 1837, I have before shown, was $7,000,000, making a difference of $6,000,000 against the limited Sub-Treasury plan, as it had been in practice when one class of officers were presumed to deposite the money in bank as soon as collected, and the other was presumed not to receive it till wanted for disbursement. In near fifty years the Government lost by these agents about eight times as much as by the State banks; but let it be remembered that we had a National Bank during forty years, by which, besides the fifteen hundred thousand dollars paid by it as a bonus for its charter, various benefits accrued to the Government by having its funds transferred gratuitously to all parts of the Union, its pensioners paid without cost, and many other highly valuable services, all not only without loss, but the Government, as a retiring partner from the concern, sold out its stock at a premium of $1,100,000.

If the account be stated with the local banks alone, there was a loss of $900,000; if with the United States Bank alone, there was a profit of $1,100,000; and if with the United States Bank and the local banks together, there was a profit of $200,000, against losses by defaulting individual agents of $7,000,000. But, unfortunately, the defalcations did not end on the 4th March, 1837, but have occurred since to an extent ten times greater than before.

You, sir, were not a member of this House at the extra session in September, 1837, but some of those gentlemen who were, must well recollect the triumphant announcement by the then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELENG.] at a midnight sitting, that "the Sub-Treasury system was in full operation, and would be through 1838, '39, '40 and '41, in spite of lamentations here or elsewhere!!" we, fresh from the people, having just determined that no warrant for it should be found on the statute book.

And it has been in operation, aiding nothing and blasting every thing, and Sub-Treasurers have absconded with twenty-five hundred thousand dollars, if not more, of our money, since the celebrated decree of Mr. Cambreleng, who, having been rejected by the people, is reaping the rewards of his fidelity as minister to one of the first courts of Europe.

These several matters I commend, sir, to the consideration of sundry gentlemen whom I have in my eye, and who are prone to condemn the banks, and praise the Sub-Treasury, while I refer, for a few moments, to the late deposite banks.

I have nothing to say about their being seduced to the embraces of this Government by its promises of spendid profits—nor of the merits of the system established by the deposite law—nor of the capacity of State banks to carry on the fiscal operations of the Government. I speak only of the manner in which they performed their obligations to the Government prior and subsequent to the suspension in May, 1837; but, Mr. Chairman, the opinions of men in high places, and who were bound, officially, to know all about the business, must be far better than mine, and I therefore call the attention of the committee to the following item, which I read from the message of Gen. Jackson in December, 1834:

"Happily it is already illustrated that the agency of such an institution (as the Bank of the United States) is not necessary to the fiscal operations of the Government. The State banks are found fully adequate to the performance of all services which were required of the Bank of the United States, quite as promptly and with the same cheapness. They have maintained themselves and discharged all these duties, while the Bank of the United States was still powerful and in the field as an open enemy; and it is not possible to conceive that they will find greater difficulties in their operations when that enemy shall cease to exist."

And from the annual message of 1835:

"The experience of another year has confirmed the utter fallacy of the idea that the Bank of the United States was necessary as a fiscal agent of the Government. Without its aid, as such, indeed, in despite of all the embarrassments it was in its power to create, the revenue has been paid with punctuality by our citizens; the business of exchange, both foreign and domestic, has been conducted with convenience; and the circulating medium has been greatly improved. By the use of the State banks, which do not derive their charters from the General Government, and are not controlled by its authority, it is ascertained that the moneys of the United States can be collected and disbursed without loss or inconvenience, and that all the wants of the community, in relation to exchange and currency, are supplied as well as they ever have been. If, under circumstances the most unfavorable to the money market, it has been found that the considerations on which the Bank of the United States rested its claims to the public favor were imaginary and groundless, it cannot be doubted that the experience of the future will be more decisive against them."

And Mr. Secretary Woodbury, in his report of the same year, says:

"This (the Treasury) Department takes great pleasure in stating that the public money continues to be collected and deposited under the present system of selected banks, with great ease and economy in all cases, and with greater in some, than at any former period. The transfers of it to every quarter of the country where it is needed for disbursements have never been effected with more promptitude, and have been made entirely free of expense to the Treasury.

"The payments to creditors, officers, and pensioners have been punctual and convenient, and the whole fiscal operations though the State banks have as yet proved highly satisfactory. Incidental to this, the facilities that have been furnished to the commercial community in domestic exchanges were probably never greater or at so moderate rates."

But the shouts of triumph were made to ring yet louder in the annual message of General Jackson, in December, 1836:

"Experience continues to realize the expectations entertained as to the capacity of the State banks to perform the duties of fiscal agents for the Government at the time of the removal of the deposites. It was alleged by the advocates of the Bank of the United States that the State banks, whatever might be the regulations of the Treasury Department, could not make the transfers required by the Government, or negative the domestic exchanges of the country. It is now well ascertained that the real domestic exchanges performed through discounts by the United States Bank and its twenty-five branches were at least one-third less than those of the deposite banks for an equal period of time; and if a comparison be instituted between the amounts of service rendered by these institutions, on the broader basis which has been used by the advocates of the United States Bank in estimating what they consider the domestic exchanges transacted by it, the result will be still more favorable to the deposite banks."

And Mr. Woodbury, as in duty bound, swells the chorus:

"It is a source of high gratification to be able to add that, while so selected and employed, not a single dollar was lost to the Government by any of them, or a single failure occurred to transfer promptly and pay out satisfactorily the public money entrusted to their charge; nor is it believed that the domestic exchanges of the country were ever lower or more regular than during that period; and the large amount of them performed by these deposite banks in ordinary purchases or discounts, equalling from one hundred and forty to two hundred millions of dollars yearly, or near a third more than those of the same kind by the United States Bank while the fiscal agent of the Government, evinced the great ability and usefulness of the banks on this important subject."

We all recollect that General Jackson, when leaving the Chair of State on the 4th of March, 1837, delivered what he was pleased to call a Farewell Address to his fellow-citizens, in imitation of the example set by the revered Father of his Country—whether impiously or not, every individual will determine for himself. For my own part, sir, I hope no future President will renew the experiment; and, from the ill success attending this, I think no one will, if he has any regard for himself, or respect for the opinions of the people. I want my children, Mr. Chair man, to draw lessons of piety and patriotism and wisdom from the Farewell Address, and not from a Farewell Address that may be issued by a partisan President, having claims upon his party only, and not upon his country.

But, sir, in this address he says:

"At the moment when I surrender my last public trust, I leave this great people prosperous and happy."

Gen. Jackson, for once, was deceived. It was the calm that precedes the hurricane that misled the "Hero of New Orleans," when thus looking upon the clear blue sky. The experiment was strained to the utmost capacity of tension. Mr. Van Buren took the seals of office, and in two short months was compelled to call an extra session of Congress to provide the ways and means to keep the machinery of Government in motion—the deposite and all other banks having exploded, from one end of the Union to the other, with forty millions of the public money nominally in their vaults, but really scattered to the four winds of heaven, under the direction of Mr. Secretary Taney, Mr. Secretary Woodbury, and the President himself.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the banks were the swindling rascally institutions we have been so often told they were, here was game worth playing long and boldly for—the stakes were of no common order. But what did they do, sir, I ask in all candor and seriousness? We have been told what they did prior to the suspension by authority not to be disputed. Now let us see what they did afterward. By the 4th September, when Congress met, the forty millions due the Government were reduced to less than thirteen—in October, to eight—and, in February, 1838, to about six millions—in December last to less than one million—and in a report of Mr. Woodbury, laid on our desks this morning, I find a credit of more than five hundred thousand dollars paid since January last, and the balance is now, therefore, but some three or four hundred thousand dollars, and that, we are told, is well secured.

Do gentlemen believe that had this money been in the hands of Sub-Treasurers, and a great national calamity had fallen upon us, this immense amount of money would have been so fully and promptly paid? True, sir, owing to a variety of circumstances, the banks were compelled to suspend specie payments; but they met the requisitions of the Government in a manner satisfactory to its creditors—showing wonderful pecuniary ability and a high sense of the duty they owed those whose confidence they had enjoyed. The suspension was derogatory to our national character, and most unfortunate in every point, but it was inevitable; and when gentlemen condemn banks as knavish and swindling because they suspend, without reference to the cause, let me remind them that suspension was a Democratic measure during the war, and the New England banks were denounced by the friends of Mr. Madison on this floor, and through all the journals in his interest, as enemies to the country, and their directors as blue-light Federalists, because they would not suspend. Suspension then was the test of Democracy, as Sub-Treasuryism is now.

To solve my interrogotory, it may be well to look to the provisions of the bill that are specifically intended to secure the safety of the money, and we shall find they are frequent inspections at the important offices, bonds ample in quality and amount at all, and imprisonment for embezzlement, upon each of which I will make a few observations.

What potency is there in the inspection? It enables the Government to ascertain if the proper amount is in the vaults of the Receiver General in New York and Philadelphia; but what security does it constitute that it will remain there? It is not proposed to remove it from his custody, for he is the very man intended by this bill to hold it. Now, I beg to know, what is there to prevent the embezzlement the very day after inspection? And how is the discovery of it to be made before the next visit of the commissioners, a week or a month afterwards? I suggest the difficulty, and gentlemen may obviate it as they can.

Now, sir, as to the bonds. No honest and responsible man will give bonds in the large cities, nor will any responsible man become surety. The salary of the receiver-general in New York is fixed at $4,000, and he is to collect three-fourths of all our revenue from imposts, varying from fifteen to twenty millions yearly. Is it to be presumed that bonds, for perhaps five hundred thousand dollars, will be given by men having the ability to make them good when the only equivalent is $4,000, not merely for the hazard always incident to the possession of money, but for the responsibility and labor and care and anxiety for a year, necessarily attendant upon the management of so much money, and in coin too? Again, Mr. Chairman, have we not had experience enough to show us that official bonds are generally in the event little better than brown paper? Sir, I venture the opinion that if gentlemen will examine the accounts of the Treasury Department, they will find little more has been collected from principals and sureties on official bonds than has been paid for expenses in endeavoring to enforce them, and at this very moment a bill is pending here for the relief of the sureties of Swartwout.

But the grand preventive of peculation is to rest in the terrors of criminal law suspended over the heads of these sub-treasurers in the shape of imprisonment, and thereby it is conceded in advance that there may be rogues among them. Well, sir, has not every civilized community laws to prevent theft and robbery and piracy and murder; threatening therefor the infliction of imprisonment, and even death? And yet we find the files of the courts filled with indictments for the punishment of men charged with the commission of these crimes.

But there is one principle in theory, and never departed from in the administration of criminal law, that, before you imprison or hang an offender you must catch him; and what chance is there, I ask, for seizing a sub-treasurer who has arranged his plans at leisure, with the strongest inducements to do it skilfully, and to execute them successfully, while the agents of the Government were in utter ignorance of them? I have no hesitation in saying that in three cases out of four the first intimation of trouble will not reach the proper officers before the absconding sub-treasurer will be half way to Texas or to Europe. Where was Swartwout with his $1,225,000 when his accounts were found minus? I am not certain, sir, but I think he was already luxuriating on the fat beef and plum pudding of Old England—at all events, he was out of harm's way, and has taken good care to keep so. And where, too, was Price, so long the idol and the orator of Tammany Hall, as my friend before me from the Empire State [Mr. J. C. CLARK] so well knows; for in the better days of the party and of the Republic, they there quaffed the foaming beer from the same pewter mug. Where, I ask, was Price? Why, sir, half way across the Atlantic, steaming at the rate of twelve knots the hour, literally in "hot pursuit" of——Swartwout. Why, Mr. Chairman, if this bill is to pass, and the Government is likely to have any money, you must add a section requiring bonds from every steamboat and railroad company in the Union, and out of it too, not to carry absconding sub-treasurers. I recollect one of the Southwestern land receivers who had forgotten to remit a cool hundred thousand when he reached New Orleans on his way to Texas, sat down with great gravity and enclosed his commission to Mr. Woodbury, expressing the opinion that he ought no longer to retain it, but whether Mr. W. assented to the correctness of this conclusion I am uncertain.

Bank corporations are mere creatures of the law, and intangible, and therefore cannot abscond. They may suffer by unfaithful agents, but nobody will then lose but the stockholders; for but a small part of the resources ultimately available to a bank are in its vaults. Its business is to lend money, not to lock it up. A sufficiency of means for its ordinary business must be at command, but the residue is mostly scattered among its debtors, and for which the bank has their notes and bonds. These can but to a small extent, if at all, be made available to an absconding cashier or teller, and it must not be forgotten, too, that the whole capital must be exhausted before the creditors of the bank, whether as depositors or bill holders, can lose any thing.

But, sir, the history of governmental connection with banks and with individual agents as contrasted, and to which I have before alluded, furnishes a commeatnry on their relative merits worth more than any speculations of mine.

What I have said, Mr. Chairman, has reference to the question of expediency in a mere pecuniary view, and specially in reference to the safety of the public funds. I now propose to say a few words in reference to the safety and expediency of the Sub-Treasury plan in its bearings upon our political institutions. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution it was strenuously opposed, because it was apprehended the powers granted to Congress were too potent for the exercise of a healthy Executive influence over the concerns of the country; but at this day I presume no man who has watched the progress of things since 1828 will entertain any fears on this account, for we have seen not only the will of Congress but the will of the people repeatedly and successfully set at defiance.

The President is the source of all patronage and the fountain of all honors at the disposal of the Government, running through an army of office holders one hundred thousand strong, scattered through not only the high places but the by-places in all the land. He is commander-in-chief of the army and the navy, and it is now proposed to add to these enormous powers the absolute control of the public money, thus concentrating in the same hand the sword and the purse.

The President appoints, directly or circuitously, all the officers of the Government, and among them will be the sub-treasurers. He can direct these officers to deposite all the money in their hands at any one time in any place he sees fit to designate—in the city of New York, or at New Orleans, or within the four walls of the White House at the other end of Pennsylvania avenue. If any of them refuse, he has but to apply the official guillotine, and their heads roll in the gutter, and instruments more ready to do his bidding are substituted. Should the standing army project of 200,000 men, recommended so warmly by Mr. Secretary Poinsett, and so heartily approved by Mr. Van Buren, ever be adopted, and the "active class" of 10,000 assigned to this military district should be encamped on the heights about the outskirts of this city, the possession of a few millions at the White House might be very convenient in the hands of a President of Bonapartean temperament to aid in dispersing or in dragooning into obedience a factious Senate or a refractory House of Representatives. "With money I will get men, and with men money," said a most sagacious observer of human nature.

From Mr. Van Buren I admit there is nothing of this kind to be feared; for, even if inclined to overthrow the institutions of his country, he is not the man by constitution, education, habit, or policy, to take upon himself the responsibility of such an experiment; he prefers to be fanned by the breezes of summer, rather than to breast himself to the gales of winter.

In 1834, the Globe, in reference to this proposition, said:

"Had such a suggestion come from General Jackson, it would have been rung through the Old Dominion as conclusive proof of all the aspirations which may have been charged to the hero of New Orleans. 'See here,' they would say, 'he wishes to put the public money directly into the palms of his friends and partisans, instead of keeping it on deposite in banks, whence it cannot be drawn, for other than public purposes, without certain detection.' In such a case, we should feel that the people had just cause for alarm, and ought to give their most watchful attention to such an effort to enlarge Executive power, and put in its hands the means of corruption."

We know not who may occupy the Presidential chair at a future day, and we should establish no system and no precedent now that may, under any circumstances, be dangerous hereafter, for we owe the highest conceivable obligation on earth to our children, and our children's children, and to the friends of free institutions every where; and we should religiously avoid doing any thing that may have the slightest tendency to impair the inheritance bequeathed to us by our noble sires, and which, as trustees for unborn generations, we are bound to transmit, unshorn of any of its properties. Let not some future historian write as history what General Jackson did as prophecy, when, in speaking of the danger of Executive control over the public money, he said:

"Such a treasure would doubtless be employed at some time as it has been in other countries, when opportunity tempted ambition."

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the Sub-Treasury scheme, because its effect, if not its object, will be to destroy the banks, materially to curtail a healthy credit, and bring the business of this great country down to the level of a specie currency, out of all which is finally to grow a Treasury bank under the control of the Executive.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen have denied on this floor, and in this debate, that they or their party were opposed to well regulated banks—that they sought not their destruction but their reformation: but let us see what the organ of the Administration has said. In October, 1837, in anticipation of the passage of the Sub-Treasury bill, the Globe proclaimed in trumpet tone that the "dynasty of banks, both great and small, approached its end." But gentlemen may say this is barred by the statute of limitations, and that a change has come over the spirit of their dreams. Well then, what say their leaders in this year of our Lord 1840? Mr. Benton and Mr. Walker, chiefs of no low degree in the ranks of the crusaders against banks and credit, refer us to Holland—not Holland as she was in the days of De Ruyter and Van Tromp, sweeping the British Channel with a broom at mast head—but Holland in her decrepitude, shorn of her power and splendor: they point us to Continental Europe where the few are princes, and the many slaves, and even to the Island of Cuba, itself under an absolute local despotism, besides being the remote Province of a broken down, worn out, imbecile monarchy; with a gold currency appreciated, like our own, six per cent. above its value. "Imitate them," (Holland, France, Germany, and Cuba,) said Col. Benton on the 16th January last, in the Senate chamber—

"Imitate them! and in a few years you will not only be lifted from the misery, degredation, demoralization and ruin of a depreciated currency, but you will have a superabundance of real money; gold enough for all your own uses, and to lend to all America besides. You will become the specie warehouse of the commercial world; to which all nations will resort to borrow gold, and which will return to you the instant they have borrowed it. Your hundred millions of exportable productions, and augmenting every year, will quickly produce this magic change, if, emerging from the Serbonian bog of paper money in which you are now sunk, you plant yourselves on the solid rock of gold and silver. To the other States I would say do the like, and the like results, to a less extent, will be your reward and your blessings. At least imitate France, and eschew all paper below one hundred dollars. But this is their own affair. As things now stand, it belongs to them to afflict or bless themselves. To the Federal Government it belongs, as the preservation of the sacred fire belonged to the Roman vestals—to this Government it belongs to preserve the sacred currency of the Constitution. To this Government it belongs to do this: and to a long series of measures pursued for this purpose, for the last ten years, the establishment of the Independent Treasury now comes in as the crowning act to seal and consummate the whole."

I shall, Mr. Chairman, with your permission, hereafter recur to some old promises of this same Mr. Benton about the currency, which will show how much this new one is worth.

Now, sir, I will read an elegant extract from a speech delivered in the Senate, on the 21st of January, by Mr. Walker, and will leave the evidence I shall have offered of a design to destroy the banks for such consideration as it may seem to be entitled to.

"Yes, sir, throughout the Union, and throughout the globe wherever you find the banking system to prevail, you will be sure to find periodical suspensions and revulsions, and wide-spread ruin. Explosion is inseparable from the system; and when you speak to me of well regulated banks of circulation, you speak to me of what never has been, or will be. You might as well speak to me of well regulated devils, whom even Almighty power found it impossible to regulate in any other manner than by casting in chains into billows of everlasting fire. And, sir, our bank paper system, if not abandoned, may yet be regulated in the all-consuming blaze of popular indignation."

The bill now under consideration provides that the revenues shall be collected in specie progressively, so that in four years the whole shall be paid in coin. The specie now in the country may be seventy-five millions in the banks and in circulation; the expenditures of the Government cannot be much less than one-third of that sum, and this is to be paid out only when and where the wants of the public service may require. The friends of this measure say that not more than five millions will be locked up in the Treasury at once. How, sir, do they know this? At this time there is nothing in the Treasury, but three years ago there were forty millions. Suppose the average balance be but five millions, is that all that will be abstracted from circulation, or from use, as the basis of a paper circulation, if there be one? Specie, if my theory be right, will be in request, and an article of merchandise difficult to be had, and will be laid by for months in anticipation of payments into the Treasury, and, after payment to the public creditors, it will not be readily put in circulation again; this incidental abstraction will, I think, equal the direct one. But there is another important consideration to be looked at; this money is to be collected in all parts of the country, but will be expended only in a few; it will be in constant process of draught from the centre to the circumference, without any returning stream. The State of Ohio, which I have the honor in part to represent, must pay about one-tenth of the revenue, say two millions and a half; it has been decreed that no more appropriations shall be made to improve our harbors and rivers, or even to finish the Cumberland road; and how are we to get a dollar back? The army and navy expenditures are on the sea coast; the civil expenditures are mostly in the large cities and in this district. We have sunk in the swamps of Florida $25,000,000, enough to plate with silver the surface of the whole Territory, and ere long we shall have to pour out money like water, along the whole Western frontier, far beyond the Mississippi.

Sir, I ask if, under such a state of things, the banks, especially in the interior, can live either profitably to their stockholders or beneficially to the people? It seems to me not; and that if they do not die at once of cholera, they finally will of consumption; if they continue they cannot pay specie, and and if they do not pay specie they ought not to continue. In any event, the result must be, that our business, wages, produce, and property must all be measured by a specie circulation, and correspond nearly with prices in other hard money countries. Thus are we to be driven from the palmy condition of prosperity we lately enjoyed, to one of degradation and misery; and for what good end, can any body tell me? And out of all this, after the people shall have been steeped in misfortune and suffering for a time, and have become ready to adopt any measure that will relieve them, is to issue a Treasury bank, of which the Executive will be president, directors, and company, and having thus acquired, not only the control of the public funds, but of the value of property every where, he will never find it necessary again to appeal to the "sober second thoughts of the people."

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the Sub-Treasury proposition, because it is another experiment. Ten years ago we were well—you gave us physic, and here we are, "so poor that none will do us reverence." The country was prosperous, and the people happy, and with a currency as sound and uniform as the world ever looked upon, and yet the dominant party undertook to give us a letter. This is a matter of deep moment, and I must beg leave, therefore, to quote some few items from high authority.

In December, 1829, General Jackson, in his annual message, to the surprise of every body, spoke thus:

"The charter of the Bank of the United States expires in 1836, and its stockholders will most probably apply for a renewal of their privileges. In order to avoid the evils resulting from pre-cipitancy in a measure involving such important principles and such deep pecuniary interests, I feel that I cannot, in justice to the parties interested, too soon present it to the deliberate consideration of the Legislature and the people. Both the constitutionality and the expediency of the law creating this bank are well questioned by a large portion of our fellow-citizens, and it must be admitted by all that it has failed in the great end of establishing a uniform and sound currency."

In the House this matter was referred to a committee, a majority of whom were the political and personal friends of the President, and from the report I read the following, referring to the Bank of the United States:

"For all the purposes of revenue, it gives to the national currency that perfect uniformity, that ideal perfection, to which a currency of gold and silver in so extensive a country could have no pretensions. A bill issued at Missouri is of equal value with specie at Boston in payment of duties; and the same is true of all other places, however distant, where the Bank issues bills, and the Government collects its revenue. When it is moreover considered that the Bank performs with the most scrupulous punctuality the stipulation to transfer the funds of the Government to any point where they may be wanted free of expense, it must be apparent that the committee are correct to the very letter in stating that the Bank has furnished both to the Government and the people a currency absolutely uniform in value in all places, for all the purposes of paying the public contributions, and disbursing the public revenue. And when it is recollected that the Government annually collects and disburses more than twenty-three millions of dollars, those who are at all familiar with the subject will at once perceive that bills which are of absolutely uniform value for this vast operation, must be very nearly so for all the purposes of general commerce.

"Upon the whole, then, it may be confidently asserted that no country in the world has a circulating medium of greater uniformity than the United States; and that no country of any thing like the same geographical extent has a currency at all comparable to that of the United States on the score of uniformity."

In the Senate a committee similarly constituted said:

"This seems to present a state of currency approaching as near to perfection as could be desired; for here is a currency issued at twenty-four different parts of the Union, obtainable by any citizen who has money or credit. When in his possession, it is equivalent to silver in all his dealings with all the 9,000 agents of the Government throughout the Union. In all his dealings with the interior it is better than silver, in all his dealings with the commercial cities equal to silver; and if for any purpose he desires the silver with which he bought it, it is at his disposal, almost universally, without any diminution, and never more than a diminution of one quarter per cent. It is not easy to imagine, it is scarcely necessary to desire, any currency better than this. * * * * * * *

"After escaping so recently from the degradation of a depreciated paper currency, the committee would abstain from every thing which might, however remotely, revive it. * *

"Under these circumstances, they deem it prudent to abstain from all legislation, to abide by the practical good which the country enjoys, and to put nothing to hazard by doubtful experiments."

* * * * * * * *

And, Mr. Chairman, how fortunate would it have been for us had we been content "to abide by the practical good which we enjoyed, and put nothing to hazard by doubtful experiments."

The assaults upon the Bank were renewed in 1830-'31 and '32, with the addition in the latter year of an opinion that the public money was unsafe in the Bank of the United States, and to ascertain this, certainly a very important point, during the session of 1832-'33, a committee was appointed to examine into the condition of the Bank, and from the report of that committee I cite the conclusion:

"It appears from official documents of unquestionable authority that the specie actually in the vaults of the Bank of the United States is within one-tenth of the amount held by all the other banks in the Union together, whilst its circulation of paper is but one-fourth the circulation of theirs. In other words, the Bank of the United States has now above nine millions of specie, with a circulation of notes to the amount of seventeen millions and a half, whilst the aggregate of all the other banks, with specie in their vaults of from ten to eleven millions, have a circulation of sixty-eight millions of bank paper. If, then, the evidence herewith submitted can be relied upon, which it is for the House to judge of, there can be no doubt of the entire soundness of the whole bank capital, after meeting all demands upon it, either by its bill holders or the Government; and such is the opinion of the committee, who feel great confidence in the well-known character and intelligence of the directors whose testimony supports the facts above stated."

Ending with the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Government deposites may, in the opinion of this House, be safely continued in the Bank of the United States."

Which was adopted by a vote of more than two to one, in a House having a large Administration majority.

But the fiery energies of the old war-horse were not to be so easily repressed, and Congress had hardly adjourned before General Jackson sent Amos Kendall to the Eastern cities to open a negotiation with the State banks in reference to the removal of the deposites, ending with the arbitrary removal of Mr. Duane, as Secretary of the Treasury, and the appointment of a more pliant instrument for the President's purposes, in the person of Mr. Taney, and then followed the removal of the deposites in violation of the chartered rights of the bank and of law, and in contempt of Congress; and here, sir, was the real source of all our present difficulties.

Soon after General Jackson's election, he undertook to make the directors of the branch bank at Portsmouth remove its President, against whom there was no valid objection, and appoint a political friend of Gen. Jackson. This they refused to do, saying, among other things, that they had nothing to do with the political controverses of the day, and did not mean to have. Here opened the war. General Jackson finding he could not make the Bank his ally, determined to destroy it, as he has every body and every thing who ever resisted his will, and in this he succeeded but too well.

The final destruction of the Bank having been decreed, the ruling party, in order to fill the vacuum that would necessarily follow, began to make new banks in every State where they held power. Yes, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WAGENER] complains that the State banks have been increased from 350 to nearly 900, and I beg leave to tell him that he and his friends made them. The Globe was as rabid then in the great work of making banks as it now is in destroying them. In that journal of December 21, 1833, it is said:

"This new coalition, however, have labored in vain. The intelligent people of the West know how to maintain their rights and independence, and to repel oppression. Although foiled in the beginning, every Western State is about to establish a State bank institution. They are resolved to avail themselves of their own State credit as well as of the national credit to maintain a currency independent of foreign control. Mr. Clay's presses in Kentucky begin now to feel how vain are all their efforts to resist this determination of the people in the West. The Louisville (Kentucky) Herald says: 'From the indication of public opinion, as contained in the papers from the States around us, there is every probability that banks will be chartered in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Missouri, and that efforts will be made to charter in this State (Kentucky) not only a State bank, with four or five branches, but several independent banks.'"

And, having copied with approbation this promise of a large crop of new banks, the Globe then concludes by saying:

"So Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Kentucky are resolved to take care of themselves, and no longer depend on the kind guardianship of Biddle, Clay, and Co."

And Ohio did take care of herself by chartering at that same session of her Legislature, I believe, eleven new banks, with an aggregate capital of about four millions—the Administration party having a majority in both branches.

Into the banks, new and old, the deposites were hurried, and, fearing they would not lend the money fast enough, orders were given them to discount, not in peremptory language, but sufficiently distinct—for a mere suggestion in those days from Andrew Jackson or his lieutenants was equivalent to an order. But in this matter I speak from the book, sir, and therefore read from Senate documents 1st session 23d Congress, 1st vol. Doc. 2, p. 33, the following letter, dated

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, 23, 1833.

"SIR: The Girard bank has been selected by this Department as the depository of the public money collected in Pennsylvania and its vicinity, and the collector at Philadelphia will hand you the form of a contract proposed to be executed, with a copy of his instructions from this Department. In selecting your institution as one of the fiscal agents of the Government, I not only rely on its solidity and established character, as affording a sufficient guarantee for the safety of the public money entrusted to its keeping, but I confide also in its disposition to adopt the most liberal course which circumstances will admit towards other moneyed institutions generally, and particularly to those in the city of Philadelphia.

"The deposites of the public money will enable you to afford increased facilities to commerce, and to extend your accommodations to individuals; and as the duties which are payable to the Government arise from the business and enterprise of the merchants engaged in foreign trade, it is but reasonable that they should be preferred in the additional accommodations which the public deposites will enable your institution to give, whenever it can be done without injustice to the claims of other classes of the community. I am, &c.

"R. B. TANEY,
"Secretary of the Treasury.

"To the President of the Girard Bank, Philadelphia."

And the following letter is found at page 36 of the same document, from which I give only an extract:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Oct. 9, 1833.

"In selecting your institution as one of the fiscal agents of the Government, I not only rely on its solidity and established character, as affording a sufficient guarantee for the safety of the public money entrusted to its keeping, but I confide also in its disposition to adopt the most liberal course which circumstances will admit towards other moneyed institutions generally, and particularly to those in your vicinity.

"The deposites of the public money will enable you to afford increased facilities to the commercial and other classes of the community, and the Department anticipates from you the adoption of such a course, respecting your accommodations, as will prove acceptable to the people and safe to the Government.

"I am, &c. R. B. TANEY,
"Secretary of the Treasury."

The next proof is found in General Jackson's message to Congress, in December, 1833, where he says:

"I am happy to know that, through the good sense of our people, the effort to get up a panic has hitherto failed, and that, through the increased accommodations which the State banks have been enabled to afford, no public distress has followed the exertions of the bank."

And even Mr. Kendall, if good authority, may be quoted. Alluding to the large amount of public money on deposite, he says:

"Should neither the Treasury nor the bank restore a portion of this great sum to circulation, the consequences apprehended would be of the most serious kind: and the community of New York were beginning to look earnestly to the Government for relief."

Then, sir, through the interposition of the Government, did the banks shoot madly from their spheres, ending with the suspension in May, 1837; but even this event, so unfortunate and disreputable, would probably have been avoided had it not been for yet other experiments: for the currency quacks in power had by this time half a dozen wheels in motion, all directed to the accomplishment of their grand object, the improvement of the currency, and all whirling like the machinery of a steam engine when the resisting power has been by some accident removed.

In the spring of 1836, Mr. BENTON introduced a resolution into the Senate requiring all payments for the public lands to be made in specie, but it was promptly and almost unanimously rejected; yet the members of Congress had scarcely reached their homes before General Jackson, by his ipse dixit, in the shape of what was called a specie circular, made that law which the Senate had refused to do, thus substituting his will for theirs. At the next session, Congress passed a bill, by a very large majority in each House, rescinding this circular, but it was at the close of the session, and General Jackson, availing himself of the constitutional grant of ten days within which to sign or return a bill, did neither before the adjournment, and thus again did the Executive practically exercise legislative power, and defy the known wishes of the people. Upon the constitutionality, equity, expediency, or consequences of the specie circular, I do not propose to speak, and I allude to it only as one of the experiments of the day and a part of the system we are referring to.

Another important auxiliary in the great and glorious work of improving the currency, having its inception at an earlier day, but just now beginning to bring forth fruits—not meet for repentance, however, as yet—was what is now generally and best known as the gold humbug. Gold was to be the common currency of the country, and it was to be acquired by giving, through legislation here, an arbitrary, artificial value to it above its real value, so that, being worth more here than elsewhere, it should be drawn here and retained; and connected with this was the establishment of branch mints.

I, Mr. Chairman, have no powers of description enabling me to tell the committee what brilliant prospects were said to be before us, that will compare with those exhibited in the columns of the Globe for months; and as the organ of the Administration, speaking in its name, it seems proper to give them and us too the benefit of its own words:

From the Globe of 29th March, 1834.

"When the money held by the people is gold and silver, they can never be moved by panics or affected by the difficulties of banks. With a golden eagle in his pocket on Saturday night, the laboring man may rest in perfect confidence that no bank failure on Monday will deprive him of the proceeds of his preceding week's labor. Few laboring men or farmers keep on hand for any time more than ten, twenty, to fifty dollars; and the sums they receive are generally small. If our small currency were eagles, half-eagles, quarter-eagles, and dollars, with their fractions, enabling all these people to obtain payment for their labor or produce in the precious metals, they would be effectually protected against all the casualties and frauds of paper money. * * * * * Gold and silver coin, the currency of the Constitution, is Jackson money; notes, with pictures on them, promising to pay, the bank's money. Which will our farmers and mechanics have, Jackson money or bank money?"

From the Globe of 18th April, 1834.

"JACKSON MONEY.—In a few days we shall have an accurate account of all the specie which has arrived at the principal ports in the United States since the 1st day of December last. We have no doubt it exceeds FOUR MILLIONS OF DOLLARS. The most singular incident of the times is, that GOLD as well as silver is returning from Europe.

"What mechanic, farmer, or laboring man would not rather have a golden eagle than a ten dollar note on the Bank of Washington, or any other bank? This is the 'SOUND CURRENCY' which Gen. Jackson recommends."

From the Globe of April 25, 1834.

"HARD-MONEY CURRENCY.—A few facts are necessary to be known and kept in mind by the people, in the present crisis, in order to understand whether the country can supply itself with gold and silver enough to serve for the common currency, after the United States Bank is done with."

From the Globe of May 21, 1834.

"If Congress will pass the coin bills, the circulation of the country will be rich in gold and silver. The drops of sweat which fall from the farmer's brow will be turned into eagles, and half eagles, and Spanish milled dollars. His bushels of corn, wheat, &c. will not be resolved into a dirty rag in the corner of his pocket, promising to pay what the issuers have not the means of paying."

Congress did pass the gold bill, in accordance with Executive dictation; the sweat still falls from the farmer's brow, but it is not turned into eagles, half eagles, or Spanish milled dollars; and the farmers among my constituents would now be extremely rejoiced to be enabled to resolve their bushels of corn, wheat, &c. even in what the Globe calls "dirty rags."

From the Globe of June 11, 1834.

"Since Mr. Lowndes's death, the argument in favor of a gold currency has derived an additional weight from the discovery of our native gold mines. These mines are developing with a rapidity and expansion unknown in the history of the world. Ten years ago, first noticed, and producing then $5,000 a year; now producing above two millions in a year; and no assignable limit to their extent and production. To those who talk of a national currency, we point them to the gold region in Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia, and the contiguous portions of East Tennessee and Alabama. There is a national treasure! There is material for a national currency!—national in every sense of the word; for it is the product of the nation, and current all over the nation, and called for by every man in the nation who is free from the chains of stipendiary servitude to the United States Bank.

"If Mr. Lowndes had lived, this truly national currency would have been long since restored. The discovery of the gold regions in the South would have stimulated his exertions and consummated his purpose. The restoration of this currency is now demanded by the voice of the whole country. It is demanded from the present Congress It is the great measure of the session. Let the nation not be disappointed. Let the GOLD BILL PASS! 16 to 1 is the word! The bank men, not daring to make an open opposition, will work under ground, and endeavor to frustrate the measure by proposing all manner of fractions between 15 and 16 to 1; but let the gold phalanx stand firm, and the paper legion will be defeated."

Yes, sir, 16 to 1 was the word, and we saw 16 dollars in sound paper, and even in gold, then, to 1 now.

From the Globe of June 16, 1834.

"The whole great West requires a circulation of doubloons. It will be their principal gold coin, and will be got in immense quantities from New Orleans."

The eagles of which the Globe talked, on the 21st May, were now turned into doubloons for us at the West, and a great stream of them was to flow up the Mississippi and its tributaries. Now, sir, some of my constituents live at the sources of streams that finally wend their way into the "father waters," and are entitled, upon geographical considerations, to a portion of this gold, but they have not yet seen the first premonitory system of its approach.

The same number of the Globe says:

"The subject has been before Congress all the winter, and every member knows how he is going to vote. There is no pretext for delay; but delay is the first trick of the bank to defeat the bill. Congress has but one question to decide, and that is the relative value—the question of 16 to 1—all the rest is matter of detail. The time is now short—only two weeks; but still the coin bills are expected to pass. The design of the bank party to defeat the bills by delay, or to frustrate their operation by inadequate and vicious details, is perfectly understood, and being understood ought to be counteracted. Let the gold bill pass.

"It is computed the Southern mines will yield THREE MILLIONS of dollars worth of gold this year. A rise in the ratio of gold from 15 to 1, to 16 to 1, will be an advance of six and two thirds per cent. on that amount, which will be $190,000 on the whole."

The bill passed the House—the authoritative style of the Globe was not without effect: "Let the gold bill pass"!! spake the Globe, and it was done.

At the risk of being tedious, let me point you to the shouts of triumph that rung from one end of the land to the other.

From the Globe of June 23, 1834.

"GOLD CURRENCY.—It will be seen, by our Congressional report, that the gold bill has passed the House of Representatives, and goes to the Senate to-day for their concurrence. The bank forces opposed a furious opposition, and foug t, like the ancient villains, till the stars appeared in the evening. The great battle was fought on Saturday, and occupied the whole day. Be it remembered that this Saturday was the 21st day of June, just at the summer solstice, when days are longest and hottest. It was evidently the tactics of the bank leaders, if men can be called leaders who are themselves both led and driven by the mammon whom they serve—it was evidently their tactics, first, to stave off the bill till the next session; next, to befog it in a wilderness of mystification; and, finally, to sink the relative value of gold and silver to a ratio below 16 to 1; which would have defeated the great end of getting gold into circulation as a national currency. Upon these three tacks, the ultra bankites made fight, and developed in such force about mid-day as to show that time was their great resource, and that their plan was to protract the struggle into the ensuing week. The friends of gold then determined upon a permanent sitting till the bill was passed. They renounced all idea of adjourning at the end of the day, and evinced an invincible determination to sit out the question. This brought things to an issue, and towards sunset the triumphant vote was taken, and resulted in an overwhelming majority for the just and truly American ratio of 16 to 1. We say just, because it is the ratio which will bring gold into common use, as common currency; and we call it truly American, because all America, from Canada to Cape Horn, will now have that uniform ratio, and thus bring their whole gold coinage into concord and harmony, and just as convenient for circulation as if all was from the same mint.

"The bill goes to the Senate to-day. The strength of the Bank in that body excites some little apprehension, but it is impossible to believe in formidable opposition there, after the victorious vote in the House of Representatives; and we feel ready to congratulate the friends of the country upon the actual establishment of a gold NATIONAL currency."

The apprehensions of the Globe as to the action of the Senate were ill founded. The bill became a law; and, to complete the golden picture, as drawn by its friends, I must be permitted to read one item more:

From the Globe of July 16, 1834.

"THE GOLD CURRENCY.—While every part of America rejoices—while every heart not enslaved to the scrub aristocracy of the paper system—while every independent and patriotic citizen exults in the recovery and restoration of the long lost gold currency, the West, and all Western citizens, have the deepest and greatest cause for proud exultation and manly rejoicing, at this propitious event. For, of all America, the West is the part which needed most, and will profit most from the circulation of gold. Happily they have but few banks in the West, and, therefore, need gold to carry about and travel upon. Happily, again, the greatest supply of gold will go to the West. The emigrants removing to that great region will all carry gold in preference to either silver or paper, for it is lighter than silver, and safer than paper. The land offices will become receptacles and reservoirs of gold, whence it will be distributed to the country through the Government disbursements, through the military, the surveying, and the Indian departments; and wo to the officer who, having received gold from the Government, shall presume or dare to offer paper to the soldiers or citizens. Then a great stream of gold will flow up the Mississippi from New Orleans, and diffuse itself all over the Great West. Nearly all the gold coinage of the new world will come to the United States; for all the coinage of the new Governments of Mexico and South America, being the coinage of rebel provinces, cannot go to old Spain, or to any of her dependencies, and therefore will come to the United States as its natural and best market. This will fill the West with doubloons and half joes; and in eight or nine months from this time, every substantial citizen will have a long silken purse, of fine open net work, through the interstices of which the yellow gold will shine and glitter. Then travellers will be free from the pestilence of ragged, filthy, and counterfeit notes. Every substantial man, and every substantial man's wife and daughter, will travel upon gold. The satellites of the Bank alone, to show their servile subjection to their liege monarch, will repine at the loss of paper."

Notwithstanding all these promises, sir, the people see so little gold, and are likely to see so little for a long time to come, that it may be well to let them know what excellent qualities it has, as detailed by Mr. Benton:

"QUALITIES OF THE GOLD CURRENCY.—1. It had an intrinsic value. 2. It had a uniformity of value. 3. It was a portable currency. 4. It was indestructible. 5. It possesses inherent purity. 6. It is superior to all other currency. 7. It is the true regulator and equalizer of exchanges. 8. It was the master of paper money. 9. It is the true regulator of bank issues. 10. It is a constitutional currency; and, therefore, the people have a right to have it, while the Constitution remains, whether they can give good reasons for it or not.

"To all which we add, it is the most beautiful currency in the world; and, therefore, the most agreeable to the eye as well as the best for the pocket, that the wisdom of man has devised."

In connection with this subject, I must call your attention for a moment to the establishment of the branch mints at North Carolina, Georgia, and Louisiana—one of the most, among the many, palpable instances of the waste of money to be found on our records. The mint in Philadelphia has the capacity to coin in eagles three hundred millions of dollars annually; but taking the average of coins, silver and gold, large and small, its capacity is equal to twelve millions, and never have the bullion and old coins that could be obtained been adequate to the supply to that extent. Yet to help on the humbug, the branch mints were established at a cost, for buildings, fixtures, and appliances, of about $750,000, and the annual expense of sustaining them is near $50,000. They have been in operation two or three years, and have coined altogether about half a million. During the last year, the branch at New Orleans coined about $23,000; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OGLE] has told us that ten cent pieces cost thirty cents each. Official statements on our tables show that the branch mint in North Carolina, in a little more than a year, coined $84,000 at an expense of $33,466, or about two-fifths of the product.

And yet, in December, 1836, Mr. Benton said, in the Senate Chamber, in anticipation of the immense results expected from them, these words:

"After forty years of wandering in the wilderness of paper money, we have approached the confines of the constitutional medium. Seventy-five millions of specie in the country, with the prospect of an annual increase of ten or twelve millions for the next four years, three branch mints to commence next spring, and the complete restoration of the gold currency, announce the success of President Jackson's great measures for the reform of the currency, and vindicate the Constitution from the libel of having prescribed an impracticable currency."

A prediction proved by the event to be as unfounded as the style and manner were bombastic.

Sir, nobody will now pretend that the whole scheme has not failed, miserably failed, as has every other in relation to the currency undertaken by this Administration. Where is the gold? Who has it, except members of Congress and the office holders generally? The director of the Mint says the gold law has not only failed to accomplish its purpose, but has been positively injurious, and he advises its repeal. That such would be the result, the "bank forces" in Congress foretold. Any man, whose powers of vision were not absolutely destroyed by partisan feeling, must have known that such a radical, arbitrary effort, in despite of all the laws of trade, to acquire an undue proportion of gold—undue, I mean, in relation to supply and demand of the commercial world generally—would prove abortive or worse than abortive, and especially so when we look at the condition of things in the United States and in England.

In the latter, gold constitued the specie circulation, and was the basis of the paper issues—here gold and silver were both a legal tender, and the legal basis necessarily of the paper issues—but practically it was silver, silver being slightly overated, as the law stood, when contrasted with gold, and hence it was retained in this country. There silver was an article of merchandise—here, it was so with gold; there was gold enough for their purposes—here was silver enough for ours.

And yet, as if to ruin the best customer we had for our staples, in the first place, and ourselves next, and in which we have succeeded admirably, we undertook, by mad legislation, to drive the silver from our shores, and draw from England her gold, utterly reckless of the consequences. Gold began to move hither by reason of the artificial value we had given it: this produced a contraction of the whole circulation of England, depreciated the value of every thing selling in her markets, resulting in the loss on our next cotton crop of probably twenty-five millions of dollars, and for which we got no equivalent whatever, except that a few estimable gentlemen in Wall and Chestnut streets had, for a time, the supreme felicity of looking upon the "most beautiful currency in the world."

I have thus, Mr. Chairman, hastily glanced at some of the financial experiments of the party in power, and I ask if I am not warranted in opposing this, if for no other reason, because it is another experiment, and to be administered by the same hands.

For order and regularity, confusion and uncertainty have succeeded; the rewards of industry fluctuate with every breeze; office holders, brokers and shavers, alone, of all the various classes of society, have flourished the more the greater the distresses and sufferings of others. The grand experiment for improving the best currency in the world has wound up in the creation of an irredeemable paper currency in half the States of the Union—the paralysis of trade—general and intense embarrassment of the people, and the entire disgrace of "the party," the country, and the Government.

Sir, it is humiliating, mortifying, nauseating, to look back upon our condition as it was ten years ago—to trace our history to this time through the wicked, miserable, bungling series of experiments that have been perpetrated upon a confiding people, and to see where we now are and are likely to be for a time to come. True, the Administration and its supporters, in and out of Congress, tell us the existing state of things is the best possible one for the country, and they cheer us forward by promising that when we get labor down to the level of Holland and Germany, we can manufacture so cheaply as to monopolize the home market and undersell in foreign ones; but our fellow citizens who have been accustomed to liberal wages and the enjoyment of what they deem necessaries, and sometimes luxuries, see no good reason why they should be reduced to poverty that the country may become rich.

An honest but misguided enthusiasm for a gallant old soldier, eleven years ago, brought a set of men into power who were entirely unfit to wield it, and objectionable as was the first generation, succeeding ones have become worse and worse from that day to this, till now the destinies of this great country are in charge of mere pedlers in politics—vampires on the community. They have been stumbling, blundering, hobbling along from one experiment to another, obviously without knowing what they were about or caring for the consequences—constantly promising and never fulfilling—paying off old promises by making new ones successively, and promising, too, not only without the means of paying, but without, as it would seem, even the expectation of having them, and this by a set of men who have the most holy horror for the credit system. Personal glorification from him who left "this great people properous and happy" on the 4th of March, '37, down to the humblest tide-waiter in the most obscure fishing village on the coast—the advancement of personal interests and of party interests seem to have been the ruling motives, rather than the welfare of the Republic—credit might perish and commerce perish, and all that renders life desirable might be ground in the dust, so long as the leaders of the party could ride on the crest of the wave and enjoy the 'spoils of victory." Nor, sir, did you sin ignorantly. All the evils under which we now suffer, were predicted by master spirits in and out of the Capitol, but without effect. What was prophecy has unfortunately become history; and now, surrounded by the wrecks yourselves have made, you impudently give the lie to all your former pretensions, and tell the country you have only to look out for the Government.

The President himself, enveloped in the ample folds of his official cloak, says:

"All communities are apt to look to Government for too much! Even in our own country, where its powers and duties are so strictly limited, we are prone to do so, especially at periods of sudden embarrassment and distress. But this ought not to be so!"

Sir, I ask if "the powers and duties of this Government are so strictly limited," why did the "illustrious predecessor" of Mr. Van Buren interfere with the currency at all—why undertake to give us a better one—why volunteer the offer of a plan of a Bank of the United States, as he did in the veto message—why consign credit and commerce to perdition—why declare that all who trade on borrowed capital ought to break? Why all or any of these? And to what end have all your experiments tended ostensibly? And why, sir, has this icy, freezing declaration of the President been withheld till all your splendid experiments have exploded in miserable failures, involving people and Government in one common misfortune?

Sir, our present distresses are attributable to bad legislation. However much we may have merited the displeasure of Heaven, the Almighty has not seen fit to inflict upon us war, pestilence or famine, or any other national calamity; while our people have been as active and industrious and enterprising as ever, and our soil as prolific. If the fault be not in the people, and if the calamities which oppress us have not been sent by Heaven as scourges for our sins, to what cause other than bad government can they be attributed? Sir, I say in my place now, hear it who may, its administration has been in the hands of men either dishonest or incompetent, and their friends may take either horn of the dilemma, as best suits them—they have miscarried from ignorance or design, and in either event they deserve to be removed. And yet, sir, strange as it may seem, these men have the assurance to ask the people of this country—bleeding as they are from every pore by reason of their wickedness or stupidity—to continue not only their party but themselves distinctly in power. Why, sir, if the party had any principles (other than mercenary ones) these men are certainly not the persons to carry out those principles. If an individual should manage the concerns of a private association of business men as the dominant party have managed the affairs of the American people, he would be drummed in disgrace from the viscinage.

What is the remedy? Ill, sir, would it become me, a mere private in the ranks, to point out a remedy for all our troubles; but I can tell you it is not to be found in your Sub-Treasury, with its safes and vaults, its bolts and bars, its bonds and imprisonment. Nor, sir, do I think it would be found in a resort to the State deposite bank system, though this is infinitely preferable to the other, because the money would be safe, and no dangerous Executive influence could be brought be brought to bear upon it—if we could not do all the good we desire, it could do some, and it could do no harm.

We know, sir, that during forty years of our history we had a national bank, and that during that time we had no such embarrassments as now—no ruinous losses by high rates of exchange, and no sudden fluctuations in the value of property, with few exceptions, and they easily accounted for. The troubles growing out of the anti-commercial measures of Mr. Jefferson in the time of the first bank, and the disorders resulting from the war and from the absence of a national bank from 1811 to 1817, and the extraordinary importations for two or three years after the war, with some bad management on the part of the bank itself in its early convulsive efforts to "improve the currency," immediately after it went into operation; for a time affected the bank and every thing else in the country. Order could not at once be brought out of chaos, even had the bank been well conducted; and had it been so, it would have been about the only thing in the country that was.

My own belief unequivocally is, that sooner or later we must, in sportsman's phrase, take a back track. But gentlemen are greatly mistaken if they suppose I would at this time, charter a Bank of the United States: not, however, because I have the slightest doubt of our constitutional right to do it. When I recollect that thirty-two of the thirty-nine framers of the Constitution, at one time or another, officially sustained a National Bank, and that almost one-half of the thirty-nine were in the Congress of '91 that chartered the first Bank; when I recollect that Washington, and Jefferson, and Madison, and Monroe, and last, and least on constitutional points, Andrew Jackson himself, have supported such an institution, and that the Supreme Court, with John Marshall at its head, affirmed its constitutionality; and, too, what may have more influence than all with some gentlemen about me, when I recollect that the charter of the late Bank was passed as a Democratic, war-party measure, against the votes of the Federal party, and that its passage was esteemed a party triumph, I could not doubt, if so disposed, that we have rightfully the power to make a third bank.

But, sir, I would not speak it into existence now if I could; let the present experiment be tried out; let it be ascertained to a demonstration whether a country like this, extending through 18 or 20 degrees of latitude, and twice as many of longitude, with all the varied productions incident to such a space, with a population active, industrious, and enterprising without parallel, and with six and twenty States exercising, and rightfully, too, the power of chartering banks at pleasure; let it, I say, be ascertained beyond all future controversy whether, under such circumstances, we can transact our business successfully and happily without a bank, or something equivalent. Whatever else we may bequeath to our children, spare them, as we love them, the infliction of an age of financial experiments by partisan quacks. We have suffered almost as much as we can by this miserable empiricism. Now let us suffer something more for posterity, that all doubts may be settled, and forever.

No, Mr. Chairman, I will not help to lay a single stone in the edifice till all doubt shall be solved. I will not contribute my humble aid to build up a target for demagogues and broken down politicians and party hacks to aim their poisoned arrows at.

But, sir, I insist upon it, and the people will, as I think, that you do something to improve their condition, or, more properly, to enable them to do it. It is one of the attributes of sovereignty—it is one of the highest obligations imposed by the Constitution, and it was one of the strongest motives for its formation—it was what you have professedly been trying to accomplish for years past, to furnish the country with a sound currency; if it be not done here, it can be done nowhere, and if we refuse to do it, we shall prove recreant to one of our most important trusts. And, sir, it will be done, and done here. The people will decree it, and from that there is no appeal. We may stalk about this Hall in fancied consequence, wielding a little brief authority, saying what shall be and what shall not be, but if we set up our will against that of the people, we shall soon find ourselves the weaker party; let them declare for a National Bank, and there will be one, whether we say yea or nay. If we refuse to do their bidding, it is one of the easiest things imaginable to put us aside and put others in our places. We are not the masters, but the servants of those who sent us. I do not say a Bank of the United States is the remedy, but it is a remedy—perhaps a substitute for that can be found—the end must be attained, however, in one way or another. You took from the people as good a currency as the world ever saw, under the plea of giving them a better, and they will hold you to your engagement, not literally though, sir, for they have had enough of the better, and will only ask for the good currency of which you deprived them by loud clamor and false pretences.

I have before referred to a report made by a committee of the Senate composed of the personal and political friends of Gen. Jackson, at the session of 1829-'30, for one purpose, and I now recur to it to show to "the party" what kind of a currency we had when they began to improve it, and what kind we must and shall have again. Out of their own mouths shall they be convicted. After speaking of the local currency, the committee say:

"There is, however, superadded to this currency, a general currency, more known, more trusted, and more valuable than the local currency, which is employed in the exchanges between different parts of the country. These are the notes of the National Bank. These notes are receivable for the Government by the nine thousand receivers scattered throughout every part of the country. They are, in fact, in the course of business, paid in gold or silver, though they are not legally or necessarily so paid by the branches of the Bank in every section of the Union. In all commercial places they are received in all transactions, without any reduction in value, and never, under any circumstances, does the paper, from the remotest branches, vary beyond a quarter of one per cent. in its actual exchange for silver. Here, then, is a currency as safe as silver—more convenient and more valuable than silver—which, through the whole Western and Southern and interior parts of the Union, is eagerly sought in exchange for silver; which, in those sections, often bears a premium paid in silver, which is, throughout the Union, equal to silver in payment to the Government and payments to individuals in business, and which, whenever silver is needed in any part of the country, will command it without the charge of the slightest fraction of a per centage. By means of this currency funds are transmitted at an expense less than in any other country. In no other country can a merchant do what every citizen of the United States can do—deposite, for instance, his silver at St. Louis, or Nashville, or New Orleans, and receive notes which he can carry with him 1,000 or 1,500 miles, to the Atlantic cities, and there receive for them an equivalent amount of silver without any expense whatever, and in no possible event an expense beyond a quarter of one per cent. If, however, a citizen does not wish to incur the anxiety of carrying these notes with him, or to run the hazard of the mail, he may, instead of them, receive a draft payable to himself or his agent alone, so as to insure the receipt of an equal amount, at an expense of not one-half, and often not one-fourth, of the actual cost of carrying the silver. The owner of funds, for instance, at St. Louis or Nashville can transfer them to Philadelphia for one-half per cent.; from New Orleans generally without any charge at all, at most one-half per cent.; from Mobile from par to one-half per cent.; from Savannah at one-half per cent.; and from Charleston at from par to one-quarter per cent."

Mr. Chairman, I am tired of these currency investigations, and I have no doubt you are, and I will, therefore, endeavor speedily to end them after looking at the effects of your financiering on the State I in part represent.

These importations of last year were one hundred and forty millions, exclusive of re-exports. The population of Ohio is probably about one-tenth of the population of the Union, and it is fair to suppose they consume one-tenth of the imports, or fourteen millions for the last year, to which sum are to be added duties, charges for transportation, and mercantile profits, in all at least six millions, making twenty millions. We gave for that nearly our whole surplus products. Now, these products have diminished one-half in value, and we shall have about the same surplus as before. The imported merchandise will be sold no less because we are embarrased. We must pay the same for a pound of tea or a yard of cloth, whether wheat be worth fifty cents or a dollar. Cost in Europe and incidental charges and profits we must pay, or not have the articles that we may want. As, therefore, we cannot double our product, we must halve the consumption; but for that half we must give the same labor as we last year gave for the whole. Thus, without any equivalent, we shall be deprived of the benefit and pleasure we enjoyed from the use of one moiety of what we before had. If we are in debt, we must pay two barrels of flour where one would have sufficed. The thousand dollars balance due on my farm has become two thousand. The man who has money can buy twice as much as he could then, while the poor man who owes but little must lose his all to pay that little. Thus, sir, of all plans to make rich men richer and poor men poorer, I know of none more efficient than those set in motion by this people-loving, aristocracy-hating Administration. The miserable miser in his attic, insisting upon his pound of flesh because it was nominated in the bond, could not have devised a course of legislation more satisfactory to himself than that pursued in this Capitol.

Our State debt is about twelve millions, for which I am glad to say we have value received—the interest is about $700,000, and this must be paid by the products of our labor, levied in the shape of tolls on the produce we sell, and the goods we consume, and the deficit must be provided for by taxation. Last year 700,000 bushels of wheat would have paid the interest—now it will take 1,400,000; and if the low prices are to continue, a result which we are told is to be productive of so much good, we shall find our debt practically doubled, as well as our interest.

My esteemed colleague [Mr. PARISH] accounts for the low prices of our produce by charging it, most conveniently, too, on the banks, which are made to carry not only their own sins, but every body's else, and he exhibits tables showing the contractions and expansions for eighteen successive months, with the fall and rise in the price of flour. Well, now, sir, if the price of our flour depended upon bank discounts, it must rise and fall to correspond with the increase and diminution of the discounts; but if any gentleman will take the trouble to examine the tables, he will find no apparent relation between them; he will discover in certain periods, during which the banks contracted, say 10 per cent. that flour fell 20 per cent. and when the contractions were 20 per cent. flour fell 10 per cent. The rise and fall of the price of flour depends upon causes beyond the reach of our banks—it must depend upon the value at the ultimate market—severe contraction would retard some what the sale and transportation, as expansion would facilitate them, but neither would materially affect the price. If flour be worth ten dollars in New York, it will sell promptly in Ohio at from eight to nine dollars, whether our banks expand or contract.

But why have our banks contracted? Why, sir, independent of general causes existing all over the country, the Solons in our Legislature, for we have them there as well as here, wished to show their financial skill by making experiments on their own account—they wanted to do their share of the great work of reforming the currency, that they might participate with us in the glory to result from it. The first experiment was at the session before the last; our banks had been in the practice of keeping their surplus funds in the Eastern cities, on which they could draw at sight for commercial purposes, and for the redemption of their notes, a draft always being worth more than specie; and, in fact, but a few years ago, a bank or an individual sending home notes for redemption, would think injustice done if they could get nothing but specie. But our legislators, in the plenitude of their wisdom, decreed that the banks should keep coin in their vaults at the rate of one dollar for every three in paper; this compelled them to withdraw, in coin, the balances due them East, thus helping to increase the embarrassment there last year, diminishing the prices of our produce, as we had done on a larger scale in England when we drew away their gold; but they were also compelled to curtail their discounts and collect their debts, to bring the specie and circulation in relative proportion.

At the last session they voted small bills a nuisance, and decreed they should no longer be tolerated, and this compelled the banks to razee again, because the vacuum created by the withdrawal must be filled with specie, and that must be drawn from the banks.

But our Legislature was not only plenary in wisdom, but plenary in power; and they, therefore, at the late session, asserted and exercised the power of repealing bank and all other charters, whether the right had been reserved or not. And although the power was exerted perhaps in proper cases only, provided the right had existed, yet its tendency was still further to agitate the public mind, already sufficiently feverish.

True, sir, this was looked upon by men intelligent in such matters as mere brutum fulmen, for we have fortunately a Supreme Court, orthodox upon such heresies—a court that will not deny to the sovereign people the right to do in their collective capacity that which each one individually, not being a married woman, a child, a fool, lunatic, or a madman, may do, to wit, make a contract that shall be obligatory. I ought, sir, to ask pardon of my married female friends for putting them in such a category, but I wished to state the exceptions, that the absurdity of the proposition sustained by our Legislature might be the more apparent.

My colleague says we, the Opposition party, intend to compel the General Government to assume the debts of the States. Where, sir, is there an iota of evidence of this design to be found? Is it in the suggestion of a London banker, that it would add greatly to the value of the State stocks? Sir, we all remember what a protracted debate there was in the Senate last winter on a resolution declaring that it would be inexpedient and unconstitutional for this Government to assume the State debts, when not a State in the Union had even intimated a wish that it should be done. It would be unparliamentary for me to say on this floor that the whole affair was superlatively ridiculous, but I may be permitted to say that I believe every body without the ten miles square thought so.

At all events, Mr Chairman, whatever other States may do, Ohio will never knock at yonder door as a suppliant, begging this Government to pay her debts. She is able and willing to pay principal and interest to the uttermost farthing, and her creditors need give themselves no uneasiness about her complying with her engagements hereafter, as she has done heretofore, and which has so justly given her stocks the character they have at home and abroad.

Mr. Chairman, I have trespassed longer than I intended upon the time of the committee. I have forborne to examine the details of the bill, my principal object being to show that the plan itself was objectionable in a pecuniary view, and highly dangerous in its political bearings; and that, judging from the past, no reliance could be placed upon either the ability or the integrity of the men in power, and therefore that we ought not to place in their control a machine so potent for evil of all sorts as this would be in the hands of bad man. Whether I have succeeded or failed in accomplishing my purpose, others will determine.

Sir, I told you it was not for me to point out a remedy for our grievances; but if I were called upon to make suggestions that I thought might be beneficially adopted, I should say, primarily, put honest and competent men into power to constitute the substratum, without which no superstructure that such men would erect could stand for a day. Charter a Bank of the United States, with all suitable restrictions, whenever a decided majority of the people called for it; regulate your tariff so as to protect domestic industry, but without doing injustice to any portion of the Union, or any particular interest in it; divide the proceeds of the public lands among the States, to which, as I think, they rightfully belong, and to some of which they would now be so convenient: and, finally, cease following men or parties merely as such, but go, morning, noon, and night, for the country, the whole country, and nothing but the country.

NOTES.—When I spoke of the hostility of the Van Buren party to banks, I did not expect to have, so soon, record evidence in the House of Representatives to substantiate my opinions. Speedily after the Sub-Treasury bill had passed, and before it had been signed by the President—he retaining it till the 4th of July for his approval, upon the popular idea perhaps that "the better the day the better the deed"—the Senate bill extending the charters of the six banks in the District of Columbia, for two years, was called up for action in the House. These banks were all supposed to be in good condition, and no objection was made to them on any particular account other than that they were banks. By the exhibits it appeared that the circulation was $650,000—the specie $420,000, and that the debts due the banks by the people of the three cities of the District, and the adjacent counties of Maryland and Virginia, amounted to two and a half millions. When the banks in the neighboring States suspended last fall, five of the six District banks did the same, as otherwise their coin would have been drawn from them at once, and not for the benefit of the people, but of speculators.

The Administration party determined to sacrifice these banks, both specie-paying and non-specie-paying, as an example, as they declared in debate, for the State Legislatures, and to this end offered amendments to the Senate bill, some of them avowedly to wind up the banks, and others of such a character as would necessarily result in their destruction, either because they would be unable to prosecute business at all, or because it would be unprofitable. One amendment prohibited the issue of bills under ten dollars, and was carried: 96 ayes, all Van Buren; 76 nays, all Whig.

Another as to twenty dollars was lost: 83 ayes, all V. B.; 106 nays, 96 W. 10 V. B.

Then as to fifty dollars, lost: 69 ayes, all V. B; 106 nays, 80 W. 26 V. B.

Another amendment rendered the president and directors severally liable for all the debts that might be owing by the banks, and for which suit could be brought at once against them, and without having first exhausted the bank effects, and it was carried: 92 ayes, all V. B.; 90 nays, 78 W. 12 V. B.

The bill, as it came from the Senate, provided that the banks should resume specie payments as soon as the banks in Virginia and Maryland; but in the House an amendment was offered and carried, requiring an immediate resumption: 87 ayes, all V. B.; 71 nays, 66 W. 5 V. B.

A measure in itself abstractedly right, and with which the banks could comply, but only by refusing new loans and compelling their debtors to pay, thus punishing the people rather than the banks.

The bill had by this time got into such a shape that many of its friends refused to vote for it, and it was lost—ayes 69, nays 90.

Subsequently; on the 3d of July, the charters expiring with that day, in order to prevent the loss of the corporate character, and thereby the debts due the banks, and to preserve the liability of the banks to their creditors, a bill was passed continuing the corporations two years, for the mere purpose of collecting the twenty-five hundred thousand dollars due them by the people, and that the people might collect the outstanding notes of the banks.

Here, then, in this District, where Congress has exclusive jurisdiction, the party goes against all banks whatever, and for a hard money currency. They were willing to sacrifice every debtor to the office holders and Shylocks in and about the capital. The banks must begin and pursue coercive measures to compel the payment of every debt due them within two years, and men with money will be enabled to buy as much property as they like at their own prices. And what better process could be thought of than this to make "rich men richer, and poor men poorer?"

Congress has done for this devoted District what no State Legislature has done or would dare to do, and what members of Congress would not dare to do, if the people to be affected were their constituents.

COST OF TRANSPORTING SPECIE.

By document No. 116, of the present session, sent to us by Mr. Woodbury, it will be seen that the expense of transporting specie to pay demands on the Government is likely to form no inconsiderable item in the annual expenditure. The following items I copy from that document:

J. De Selhorst, for transporting specie			$368 25
J. De Selhorst	do	do	158 00
J. De Selhorst	do	do	227 00
J. De Selhorst	do	do	114 00
J. De Selhorst	do	do	125 00
Wm. B. Slaughter, Secretary of the Territory, with a salary of $1,000, for transporting $7,000 in specie			200 00
Wm. B. Slaughter, expenses going to St. Louis			100 00
Wm. B. Slaughter, expenses for transporting money from Milwaukie			510 00
Wm. B. Slaughter, procuring money on draft			114 00
Wm. B Slaughter, going to St. Louis for specie, ($20,000,) and paying members of the Legislature			800 00
Wm. B. Slaughter, expenses in collecting a Government draft on land office			100 00
			$2,816 25

All this refers to the expenditures in the single Territory of Wiskonsin, amounting in all to perhaps $40,000.

This may be considered a good beginning in this hard money experiment.

PRICES OF LABOR IN HARD MONEY COUNTRIES, OR WHERE THE CURRENCY IS MOSTLY OF SPECIE.

In November, 1833, the British Government directed its Consuls to answer certain questions as to the condition of agriculture and of agricultural laborers within the districts of their residence, and from the reports made by them it will be seen that in France the wages were from ten to thirty cents a day; in Germany from four to fourteen cents; in the Netherlands from six to forty cents; in Italy from eight to twenty-two cents a day, varying with the kind of labor, the season of the year, location, and upon the fact of boarding with the employer or at home; at the higher rates the laborer invariably boarded himself.

SPEECH OF MR. SALTONSTALL,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In the House of Representatives, April 21, 1840.—In reply to Mr. PARMENTER, on the bill providing for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1840.

Mr. SALTONSTALL said he had been drawn into this debate contrary to his expectation. The course which I have heretofore taken on this floor (said Mr. S.) will render it unnecessary for me to assure the committee that I have risen with extreme reluctance to address them on subjects irrelevant to the bill under consideration. Sir, I have watched the proceedings of this House with great attention, and I confess that I have been astonished at the boundless range of discussion.

My colleague [Mr. PARMENTER] has been pleased to inform this committee of my former connection with another legislative body. It is true; and I may be permitted to say that, from what I had been able to learn there of parliamentary proceedings, I had supposed that something like relevancy in debate must be preserved. I have been astonished, therefore, at the course of this and of former debates. I was surprised to hear the history of the Florida war discussed on the Treasury note bill, and still more surprised to hear the character and merits of a gentleman now in private life, but one whom a portion of his fellow-citizens have recommended to the people as a candidate for the highest office in their gift, minutely examined—to hear battles and military operations critically considered and discussed upon the Cumberland road bill! Why, sir, a stranger might have supposed that this House was a military tribunal, engaged in the trial of that distinguished man for his conduct in battles fought and victories won by him a quarter of a century ago.

Mr. Chairman, I had not contemplated taking any part in such debates, although my own opinions and feelings on political subjects, and my views in relation to the policy of this Administration, and the necessity of a change, if we would restore the freedom and prosperity of the country, are as strong and decided as those of my friends. But, sir, perhaps the bill now before the committee, as has been observed by my friend from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] is as fit an occasion as any other for a broad discussion upon the state of the Union; and I hope that when we shall all have discoursed upon whatever political topic we choose to select, we shall be content to pass from this bill to the real business of the country—that we shall then take up the calendar which is periodically laid upon our tables, and which should remind us that there is a vast amount of business awaiting our action—that private claimants are imploring relief—and that the country is looking to us with deep solicitude at this critical period; for, sir, although the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] has ridiculed the idea that there is any distress except among the idle or the profligate, the whole country is suffering under unprecedented embarrassment. The business of the country is paralyzed from one extremity of it to the other. Sir, no one is more seriously impressed with the necessity of action on the part of this House than I am; but my honorable colleague [Mr. PARMENTER] has chosen to bring me into this debate, and I shall not shun it. He has presented topics for discussion utterly foreign to this bill, or to any question now before the House or the country, and in a manner directly personal to myself. I shall shrink from none of them. He has wandered from the field of discussion, wide as it was before. He has thrown a new element of discord into this debate. I am not responsible for it. He has alluded to events long since past, and interesting only as part of the political history of our country. Does the gentleman suppose he shall benefit his own party, by proving to this House that his colleague, many years ago, was associated with a party, some of whose measures he has endeavored to render odious?

Why has the gentleman done this? Why has he left the field of debate, broad as it was, and gone out of the way to attack a colleague on account of his former association with a political party which has long since existed only in history, or with measures which have nothing to do with, and should have no influence upon, any of the questions now before the country? The course he has taken would have been improper and irrelevant from any one, more so from him, representing here the same State with myself. I was surprised at the course taken by the honorable gentleman. There had hitherto been nothing but the most friendly intercourse between us, and it is not usual to witness personal controversies between colleagues upon this floor. It is obviously desirable that there should be maintained among them unrestrained personal intercourse and mutual confidence, as questions often arise in which the State they represent has a peculiar interest. It is important, therefore, that however widely they may differ in opinion on political subjects, and may be associated with different political parties, they should cherish friendly feelings towards each other.

I ask, then, what was the gentleman's object? Why has he attempted to revive party dissensions which had long since died away; to entertain this House with the history of the Hartford Convention, and to refer to documents connected with it which I know not that I have seen for more than twenty years? Did the gentleman suppose he had made any new discoveries in his antiquarian researches? Did he expect to produce an effect in Massachusetts by referring to that event, and to any relation to it which his colleage may have had? Why, sir, my own constituents well know that I was many years since a member of the Legislature, and that I had the honor twenty-five years ago, soon after I became a member of that body, to be placed on the committee to whom the Governor's message was referred, and who reported in favor of that measure. I have never denied or sought to conceal that fact. Why, then, did my colleague go so far back to bring out this piece of the history of our State at this time, in this place? Did he imagine he had found an edged tool, with which to wound me or my friends? If that was his purpose, he will find himself mistaken. The instrument with which he has made his onset had its edge dulled and blunted long ago. It was long since laid aside in Massachusetts as wholly powerless. This sort of attack is old and stale there; it has been stereotyped, and was worn out many years since. Why, sir, in a leading paper in Boston, the names of the Delegates to that Convention were paraded in capitals on every return of the 15th of December for several years, with a series of hands pointing down to them to render them more conspicuous. It was a poor and futile effort, conceived and continued in the vain hope of exciting public odium against such men as George Cabot, James Hillhouse, Harrison Gray Otis, Roger M. Sherman, William Prescott, and others; men as high minded, honorable, and patriotic as ever adorned the annals of any country. But what can stand before the unhallowed spirit of party! The high and unsullied honor, the exalted public estimation of such men must be attacked or sacrificed when a party purpose is to be accomplished!

The gentleman has an object. His design is to make political capital, (to use a phrase of the day,) by exciting old and almost forgotten prejudices. The first part of his speech was a mere skirmish, intended to prepare the way for the main attack. After some remarks upon the speech of another colleague, (Mr. CUSHING) he advanced to the real object of his speech, which was a studied, regular attack on the old historical, disbanded, Federal party, which administered the Government of this country from 1790 to 1801; a party which has had no real political existence in any State in the country for more than twenty years—in which every man who was of age to vote while it was in power must now be verging on three score years and ten And this historical party is in imagination resuscitated, and held up as an object of terror to divert attention from the questions at issue before the public. We have witnessed a resurrection of dry bones in this modern valley of vision; they have sprung bone to their bone at the breath of my colleague, sinews have come up upon them, and they have stood up a mighty army to fight the battles of the Administration.

Sir, what is the gentleman's argument? It is this. The old Federal party and the present Opposition party are the same. The principles of that party were unsound; the party was unfriendly to the Constitution—dangerous, treasonable; therefore, the Opposition party of the present day is the same. That is the syllogism of the gentleman from Massachusetts! That is the argument, and all the argument. Now, I deny the whole. I deny the premises, and I deny the conclusion; I deny the facts, and I deny the inference; and I will undertake to do, what I am not bound to do, that is, prove the negative. I shall refresh his memory, and will refer him and this House to facts which cannot be denied by any one at all acquainted with our political history, and which must convince the House, whatever may be the effect on the mind of my colleague, that this proposition is wholly groundless.

Mr. Chairman, this is not the first time we have heard the word Federal and Federalist used in a reproachful sense by those who know well the power and influence of names. Whence came a name, now so misunderstood by some, so misrepresented by others? Does not the gentleman, does not every one in this House know the origin of that name? If not, let me refer him to the fifth volume of Marshall's Life of Washington, or to that admirable work, by which the editor has entitled himself to national gratitude, Sparks's collection of the writings of that immortal man, the saviour of his country, whose image there calmly and sublimely looking down on this assembly, ought of itself, at all times, to awe the House into decorum. They will there find that the name is just as old as the Constitution; that those were called Federalists who were in favor of the adoption of that instrument, so often and so loudly lauded in this Hall as the great charter of our liberty. The Federalists were those who believed that a more perfect union of the States, under a Government more national in its character than the old Confederation—a Government which might make uniform laws for the regulation of commerce, make and enforce treaties, and provide for and maintain the common defence, was essential to the prosperity and security of the nation. These were the Federalists. And ought that name to be a reproach? Sir, I thought there were some elementary truths in our political history—that some things were admitted. I thought it was not necessary to advert to facts so undeniable as these, but I find that it is. Time has fled on its way; those who first conducted the Government, and those who supported them, are gone; new parties and combinations of party have arisen. Another generation is around us. Federalists! Why, sir, who made the Constitution?—who first administered it?—who supported the first Administration, but Federalists? And yet the young men of this day are taught to speak of Federalists as a band of conspirators against the Government!

I need not here go into a history of the Federal administrations, though I would recommend it to those who never use the term Federal but with reproach. Sir, it is now admitted by all honorable, candid, and intelligent men—all but the class of small politicians—that those Administrations were conducted by able and patriotic men; men influenced by good motives and upright aims; men of probity and honor; mistaken, it may be, in some of their views of the Constitution as now generally understood—for the Constitution was then a new and untried scheme of government—but still honest in their opinions, friends of their country, lovers of liberty. Will it be denied, will a doubt be expressed in this House, that George Washington and John Adams, and those who were associated with them in the Administration, their friends and advisers, were upright, pure, patriotic men? How could it be otherwise? Would not the men who were foremost in the struggle for our independence, and who made this Constitution, administer the Government, as they intended and believed, in the strictest conformity to it?

Sir, let me, at the hazard of being misrepresented for party purposes, call the attention of this House to what the Federal party did while in power—to their character, their principles, as illustrated by their conduct. Let us judge them by their fruits—let us contemplate them, not as they are caricatured in the harangues of demagogues, but as we find them in their system of foreign and domestic policy, by which this infant nation was conducted with unexampled rapidity in the course of honor, prosperity, and happiness. Let me refer the committee to the celebrated letter of Robert Goodloe Harper, who had been a distinguished member of Congress, bearing date the day after Mr. Jefferson's inauguration, "containing a short view of the political principles and system of the Federalists, and of the situation in which they found and left the country." What were their principles of foreign policy? I read from that letter:

"The leading principle of their system, as to foreign nations, has been to preserve peace and amity with all, by a conduct just and liberal, and fair towards all; but to grant privileges to none, and to submit to indignities from none; to rely for the protection of our rights and honor, not on the friendship, the justice, or the forbearance of other Governments, but on our own strength and resources, and to employ vigorous means for calling forth those resources, and preparing them for exertion in time of need."

The same principles are stated in Washington's farewell address, as that system of policy which, in his opinion, was best suited to ensure the blessings of peace, and the respect of foreign nations. They are those which have been professed by all succeeding Administrations. Regulating its conduct by these maxims, the first Administration preserved the nation in peace amidst the most general and most furious war of modern times. Let gentlemen recollect those two periods, when we were first in imminent danger of a war with Great Britain, and then with France, in both which cases peace was preserved without a sacrifice of honor.

In the administration of the Government, one of their cardinal principles was to cherish and protect commerce Various measures were adopted by them for its encouragement; but their great, their favorite and efficacious measure for its protection, as well as for the defence of our country, was the establishment of a naval force. Need I remind this committee that the navy was created by them? And what was its condition when they were superseded? I read from the same letter:

"The navy consisted of thirty-nine vessels, of various size and force, mounting upwards of eight hundred and seventy guns, and manned with upwards of seven thousand seamen and marines. They had also made considerable progress in the establishment of navy yards and wharves, and in preparation for building six 74s."

In what condition did this calumniated party find the country? They found it without a dollar in the Treasury; without any permanent revenue; without a system of finance, and burdened with a debt of seventy-six millions! There was (almost literally) no commerce, no public credit, no mutual confidence, no uniform laws. All was chaos—every thing was to be created or put in order.

I find, on the authority to which I have referred, that, in 1790, our shipping amounted only to 450,000 tons, and that, in 1800, it amounted to 939,000 tons. In 1790 our exportation of foreign commodities brought into the country for re-exportation amounted to less than $2,000,000; in 1800 it exceeded $39,000,000. In 1790 our exports of our own produce barely exceede $14,000,000; in 1800 they amounted to nearly $32,000,000.

I might go on and state more at large the situation in which the Federal Administration found, and in which it left the country at the end of twelve years: but it cannot be necessary. The sources of information are obvious to all who really desire it.

But they passed a sedition and an alien law! And these obnoxious acts are to overbalance all their good deeds! Their general policy, and its great and beneficial results, are to be forgotten, and they are to be overwhelmed with obloquy on account of one or two particular measures! What has any party of this day to do with those laws? If my colleague expects me to justify them, he will be disappointed. Part or lot in them I had not, for I was then but a youth at school. I know them only as he does—as a matter of history. As such, I know that there was a difference of opinion concerning them among the friends of the Administration at the time they were passed. I know that they were made under peculiar circumstances, at a very critical period of our public affairs. I consider them as inexpedient, and as extreme in their character; and, sir, they are now generally, if not universally, thought to have been founded on an erroneous construction of the Constitution. Whatever may be their true character, no political party of the present day is responsible for them, or should be affected by them. But, let me tell the gentleman, there are measures of this Administration which go beyond those acts—which show a much greater stretch of power.

But certain principles are attributed to that party, as part of their political creed, which are now generally rejected, at least in speculation. It is alleged to have been part of their system to support vigorously the authority of the Federal Government, and to maintain the Executive power against the superior strength of the legislative branch of Government. At that early day, in the very outset of the Constitution, when it was as yet all theory, it is true that the apprehensions of many were from the supposed weakness of the Executive. They believed that there would be a tendency, on the part of Congress, "to encroach on the Executive powers, and to direct and control the President in the exercise of his authority."

But experience has since proved that their fears were not well founded. I think the course, as well of the late as of the present Administration, must have proved this to the satisfaction of all men. The real danger to liberty menaces us from the directly opposite direction, and now our most serious apprehension is from the encroaching and all-engrossing influence of the Executive. But this experience those who then conducted our public affairs had not had. They were just setting the machine of Government in motion, and, from contemplating the theory of its action, such a fear was natural enough.

So much for the old Federal Administrations. I do not speak of them as infallible or immaculate, but as having been conducted by a body of honorable, upright, and patriotic men, some of whom were men of consummate ability and wisdom, and I say that, judging of them from the results of their conduct, no man has reason to disavow his connection with that party, or to consider the name of Federalist as opprobrious. The name of Federalist opprobrious! And has it come to this? There stands the father of the school.* Is it a reproach to have belonged to the party of which Washington was the head? a party which was supported by John Jay, John Marshall, Charles C. Pinckney, Oliver Ellsworth? But where shall I stop? I might go on and point the House to a constellation of great men, illumining the whole country—men as great, as good, and as wise, as ever blessed any country on earth.

In 1801, the people elected other rulers, and the change is now sung and celebrated as a great civil revolution. A revolution! In what? The men were changed; but was there any change in the great and leading features of the policy of the Government? Has not our foreign policy been professedly guided by the same principles? Are not the Judiciary, the Treasury, and other Departments of the Government, conducted essentially on the system as at first established? Has not the vessel of state been guided by the chart laid down by those who first directed its course? Mr. Chairman, the Government must be administered on the great principles established by Washington, or it must fall to pieces.

Although the Federal party had ceased to conduct the Government of the United States, it continued strong in Massachusetts and in other States for several years. Let me now call the attention of the committee to the charges of my colleague against his own State. He has arraigned her before this committee. He has impeached her character for patriotism and fidelity to the Constitution and the Union. I know the gentleman has attempted to make a distinction between the Government and the people of Massachusetts—no such distinction can be made. But, if he aimed only at the Administration of that day, he included within his charge as great and as good men as the country contained—men in whose integrity all parties had perfect confidence.

Perhaps the gentleman is not aware of the strength of his expressions. Here they are, as I took them from his lips:

"In New England, notwithstanding the whole people of this country entered into the war for the benefit of the Northern part of the country, they did all they could to favor the enemy." "They took a ground directly against the interests of the country, and the most powerful dictates of patriotism." "Though our seamen were imprisoned in foreign prisons, yet the Federal party (the Whig party) took part with the enemy.

This is part of what the gentleman has said to this House and to the whole country, of the conduct of his own State. And I say, Mr. Chairman, that these accusations are untrue. Neither the Government nor the people of New England took part with the enemy. On the contrary, I undertake to say that Massachusetts made as great exertions, and in as good faith, to defend the country against the enemy, as any State in the Union. Let us, Mr. Chairman, look back to the period of the war. Let us glance at incidents in our history which have been improperly brought before this committee, but which must now be noticed in reply to the remarks of my colleague.

It is well known that there was a party, and a large party, not only in New England, but in Congress, and throughout the country, opposed to the declaration of war, and this on various grounds. The object of the gentleman's speech was to render that party, especially in Massachusetts, odious, and then to identify with it the present Opposition party. The opposition to the war in 18 2 is charged to the Whig party of 1840. Right or wrong, the Opposition then had nothing to do with opposition now. The party in power in Massachusetts, in their opposition to the Administration, were contending for great, and, in their opinion, all-important principles. They were opposed to the declaration of war from the highest motives of patriotism. Does not the gentleman know that the different parties entertained different views of that great and tremendous conflict which had been raging in Europe for twenty years, and this was the basis of the party divisions? Think of the situation of the world at that time—that Napoleon was then in the zenith of his fame and power, and in the full tide of military success—that he was just on his march to Russia, with an army gathered from all nations, and Great Britain was, in the opinion of those opposed to the declaration of war, the only barrier against universal conquest. Napoleon—the French power—was the object of their dread. They thought their country had more to fear from this than any other cause; and a declaration of war against England, at that moment, was, in their opinion, in effect, to become an ally of Napoleon. That we had suffered great wrong from France was admitted by all. Was not the justice and expediency of the war, then, under the circumstances, a question on which the wisest and most patriotic men might honestly differ in opinion? I do not enter into the argument; I merely advert to the circumstances.

This party was equally opposed to the war on grounds of policy. In their opinion, the country was wholly unprepared for war with a great and powerful maritime nation. Our whole coast was exposed to attack; our vast commerce to destruction. Yes, Mr. Chairman, under these circumstances, a large portion of the citizens of Massachusetts and of other States were opposed to the war; but that they took part with the enemy—that they were not true to their country—I did not expect to hear from the lips of a Representative of that State. As to the defence of the country against the enemy, there was but one party there.

The gentleman has alluded to the controversy between the Government of Massachusetts and the General Government, which he has resolved into mere opposition to the war. A controversy did arise immediately after the declaration of war, and one, in the opinion of the people of that State, involving important principles, and affecting the dearest rights of the people. Great constitutional questions arose as to the powers of the Federal Government over the militia of the States, one of which related to the command of the militia when called into actual service. These questions were submitted to the highest judicial tribunal of the State, at the head of which was Theophilus Parsons, one of the most profound jurists our country has produced; and the ground taken by Governor Strong and his Council, was confirmed by the court. They were questions upon which men might entertain different opinions, without being subjected to reproach. It was to be expected that such an event as war should give rise to conflicting questions.

My colleague says, we did what we could to favor the enemy. I again deny it. I might use harsher language, but I will not indulge in terms I feel strongly tempted to employ. What, sir, Massachusetts wanting in patriotism! Massachusetts taking part with the enemy! There is no foundation for the charge. If I had read what the gentleman has stated on this floor, I should have called it a gross libel upon the character of that State.

The gentleman makes a distinction between the Administration and the people. He says the people of Massachusetts were sound and patriotic. Sir, he knows that the great body of the people zealously supported the Government. The people called on the Government for relief and protection, and petitions flowed into the Legislature for the very measure which my colleague so vehemently condemns. The people of Massachusetts stood by their Government, and the Government stood by the people, and both stood by their country. Who made greater exertions or greater sacrifices in the war than did that slandered people? There were more of them in the navy, and more in the army; there was more Massachusetts blood poured out on the decks of your gallant ships, and on your battle fields, than from any other part of the Union. And what did her Government do? Did they not call out thousands of her militia, and expend millions of dollars in defence of the country?

Mr Chairman, has it come to this? Because some of the New England States contended for rights which they deemed to be important to the States and to the people, must I stand here and hear my native State accused by one of her Representatives of doing what they could to favor the enemy?

But my honorable colleague has introduced the threadbare subject of the Hartford Convention into this debate, as evidence of the unlawful designs of the party then in power in Massachusetts and other New England States; and I must follow him there. The gentlemen has read part of the report in the Legislature of Massachusetts recommending that measure. I wish he had read the whole, and all other documents connected with the Convention. They will show that the object was not to aid the enemy, or to dissolve the Union, but, on the contrary, to devise the best means of security and defence, and of preventing the recurrence of similar evils. No, sir, there was no treasonable design avowed or concealed. There was nothing unconstitutional or seditious in that meeting; and that is the charge. Whether it was judicious or expedient; whether it had not better have been omitted; or whether, as an example, it was likely to exert a salutary influence, are different questions.

My colleague has told you, sir, that I was a member of the committee which recommended that measure. I shrink not from the avowal; I was a member of that committee. I remember well their deliberations, and I can add my testimony to that of distinguished members of the convention and others, as to its design. Never for a moment was there the slightest intimation of a purpose to dissolve the Union, or to violate constitutional obligations of the States; on the contrary, such a proposition would have been regarded with abhorrence. They did not sit down and count the cost of this Union. No, sir, the measure proved to be useless. It has been misunderstood, and has excited great prejudices, jealousies, and misrepresentations, which may have rendered it a political evil; but as to its objects, and the intentions and purposes of the parties concerned, the Convention at Hartford was just as innocent, and in my opinion as justifiable as that at Harrisburg, the recent conventions in some of the Southern States, on account of the difficulties of their trade, or as the party conventions now so common.

Sir, what was the design of the Hartford Convention? To put an end to the Government? No; but in a time of common danger to consult together upon subjects in which they had a common interest, and upon the best means of defence, in a lawful and constitutional manner. That was its main object. There was great excitement and alarm amongst the people. The ships of the enemy were hovering on the coast. They were exposed to hostile invasion, and were defenceless; the regular troops had been withdrawn, and were on the Canadian frontier. There was a controversy with the General Government as to the militia. The people were calling on the Government for protection. What was then to be done? It was a question which required the consideration of the most wise and experienced men.

The first resolve in the report to which the gentleman has referred shows the great object of the measure proposed:

"Resolved, That the calamities of war being now brought home to the territory of this Commonwealth; a portion of it being in the occupation of the enemy; our seacoast and rivers being invaded in several places, and in all exposed to immediate danger, the people of Massachusetts are impelled by the duty of self-defence, and by all the feelings and attachments which bind good citizens to their country, to unite in the most vigorous measures for defending the State, and expelling the invader; and no party feelings or political dissensions can ever interfere with the discharge of this exalted duty."

Does this look like taking sides with the enemy? And the Government went on and took vigorous measures for the defence of the State. Let me refer the committee to all the documents connected with that event; to their report; to the journal of their proceedings, which has long been before the public; and particularly to its history, by the Secretary of the convention. Here they are; they are accessible to all. They all show a determination to defend their country, at all hazards, against the public enemy, and to adhere to their constitutional obligations.

The resolutions under which the delegates were chosen, and their commissions or instructions founded on them, repel the idea of an intention to violate the Constitution. The delegates were agents acting under a limited authority. The proceedings of Connecticut refer to those of Massachusetts. The delegates were instructed to "meet those of other States, and confer with them on the subjects proposed by a resolution of that Commonwealth; and upon any other subjects which may come before them for the purpose of devising and recommending such measures for the safety and welfare of these States, AS MAY CONSIST WITH OUR OBLIGATIONS AS MEMBERS OF THE NATIONAL UNION." The instructions of Massachusetts and Rhode Island were of the same character, and equally explicit.

I am not contending, Mr. Chairman, that the convention was a wise or expedient measure. My colleague has raised no such question. What I maintain is, that the members of that convention went there as good men, and true to the Constitution, with good motives, and for a lawful purpose, and that neither they nor the States which appointed them, were wanting in fidelity to the Union or to the country. Look at their report; is there any thing in it that looks like a disolution of the Union? No; it recommended a plan for the defence of the country, and a proposition for certain amendments to the Constitution, to be made according to the provisions of the Constitution.

The gentleman admits that the great body of the people were sound and patriotic. Sir, the people of Massachusetts wanted no other security against any treasonable designs than the character of the men who composed that convention. Look at the list. At its head stands George Cabot, its President, one of the two first Senators from Massachusetts; one who enjoyed the confidence of Washington; a man utterly destitute of political ambition, and who never sought or would accept any public office, after he retired from the Senate, until he was persuaded, at a perilous crisis of our affairs, to represent our Commonwealth in that convention. Mr. Cabot was a retired gentleman, holding no public office; yet there was no citizen whose opinions on all important public questions had more weight and influence.

Then follows Nathan Dane, then in advanced life, a man eminent for his profound knowledge of the common and constitutional law, and of the political history of his country. Mr. Dane was a distinguished member of the old Congress, and his services there will be forever acknowledged by the country, from that lasting monument of his wisdom, foresight, and patriotism, the celebrated ordinance of 1787. He had long ceased to have any connection with party, and was reluctantly drawn from his retirement in this instance. It is well known that the statistical tables and documents annexed to the report of the convention are in a great measure the result of his accurate and laborious researches.

The next on this list of conspirators against their country is William Prescott, still living, by the blessing of God, and long, I hope, to live, an ornament and blessing to the community—son of that Col. Prescott who commanded at Bunker Hill, if the little band that so bravely defended that height had a leader. Need I tell you, sir, who William Prescott is; that he is a lawyer of great eminence, now enjoying in retirement from professional labor the highest respect and confidence of the whole community in which he lives?

Then comes Harrison G. Otis, well known throughout the country as one of our most accomplished and eloquent men and most eminent statesmen; elected a Senator after the peace. Then follow the names of Timothy Bigelow, then and for many years the distinguished Speaker of the House of Representatives; of Joshua Thomas and Hodijah Baylies, both revolutionary patriots—revolutionary officers during the war. Strange that such men should turn conspirators against the liberty and independence of their country in their old age! Sir, I might go over the whole list of the distinguished men who formed that assembly—many of whom are not among the living—but it cannot be necessary. They were men incapable of any treasonable design.

The honorable gentleman says that ambassadors were sent to Washington in pursuance of the recommendation of the Convention. True, agents were sent; but for what purpose? Was it not to make an arrangement with the Government for the effectual defence of the country? And who were they? I have referred to Mr. Otis. Who Thomas H. Perkins is, my colleague has told you, and I have great pleasure in saying that the gentleman has paid a just and beautiful tribute to his worth. He has described Mr. P. as a man whose heart is all benevolence, whose character is all honor; a man who has yielded up his costly and spacious mansion as an asylum for the blind. What materials to make a traitor of!

There is one other. Sir, I listened with pain and astonishment to the remarks of my colleague on the character of the late William Sullivan. In violation of a maxim held sacred among all civilized and even uncivilized communities, (for it is founded on the common feelings of our nature,) the gentleman has violated the sanctity of the grave, and has shot his arrows at the dead! Of Mr. Sullivan the gentleman has made a statement which, on reflection, I think he will himself regret. He has been informed that the late Governor Sullivan, (father of William Sullivan,) who, he says, had been cruelly calumniated when he was a candidate for that office, had stated that his own son was the author of it all! Sir, I cannot believe it. The gentleman himself, I am confident, cannot believe it. It cannot be true. It is impossible. I well remember the bitterness of that electioncering contest, and how much sympathy was felt for the son by his political friends at the severity of the attacks on the father. The statement cannot be believed by any man who is himself a father or a son—by any one who has human feelings within his bosom. My colleague says he was not acquainted with Mr. Sullivan. Sir, no man can credit the story for a moment who did know that most amiable and excellent man. Mr. Sullivan had long been retired from public life. During the last years of his life, he devoted the fine powers of his mind to the improvement of the young. Who that is acquainted with his excellent "class books" can withhold his tribute of respect, so justly due to a man who could voluntarily withdraw from what are to most men the great objects of pursuit, and devote years to the laborious preparation of such works?

It has recently pleased God to call him from a family and a circle of friends who venerated and delighted in him, to a better world. Yet such is the fury of party contests, that even such a man must be charged in this hall as having been guilty of little less than parricide! of having fabricated cruel slanders against his own father!

So much for the Hartford Convention, which my colleague has made it necessary for me to notice. I repeat that, whatever may be thought of it in other respects, it was strictly constitutional in its design, and that its members were among the most wise and faithful men in the community—men entitled to the confidence reposed in them; that they were capable of discerning the proper course to be pursued in their relation to the Federal Constitution and to the State Government, and in defending their country against the public enemy. My honorable colleague will not deny their high standing and character. He speaks of them politically, he says.

I come now to another part of my colleague's speech; his attempt to identify the present Opposition party with the old Federal party. He says they are one and the same.

Sir, the proposition cannot be maintained; the Federal party, as a party, was extinct long before the formation of the present parties, and a great portion of those who now act with either of the political parties belonged to neither of the old parties. They know them only historically. They have come into political life since. But what if a large portion of those who remain of the Federal party in Massachusetts are now opposed to the Administration? it is equally true that a large portion of the old Republican party are associated with them; and it may as well be inferred that the Republican party and the Whig party are identical, as that the Federal and the Whig party are the same.

I might refer the gentleman to individuals in every part of our Commonwealth, who were among the most zealous supporters of the Administration of the State during the war, who are now as ardent supporters of Mr. Van Buren's administration—Hartford Convention Federalists then, now genuine disciples of the new school of Democracy. In six of the twelve Congressional districts in Massachusetts, the Administration candidates at the last election were Federalists. My friend and colleague near me [Mr. CALHOUN] informs me that he has at the three last elections been opposed by three persons who were all of the old Federal party.

But what has become of the old Republican party? Are they to be found in the Administration rank? My colleague is perplexed with the case of my friend and colleague, Governor Lincoln. It seems to him passing strange that that gentleman should be found with his present associates. Were that gentleman present, I might appeal to him whether he does not find himself associated with a large portion of his old political friends, the leading men of the old Republican party. I unhesitatingly state it as a fact. I could refer my colleague to persons in every portion of our State, known to him, formerly leading Republicans, now Whigs. Let me refer him to the gentleman who was at the head of the Navy Department, under Mr. Madison, and who represented the district I have now the honor to represent, and to another distinguished citizen who recently so honorably represented our State in the other House. Were they not formerly decided Republicans? My colleague well knows that they are now as decided opponents of the present Administration.

I might go on and name others who were formerly Federalists, and are now of the Administration party, or who were formerly Republicans, and are now in the Opposition. Among the latter are some of our most distinguished citizens, men holding high judicial and other offices. I say, without fear of contradiction, and I take great pleasure in stating, that a large portion of my political friends in the place of my residence, those who took a lively interest in my election, were formerly members of a different political party from myself. We stood in different ranks, and were zealous political opponents. Has there been any change in their political principles? None at all—not the slightest. Their principles and their opinions on past events are unaltered. And yet, according to the reasoning of my colleague, they have all become Federalists! No, sir, when party strife subsided, those who have been fiercely contending discovered that they had done injustice to each other's motives, and that there was no reason to doubt that their political opponents were honest in their opinions, and that both parties were equally true to the Constitution and to their country.

Mr. Chairman, when my friend and colleague [Governor LINCOLN] was nominated for the high office which he so long held, with honor to himself and to the Commonwealth, he received the support of both parties. He was put in nomination by the Republican party; but the Federalists never proposed a candidate against him. Party strife ceased. His Executive Council was composed of persons who had belonged to both the political parties.

The same breaking up of parties took place to a great extent throughout the country. Mr. Monroe's administration received the cordial support of all parties, and he was elected for his second term unanimously, with the exception of a single vote, which was given to another from strong feelings of personal attachment, by a distinguished member of the Republican party. We had for a time a season of blessedness and peace, when party strife ceased; its discordant voice was scarcely heard within these halls. Even General Jackson had recommended to Mr. Monroe to disregard old party distinctions. And here, let me ask if the succeeding Presidential election was placed on party grounds? Not at all. All the candidates belonged to the same political party. The Federalists proposed no candidate. It was a mere contest from personal preferences. In Massachusetts the great body of both the old parties contituted a new party, which supported my venerable colleague [Mr. ADAMS] in the Presidential contest. He was opposed in Massachusetts and other States, but not on the ground of his Federalism; far otherwise with some of his warmest opponents. He was then never charged with that crime. The basis of the two great political parties has ever since been, adherence or opposition to the Administration, without regard to former distinctions. Sir, we are opposed to the Administration, not because they are wanting in Federalism, as commonly understood, but because of their ultra-Federalism, if there is any meaning in the term. What is Federalism? Its great features have been supposed to be a disposition to strengthen and increase the power of the Federal Government, and the patronage and authority of the Executive.

Sir, who are those men who are so shocked at what they call Federalism? By whom is the charge of Federalism made upon the Opposition? By ultra-Federalists! By men who have driven Federalism up to the hub; men whose extravagance in doctrines and in practice have startled old-fashioned Federalists. The Democratic Administration, so called, has been guilty of measures from which Hamilton and the elder Adams would have shrunk; assumptions of Executive authority, of which the imaginations of the early Federalists never conceived. I say, Mr. Chairman, that the last Administration, and that the present, which thinks it glory enough to tread in the footsteps of the last, are in doctrine and practice ultra Federal. Their measures are more deeply tinged with the highest and most obnoxious principles of Federalism, in the common acceptation of the word, than any ever before assumed; so much so, that a great and deplorable revolution has been accomplished. If the assumptions by the late President are to be followed by his successors, and established as part of the Executive power, then the Constitution has been practically changed; and unless the Government shall tread back its steps, the Executive power in this Republic will be a thing entirely different from that which was intended by the framers of the Constitution. The President will be no longer the President of the Constitution, but an unlimited sovereign. The original forms of the Republic may be preserved, as they were in Rome, long after Rome had lost its freedom, and was ruled by an imperial despot. The forms may survive, but the soul of freedom will have departed—our liberties will be gone. The supreme law will be the Executive will. The President, instead of respecting the will of the people, as expressed through an independent House of Representatives, will direct and control that will until Congress shall become the mere eche of his own will. Like his great predecessor—the hero of the Hermitage—the President will put down his foot, or bring his cane down, and swear that a measure to which he is opposed—no matter by what majorities it may have passed in Congress—shall never become a law. While pretending reverence for the popular will, and listening to popular shouts, he will disregard and trample upon the will of the people, as constitutionally expressed, if inconsistent with his own; and while ruling that which in mockery may still be called a Republic, he will be, to all intents and purposes, an absolute, unlimited sovereign.

An honorable member from Virginia [Mr. BANKS] has this morning lamented the want of decorum in debate, and the free manner in which gentlemen remark here upon our rulers. Sir, I shall speak with decorum, but I shall also speak with firmness and with freedom. If for this the dogs of slander are to be let loose upon us—if false and injurious statements are to be circulated through the country, we must submit. But if this is to be the price at which men must serve their country here, I know not how long you will be able to induce those who have a home, a family, and a character dear to them, to take seats on this floor.

How is it that this change in our Government has been brought about? How is it that the people have so long upheld an Administration which has usurped such power? It has been done by force of that party organization, that thorough system of party tactics, established under the late military President. And now what an outcry is made because the Opposition are taking measures to give efficiency to their efforts, as the only successful means of counteracting a combination of men who are as thoroughly drilled and disciplined as a Prussian army! We do this to resist the power of a new despot—I mean the despotism of party spirit extending throughout the country, wielded and directed by Executive will.

I have said that a change had been effected, practically, in the Government. Sir, what was the President of the United States intended to be? A Chief Magistrate, the bounds of whose authority are prescribed in the Constitution and laws.

But look at the conduct of this officer. Look at the course of the late President, whom our present Chief Magistrate professes to take as his model: it is all one Administration. Look at his interference with the rights of Congress. Consider his attempts to destroy the weight and influence of the Senate as a co ordinate branch of Congress. With all his pretended respect for and submission to the will of the people, consider his free and insulting remarks upon proceedings and debates in the House of Representatives of the people. Look at his refusal to answer interrogatories put to him by the grand inquest of this nation, through their committee. Look at his directions to his subordinate officers, on the same occasion, to disregard the authority of this House, in effect. Then hear him justify the whole by asserting that great political heresy that he is himself the direct Representative of the people, and answerable for his acts to them alone. And consider the inference he draws, that, let him do what he will, and say what he will, if the people elect him a second time, they put the seal of their approbation on all his acts and all his opinions, and that, therefore, they are not the legitimate subjects for legislative examination. Is not this enough? But this is not all. To crown all, comes the doctrine of Executive unity. He and all Executive officers, throughout the country, are a unit. He, and he alone, is responsible for all their acts, and therefore he may remove them at pleasure. He is their head, and to him alone are they responsible, and he is responsible to the people only. Above all, consider his abuse of the veto power—a power conferred by the Constitution for the purpose of checking hasty legislation on great emergencies.

What more is wanting to a complete despotism—to make as absolute a monarch as ever existed, but the power to construe the Constitution as he may think proper, without regard to judicial decision, the practice of Congress, or the acquiescence of the country? And even this he assumed! I say that these principles go to destroy all free Government. I repeat, sir, that if they are to be established and continued, the country has undergone a civil revolution, and that we no longer live under a limited Government. And what have we not seen as the legitimate consequence of these assumptions of power? Need I advert to the seizure of the public treasures, in direct violation of law? to the arbitrary dismission of an officer who was too honest to approve or to aid in that measure? Need I advert to the proscription of men for political opinion, and their removal from office on this ground alone? to a tyranny which can endure no free opinion? My colleague says that this has not been done to any great extent, and that the great fault of their chief, in the opinion of many, is the mildness and lenity which he has exercised. Indeed! Sir, I do not know to what part of the country my colleague alludes. It cannot be to our own State, for I do not there know a single man who is known to be hostile to the Administration left in any office over which the General Government has a control.

One word further, sir, as to the veto power. I know it is a familiar topic, but it is one of the most important that has arisen since the formation of the Government, because the unprecedented manner in which it has been exercised is utterly inconsistent with a free representative Government. The late President brought so much of the military character into civil office, that he could hear of no resistance to his will. Do you believe that in England such a use of the veto would be submitted to? Never. Even if the young Queen Victoria, in all the freshness of a nation's attachment to a youthful female sovereign, should attempt it, she would very speedily discover her error. Should the British Parliament pass a bill, for example, to re-charter the Bank of England, do you believe the Queen would dare to put her veto on the act? The Minister who should advise such an act would not keep his place an hour. The right is recognised in the British Constitution, but it is unknown in practice. The exercise of this power, as an ordinary act, on the grounds of expediency merely, and because the President differs in opinion from the majority of both branches of Congress, is opposition to the will of the people. A reform in this respect is essential to the preservation of our Constitution in its purity.

Now, sir, all those assumptions, this arbitrary claim and exercise of authority, on the part of the Executive, is justified, is approved by my colleague, and yet he is shocked with the Federalism of the Opposition.

The dominant party came into power by the cry of Reform! Reform! when no reform was necessary. It was a mere pretence; but it served the end, and brought President Jackson into power. And what did he do? He promised reform, but what reform did he effect, or pretend to make? What change did he produce for the better? He did not even make an attempt at reform, but introduced or increased every evil against which the leaders of the party had made such an outcry.

He said that there ought to be but one Presidential term, yet he consented to be chosen a second time; and it has been supposed that a third nomination would not have been unacceptable to him, and that he would have been willing to serve his country another term. He exclaimed against appointing members of Congress to office, yet he made more such appointments than all his predecessors had done; and his successor knows well how to reward those for their party services in Congress who have received marks of the disapprobation of the people. He was very indignant at the interference of office holders in elections, and yet, under his Administration, office holders were the most active and zealous electioneerers the country contained. He denounced it as a great public grievance that appointments should be made from any other motives than the public good; but what appointments did he make except as a reward for party services, and to promote party objects? Again, he was opposed to removing men from office for opinion's sake, and yet he had scarcely taken his seat before proscription lists were formed, and men were removed for a word—for a look! How much of this was done in Mr. Adams's time? Had he removed men who were his opponents, and filled their places with his friends? In the exercise of his official patronage, had he taken into consideration his own re-election, have you any doubt of his success? But I hold it to be his glory that he refused to do any such thing.

Mr. Chairman, how are things changed! At this day, not only are office holders permitted to interfere in elections—it is expected of them. It has been declared to be their duty, in a pernicious report made at the last session of Congress, in the other branch. They would be reformed out of office if they declined this service. Men of the highest offices in New England may be seen travelling every where, going forth on missions as itinerant political preachers. It is true, they do not meet with much success—we have not heard of many conversions in Connecticut or Rhode Island. But, to the disgrace of the Government, important offices are made a sinecure, and those who receive the emolument are wandering about, lecturing for the Administration wherever they can draw an audience. Such men are among the most mischievous in the community, and the practice is one of the greatest and most alarming evils. It should be checked; and I am glad that my friend from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] has so ably presented the subject before the consideration of this House and the country.

The gross interference of office holders with elections is undeniable. Who does not know that their motto is, "The President expects every man to do his duty?" that is, to do all he can to secure the party in power. Were it not beneath the dignity of this debate, I might refer to a letter from the postmaster of one of the most important offices in Massachusetts, which has recently excited attention even here, written to an officer of a neighboring town, exhorting him to have every man taxed upon whose vote he can rely, and authorizing him, if money is wanted for the payment of the taxes, to call on him! What a spectacle is this for a people once free! How have we fallen! The time has been when conduct like this would have excited universal indignation. Yet such interference with elections is tolerated; nay, sir, I fear it is required!

In conclusion, I observe that reform is now needed in all the particulars in which the party in power called for it when it was not necessary. The evils now exist. I hope reform will come. I do not undertake to prophesy. I express my earnest hope. I have spoken of the principles and the official conduct of the party in power. I am not going to say a word as to the character or relative merits of the candidates for the Presidency; that is a question which should not be debated here; it belongs to the people, to the whole people, and to nothing but the people. It should be canvassed, not in this House, but out of it; and, in my judgment, it betrays a want of good taste, no less than of legislative decorum, to drag in here and bandy about the name of a distinguished man, who has rendered great public services to the country, merely because it has pleased his fellow-citizens to put him in nomination as a candidate for the Chief Magistracy. Sir, the people have nominated him. To the people I cheerfully leave the result.

SPEECH OF MR. RANDOLPH, OF NEW JERSEY.

In the House of Representatives, January 9, 1840—On the New Jersey contested election.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of S. Carolina, having moved the following:

Resolved, That all papers or other testimony in possession of or within the control of this House, in relation to the late election in New Jersey for Representatives in the 26th Congress of the United States, be referred to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to inquire and report who are entitled to occupy, as members of this House, the five contested seats from that State.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be served on John B. Aycrigg, John P. B. Maxwell, Wm. Halsted, Chas. C. Stratton, Thos. Jones Yorke, Peter D. Vroom, Philemon Dickerson, Wm. R. Cooper, Dan. B. Ryall, and Joseph Kille, all citizens of New Jersey, claiming to be Representatives from that State in this Congress; and that the servive be made upon each gentlemen personally, or by leaving a copy at his usual residence.

And the amendments to this resolution, offered by Mr. BELL and Mr. RANDOLPH, being under consideration, and Mr BOTTS having concluded his remarks—

Mr RANDOLPH obtained the floor, and said that he had hoped the present discussion might have been avoided, but as the whole subject has been re-opened, and the ex parte affidavits and certificates again spread before the House and the country, in order to prevent the misapprehension that might arise therefrom, he would embrace the present opportunity to defend the course pursued by his colleagues and the constituted authorities of New Jersey.

He regretted extremely to trespass again on the time of the House, after the patient and flattering attention they had paid to his remarks on a former occasion; but gentlemen who manifested some uneasiness now must recollect that it was their own act that placed him in the situation he now occupied, and deprived New Jersey of the right of being heard by those who were much more able than himself to maintain her cause. Though frequently compelled to take the floor, he had, indeed, occupied the time of the House a much shorter period than some other gentlemen he could name.

The New Jersey election of 1838 was conducted with great spirit; much excitement prevailed, and the result was still unsettled. His colleagues, however, came here, as he had uniformly stated in this House, though sometimes misunderstood or misrepresented, with the regular commission, claiming to have a majority of the votes legally received and returned, and also a majority of the legal votes themselves; whilst their opponents claimed to have a majority of all the votes taken, whether legally received and returned or otherwise. As some dissatisfaction prevailed in the State, and as his colleagues, though satisfied themselves with the correctness of the position which they occupied, felt perfectly willing to refer the settlement of the disputed election to that people whom it was said they would misrepresent, they magnanimously, on the 4th of March, 1839, the first day of their official existence, when, so far as the elections had then progressed, no one doubted but their political friends would have a decided majority in the present House, proposed to their opponents that both parties should yield up their claims, and submit the whole matter to the decision of the people. To this reasonable proposition the gentlemen declined to accede, as would appear by the correspondence. [The correspondence was then read.] The reasons assigned for refusing the proposition were doubtless satisfactory to the gentlemen who gave them; whether they would be so to the House and the country would be for others to determine. He had heard of other reasons—the new election law and the fear of legislative interference; but the Legislature had adjourned, and the election law had not changed, but only thrown additional safeguards around the elective franchise, so as the more effectually to prevent the reception of alien and illegal votes.

Finding that the matter could not be tried by the people, and the House and the country relieved from the loss of time and expense of any investigation, and having moreover been notified in the correspondence by the gentlemen now contesting that they should "contest your [their] right to seats"—not take them in the first instance—they deemed it right and just to all parties, and to the country, to give every facility to a full and fair investigation, with as little delay and expense as possible; they accordingly determined to have the evidence taken, and be prepared, immediately on the organization of the House, to have the whole subject committed and disposed of as soon as circumstances would permit. They gave notice to their opponents of the taking of testimony in various parts of the State, but he regretted to say that the gentlemen declined to pay any attention to the notices or to the taking of the evidence; on the contrary, he had been informed that some of their political friends had invariably attended and obstructed the proceedings; and, in some instances, by representations and threats of prosecution, induced witnesses to retire without being sworn, and, in others, putting an entire stop to the proceedings. It was, however, in candor due to the gentlemen, to state that there was in New Jersey no law regulating the taking of testimony in cases of contested elections, except the one passed since this election occurred; and although that was doubtless intended to meet all cases, yet, probably, on a fair construction, it would not be found to be retrospective; but it was understood to be the law of this House that when evidence was taken, upon due notice, before a State officer authorized to administer oaths, it was competent and would be received; and, whether the statute in question applied to the case or not, its provisions afforded a reasonable rule of practice, and, pursuant thereto, some evidence had been taken and transmitted to the Speaker, as he had stated a few days since, when the question of referring the South Amboy testimony was before the House.

The conduct, then, Mr. Speaker, of the gentlemen holding commissions, has been fair and honorable, alike becoming themselves and of the State they represent. Of their opponents perhaps it did not become him to speak; they doubtless had satisfactory reasons for the course they had pursued. He would remark, however, that he entertained no unkind feelings towards any of them, with some he had been intimate for years—for all, personally, he entertained a high respect; and, had they come forward in the usual way that seats in this House are contested, it would have been his pride and his pleasure to have extended to them, on this floor, as he had otherwise, every courtesy and every facility in his power; but when they permitted themselves to be placed in a position to deny the validity of the proceedings had by the constituted authorities of the New Jersey, and the efficacy of her laws, it was not to be expected that he could do any act that might seem to sanction such a proceeding.

The Constitution (Mr. R. said) had wisely left to the States the power of regulating "the times, places, and manner of holding elections," as well as that of designating the qualifications of electors. These powers covered the whole subject, matter of elections from the first nomination until after the House was organized, and had, in the usual way, executed its power of judging of "the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members"—not of persons merely claiming to be such, or contesting the rights of others, but of such only as were, in fact, members, in their seats, and so recognised by the House. It was by virtue of the State laws enacted under this power, that every return, from that of the smallest precinct to that of the State Executive, was made. The State law then being paramount, creates the rule by which the returns and the returning officers of the New Jersey election are to be judged; and whether those laws be wise or unwise, technical or otherwise, was for the people of New Jersey and not for this House to determine. The Legislature of that State had enacted many provisions to preserve the purity of the ballot-box and the correctness of the returns: none but free white male citizens, who had resided in the country a year and paid tax, were entitled to vote; the election must be held at a designated time and place in each township, by three persons regularly chosen at town meeting and qualified, or, in case of a vacancy, by a majority of the legal voters present, at 10 o'clock on the first day of the election, a certificate of which must be filed with the clerk of the county within three days; and the result of the election in each township made out in due form under the hands and seals of a judge and two inspectors (all of whom are, in fact, judges) duly chosen and qualified, must be filed in the clerk's office by 5 o'clock on Saturday after the election. Frauds (Mr. R. said) had been committed, and alien and illegal votes received in various townships throughout the State; the names of two hundred and forty-four illegal votes, cast for the contestants, had already been ascertained, as he understood from his colleagues, and were now in their possession: this was more than enough to elect all of them. In South Amboy a vacancy occurred in consequence of one of the judges of election being a candidate for the Assembly. The following affidavit will state how that vacancy was filled:

State of New Jersey, Middlesex County, ss.

Be it remembered that, on this twenty-second day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, before me the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace in and for said county, personally appeared Charles Fish, John Seward, Thomas Appelget, June Cheney, Thomas Delaney, Jasper Smith, John Fry, Dana Nichols, Thomas Blydenburgh, George Jolly, Jacob Burlow, William Gise, John Jolly, Gilbert Disborough, who, being each duly sworn according to law, on their oaths say that they were present at the place appointed for holding the election, and where the same was held, in the township of South Amboy, in the said county of Middlesex, on the second Tuesday of October instant, before the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon; than when the hour of ten arrived, at which the poll should be opened for the reception of voters, it appeared that Clarkson Browne (one of the individuals previously selected for assessor of said township, and therefore one of the inspectors of the election) was a candidate for the General Assembly, and therefore was disqualified for acting as such inspector; and it being necessary to choose some other person to serve in his stead, it was proposed to hold an election for the purpose of choosing an inspector in the stead of the said Clarkson Browne; and, after getting the remaining officers of the election to proceed to such election, proclamation was made by Nathanial Hilyer, the Judge of election, to receive nominations, when James M. Warne, Vanliew Gordon, and John B Appelget were nominated; the voters present were then directed that all that were for John B. Appelget should go to the south, and for the other two candidates, one to the east and the other to the west, and, upon dividing off, it appeared that John B. Appleget had seventeen votes, and James M. Warne and Vanliew Gordon had together three votes, and the said John B. Appelget was accordingly duly elected inspector by a large majority of the votes of the people present entitled to vote; but the officer of the election, although repeatedly called on, refused to announce the result and consider the said John B. Appelget as elected, but withdrew into the house, and held a consultation, and withdrew the name of Gordon from being a candidate, and, after some time had elapsed, put the question again for the choice of an inspector between Warne and Appelget, and at the second running off Appelget had again a large majority, but the judge would not announce the result, nor did he do so until after delaying a long time, and until there arrived sufficient votes to give Warne a majority, and then declared that Warne was elected, and held the election before said Warne as one of the officers of the election, contrary to all justice and right, when the said John B. Appelget was duly elected by a large majority, and ought to have been allowed a seat at the board as one of the inspectors of the said election, and further say not.

The facts disclosed by this affidavit were fully sustained by the evidence taken on notice which had been read. The first witness specified the transaction as follows:

State of New Jersey, Middlesex County, ss.

John Seward, a witness produced on the part of the said John B. Aycrigg, John P. B. Maxwell, William Halsted, Charles C. Stratton and Thomas Jones York, and being by me duly cautioned and sworn to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, did depose and say that he was present on the morning of the election held at the House of Clarkson Browne, in the township of South Amboy, on the ninth day of October, 1838, before and at the opening of the poll; that Clarkson Browne, one of the candidates for the Legislature, was at that time the assessor of the said township of South Amboy; it was mentioned that, inasmuch as the said Clarkson Browne was disqualified from acting as one of the inspectors of the election, it was necessary to choose another person in his place. Proclamation was then made by Nathaniel Hilyer, judge of the election, that there were three candidates nominated and that such persons who were in favor of James M. Warne should go to the west; John B. Appelget, to the south; and Jaques Vanliew Gordon, to the east: they did so; the deponent was satisfied at that time that John B. Appelget had a large majority over both the other candidates. John B. Appelget had as many as seventeen, and the other two candidates together had not more than eight or nine. Mr. Hilyer, the judge of the election, then announced that, Appelget had a majority. The people then dispersed; then, after a delay of fifteen or twenty minutes, the judge came out on the stoop, and announced that they would then run James M. Warne and John B. Appelget without Jaques V. Gordon. The judge then directed that all those who were in favor of James M. Warne should go in one direction, and all those in favor of John B. Appelget to go in another direction. They did so. The judge again then announced that John B. Appelget had a majority. The judge then reversed their stations; when a pause ensued, before he announced the result, for some minutes, during which time a number of persons came from the mill, and a wagon drove up with voters, which then gave a majority in favor of Warne. Warne was then declared by the judge to be elected inspector of the election. The poll was opened, and they proceeded to take in votes. From the time it was first announced that an election would take place up to the time that Warne was declared elected, deponent thinks was about half an hour. Wr. Warne and Mr. Gordon belonged to the Administration party, Mr. Appelget belonged to the Whig party: deponent knows they belonged to the parties aforesaid, from what he has heard them say. Deponent was present at the election pretty much all day. Deponent is acquainted with nearly all the foreigners that reside in the township of South Amboy; and those with whom he is acquainted, except three, belong to the Administration party, and, from what he has heard them say, he has no doubt but they voted that ticket.

After the election board had been constituted in the manner disclosed by the evidence, little attention seems to have been paid to the qualification of voters, as would appear by the following affidavits, which were also fully sustained by the evidence taken on notice:

State of New Jersey, Middlesex County, ss:

Be it remembered that, on this twenty-third day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace in and for said county of Middlesex, John B. Appelget, being duly sworn on his oath, saith, that he was present during the election for members of Congress and of the State Legislature on Tuesday and Wednesday, the ninth and tenth days of October instant, in the township of South Amboy, county of Middlesex, and that he saw twenty persons being aliens vote at said election. When they presented themselves they were challenged, and did not produce any thing but certificates of their intention to become citizens, and yet the judges of the election admitted them to vote without producing any evidence of their being citizens. The names of the persons who thus voted are: Samuel Whatson, Martin Harney, James McComb, James Conologue, Patrick Murphy, Robert Smith, John O'Neal, Francis Dale, Hugh Canolouge, Barney Malone, Solomon Hustin, John Curley, Peter Bulger, James Casley, James Riley, James Rourke, Malachi Good, Coley McDunner, John McCorley, and John Ferguson. And this deponent further says that Hugh Campbell, a foreigner by birth, presented himself to vote, and he, this deponent, challenged his vote, and demanded the evidence of his naturalization; but the judges of the election, notwithstanding, permitted him to vote without producing either the certificate of his intention to become a citizen, of the certificate of his naturalization. And this deponent further says that he saw and was present when Robert Greenlief presented himself to vote, and, being challenged, admitted before the judges that he had only moved his family into the county of Middlesex a few days before the first day of April last past, and yet the judges admitted the said Robert Greenlief to vote; and further saith not.

Be it remembered that, on this twenty-third day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, before me, the subscriber, one of the justices of the peace in and for said county of Middlesex, personally appeared Obadiah Herbert, who, being duly sworn, on his oath saith that he was present during the recent election in South Amboy, Middlesex county, and saw from fifteen to twenty foreigners vote at said election; that the judges of the election were informed by this deponent that the certificate which they produced, being the certificate of their intention to become citizens, was not the legal certificate of their being citizens, and did not entitle them to vote, yet the judges admitted them to vote; and that he saw a foreigner vote at said election, by permission of the judges, without producing either a certificate of his intention to become, or a certificate of his being, a citizen of the United States. Yet, said Mr. R. notwithstanding these illegal and alien votes, and the fraudulent manner of choosing the inspector, the entire vote of South Amboy, aliens and all, would have been counted, if the return had been accordiug to law. No evidence of the election of James M. Warne, as inspector, was ever filed with the Clerk of the county, as the law requires. The return came to the Clerk under the hands and seals of two persons only whom he officially knew to be authorized to hold the election, and of a third, the evidence of whose power to act had not been filed according to law. It is idle, sir, to say this is a technichality, or that a majority may act—the law declares otherwise: and it should be borne in mind that that very minority might be the means of preserving the purity and the sanctity of the ballot box; and so thought the Legislature; for, although the act of 1787 authorized the judge and inspectors, or a majority of them, "to make the return," the act in force in 1838 requires that the "judge and inspectors" only shall make the return, leaving off the phrase "or a majority of them." The Clerk had been informed of the fraud and illegal votes; and although he may not have judged of the one, or investigated the other, yet surely they afforded no reason why he should receive an illegal return; but, on the contrary, an additional inducement why the requirements of the law should be looked to and exacted. To obtain the benefit of legal votes, they must be legally received and returned; but here the Clerk was censured because he refused to step over the law, and receive an illegal return of votes, of which a large number were aliens and disqualified persons. It really seemed to Mr. R. to be a plain case, and had it not such an important effect upon the result of the election, its correctness would never have been questioned. It had occurred before, as long ago as in 1817, in the case of Nugent and Stockton vs. Reid and Pierson, in the New Jersey Legislature; the latter got their seats upon the same point; but as on investigation, there was no fraud or illegal votes, the former were admitted, without any pretence, so far, as he had ever heard, that the Clerk had done wrong. So well satisfied, indeed, where the people of New Jersey with this provision of the law, that it was suffered to remain with this settled construction, unrepealed, and without amendment, for more than twenty years. If, under the plea of a technicality, or the pretence of a hard case, the Clerk may reject or step over one provision of the statute, he may for the like reason reject another, or ever the whole statute. He would have thus thrown upon him a discretion as unwise as it would be dangerous; and if he could reject any provision of the statute in order to receive an illegal return of illegal votes, he could do the same thing to reject the legal return of legal votes, and thus the result of an election would depend not upon the settled law of a State, and the will of her citizens, but upon the caprice or partisan feelings of the Clerks, and in this way would be effected the very state of things which gentlemen so much deprecate. No, sir; our only safety, the only stability of free Governments, must ever depend on a strict adherence to the Constitution and the laws; far better is it to suffer a temporary evil from the law, than to admit a principle that must subvert the law itself. It appeared, by an endorsement on the South Amboy certificate, that the Clerk of Middlesex had rejected the return from that township on Friday, the 12th of October, and he, (Mr. R.) in passing through New Brunswick on that or the succeeding day, had been informed thereof, not by the Clerk, for he had no recollection of having seen him on that occasion, but as a fact then notorious. This was several days before the result of the election was known, and at a time when it was generally believed that the Administration ticket had succeeded by from three to five hundred majority. Mr. R. would say one word with regard to the Clerk. He knew him to be an upright and conscientious, a high-minded and honorable man; an efficient and accurate officer, and of that independence in judgment that no argument, of friend or foe, could have induced him to violate his duty, or do what he believed to be wrong.

[The House having adjourned at this stage of the proceedings, and Mr. RANDOLPH having the floor on the following morning, he rose and stated that as many gentlemen had evinced a desire on the previous evening to terminate the debate, and as he had originally been in favor of dispensing with the further discussion of the subject, he would defer his remarks to a future time, if the question might be taken at once. Mr. CLIFFORD, of Maine, having objected to that course—]

Mr. R. proceeded and said that the statute of New Jersey requires that the election officers of each township shall make out their return or "list," and "sign, certify, seal up, direct, and transmit [it] to the clerk of the county," "before five o'clock in the afternoon," "on Saturday next after the day of election." By the certificate which has been read from the Millville officers, it appears that it was received by the county clerk "on Saturday, the thirteenth day of October, A. D. 1838, between the hours of ten and eleven o'clock in the afternoon." It also appears, from the same paper, that an inspector was elected to fill a vacancy, the certificate of whose election was not filed according to law. Either of these defects was sufficient to invalidate the certificate as a return, and of course as such it could not and was not received by the clerk. The difference of only five or six hours in the time of receiving a certificate might seem a small matter to some; but if honorable gentlemen would look at the statute and the reason of it, they would see its importance. Some time must be fixed within which the return must be made, or the election could never be closed and the result be known; and if any period is fixed, then that time is imperative, else it is worse than useless to fix it. If you give the clerk a discretion to go beyond it an hour or a day, he may take a week or a month, and become the arbitrary despot he has been sometimes represented But the statute has placed this matter beyond controversy by requiring that, after the clerk has received the returns, he shall "then," at five o'clock, "in a public manner, [obviously that the public there assembled may be then informed,] proceed to make out his general list" of the votes of his county, "the same" to be transmitted to the Governor. Of course, all township returns not then received cannot be included in the "general list;" and this, said Mr. R. has been the universal understanding and practice in New Jersey. Probably not an election has occurred in thirty years when an express has not been sent from some county town to expedite the tardy return of a distant township, lest it should be lost in consequence of not getting in by five o'clock; and during that whole period scarcely an electoral and congressional election has occurred but some one or all the candidates have lost a township, or in some instances several townships, for this very reason. This was the point in the case of Board and Lydaker vs. Colefax and Van Houten. In 1822, three townships in Burlington county were lost; in 1828, one of the Adams electors lost the votes of a township because it was not received in time, though the clerk certified to the error, and the correction of it; and in 1836 the township of Montgomery was lost upon the same ground. But the objection to the vote of Millville, as well as to that of South Amboy, does not rest merely on the illegality of the return; if so, there would prohably never have been a contest further than the appearance of the gentlemen holding the commissions for the purpose of surrendering them to the House.

The law, said Mr. R. defining the elective franchise in New Jersey was too plain to be mistaken; it declares that "no person shall vote, unless such person be a free white "male citizen of this State, of the age of twenty-one years, "who shall have paid a tax, and hath resided in the county "where he claims a vote for at least one year immediately proceeding the election." Yet notwithstanding the plainness of this act, and the still more explicit preamble to the act of 1807, the election officers of Millville gravely decided that aliens had a right to vote. The language of the preamble to the act of 1807, which first defined the qualifications of voters in the very language of the act in force in 1838, was remarkable. It reads thus:

"Whereas doubts have been raised, and great diversities of practice obtained throughout the State in regard to the admission of aliens, females, and persons of color, or negroes to vote in elections, as also in regard to the mode of ascertaining the qualifications of voters in respect to estate; and whereas it is highly necessary to the safety, quiet, good order, and dignity of the State to clear up the said doubts by an act of the Representatives of the people, declaratory of the true sense and meaning of the Constitution, and to ensure its just execution in these particulars, according to the intent of the framers thereof: Therefore, be it enacted," &c.

Clear and explicit as were the provisions of the law, settled without a dissenting voice from lawyer or politician for more than thirty years, as it has been, yet, strange to say, on the morning of October 9, 1838, a new light was shed over the State of New Jersey, and the election officers of Millville, South Amboy, and various other townships throughout the State, as it were by preconcert, decided that aliens had a right to vote, and they received their votes accordingly, as they had a large number of votes from non-residents and other disqualified persons.

The citizens of New Jersey, sir, feel perfectly competent to decide their own elections without the aid of aliens, and history will reprobate the conduct of that man or that party who calls in their assistance to decide the balance of political power.

But to the township of Millville. The decision of the election officers led to some strange results, as would appear from the facts elicited on the Cumberland investigation before the Legislature. He would read a paragraph or two:

Page 8.—Q. Did a majority of the judges and inspectors declare that they would receive the votes of aliens, if they were inhabitants of the township, and had paid a tax, or words to that effect?

A. They did, if they had resided in the county a year; I did not hear any thing said about paying a tax.

Q. Will you state how many aliens voted after that?

A. I believe there was twenty-eight.

A. In France. I voted at the last election in Millville. I have not been naturalized. I don't remember any of the names—"gold and silver I know—the paper I knows him not"—I was born where the gold and silver was, and I still like it the best. I voted that ticket because I wanted a bank to bring more gold and silver—the ticket I voted was called some kind of a "crat" ticket—I don't know what kind of a "crat."

Here, sir, is a specimen of the votes by which the majority of Cumberland county was controlled, and attempts made to control the State—they are almost equal to Mr. Samuel Weller's independent voters of Eatonville, only, as the New Jersey election was by ballot instead of viva voce, it was not necessary that they should be pumped on to qualify them for the exercise of the elective franchise.

At the last election aliens were not permitted to vote in Millville; and notwithstanding the most determined exertion, the vote few short forty-four votes, or one sixth of the entire vote—more than sufficient to have elected one of his colleagues. He would add, also, that the South Amboy vote had diminished although a member of those who voted there last year have since been naturalized.

Mr. R. would appeal, then, to gentlemen, if this was a case (if such a case can ever be) in which the clerk should have stretched the law and his power to have received the return? He thought not; the letter of the law, as well as its spirit and the principles of right and justice, were against it, and against either the possession or the exercise of any such discretion of the clerk.

In the case of Moore vs. Letcher, Hocker, in violation of law and his duty, withheld the return of his county, because he alleged that there were illegal votes included in the return from another county in the district, and yet his conduct was not only justified by the then President, who, shortly after, appointed him to an important office, but by the acts and votes of his political friends on this floor, amongst whom was Philemon Dickerson, one of the contestants. Will gentlemen then justify an officer in violating his duty and the law to keep out a legal return, because another return contains some votes against them, alleged to have been illegal, and then turn round and require other officers to violate the law and their duty in order to get in an illegal return covering a large number of alien and illegal votes in their favor? Are gentlemen prepared for this?

The law of New Jersey requires that the clerks of the respective counties shall, on Saturday after the election, at 5 o'clock, p. m. "made one general list of all the candidates voted for as aforesaid, together with the number of votes received for each of them, and shall transmit the same" to the Governor within seven day thereafter. The law is not so absurd, sir, as to require the clerk to include in his "general list" all the votes received by each candidate, whether the election has been held or the return made according to law or not; but he is to include such votes only as are taken and returned according to law and by him "received for each candidate;" and "the same" general "list" thus made out, nothing more and nothing less, is to be transmitted to the Governor. The law neither requires nor authorizes any thing different, and certainly no moral obligation can go further and require an extra-official return of those townships which were not legally returned to him, especially when they covered frauds and illegal votes, which might be investigated by another tribunal; though not by him. And if such extra-official statement had been added, according to the decision of the Governor and Council in 1828, it could not have been noticed in the final account.

Mr. R. said it had been intimated that other townships were as defective in their returns as were Millville and South Amboy, and he had understood that the clerks who received and transmitted them had endeavored to get them back from the Governor in order to have them stricken from their "general lists," although no frauds or illegal votes had been alleged in those townships. Whether either of these allegations was true, he knew not, but would leave them as he had heard them, with the single remark, which he would in candor make, that he had heard that at some elections there had been cases where the clerks had stepped over the law, and received returns not made in exact accordance with the statue; but those, if there were such, being from townships where no frauds had occurred or illegal votes received, and where no objections had been made, formed no precedent for cases like Millville and South Amboy. The clerk must go according to law, without discretion; but if he ever chose to bend its provisions to receive the return of legal votes, that surely constituted no precedent and no reason why he should do the same thing to receive the illegal return of illegal votes. The clerks of all the counties in the State transmitted their "general lists" to the Governor within the time prescribed; that from Middlesex was made out in the usual form adopted in that county, and according to the form used by the clerk of Somerset in 1836, specifying the different townships; the former writing opposite South Amboy thus; "From this township no return according to law was received;" the latter stating opposite Montgomery, "no return," although a legal return was made and transmitted, and reached the clerk after five o'clock. The "general list" from Cumberland was according to the uniform practice in that county, giving the aggregate of votes for each candidate, without specifying townships. Either mode was according to the statute and the practice adopted in different counties.

We will now (said Mr. R.) look at the proceedings before the Governor and Council, premising that, even if the clerks erred, which they did not; the decision of the Governor and Council was correct, unless they, instead of this House, had the legal power to remedy the evil. This position is thus laid down in Spaulding vs. Mead, page 163:

"Suppose he (the returning officer) had refused all the votes given for a candidate in several counties, the Governor could not pay any attention to these votes, for his certificate must be founded exclusively on the votes returned to him; he would be obliged, therefore, to certify as duly elected the person having the highest number of such votes, although it might be proved that the suppressed votes, if counted, would have given the highest number to another candidate."

The law requires, sir, that—

"The Governor or person administering the Government of this State shall, within five days after receiving the said list, lay the same before a Privy Council, to be by him summoned for that purpose; and, after casting up the whole number of votes from the several counties for each candidate, the said Governor or person administering the Government and Privy Council shall determine the six persons who have the greatest number of votes from the whole State for Representatives in the Congress of the United States from this State, which six persons the Governor or person administering the Government shall forthwith commission, under the great seal of the State to represent this State in the House of Representatives of the United States during" the Congress for which they were elected.

The Governor was authorized to select any three of the Legislative Council (or State Senate) to be his Privy Council; he summoned the whole seventeen, and laid before them the "lists" received from the seventeen county clerks. He delivered on that occasion the able opinion which has been published, and after a year's reflection, in his recent message, which has been much misrepresented in this House and out of it, he states that, although "it would have been agreeable to his feelings could the necessity for action on his part have been dispensed with," yet, he adds, "every review of the opinion expressed at that time has only confirmed me in the belief that the law was faithfully declared," and the whole message was in accordance with that declaration.

Two questions were raised, sir, before the Governor and Privy Council. The first was, that it was the duty of the Governor, under the statute, to have sent expresses and got in the return of votes from Millville and South Amboy. That statute reads as follows, viz.

"If the certified lists of votes given for electors of President and Vice President, and of Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States, shall not be received from the clerks of any of the counties of this State by the Governor, or person administering the Government within seven days after the day prescribed by law for the casting up of the votes, making a list thereof, and certifying the same, by the clerks of the respective counties in this State, it shall be the duty of the Governor forthwith to send express to the clerk of the county or counties from which such certified lists of votes have not been received, and to procure the same."

The requirement of this clause in the statute is very plain and simple, and its object was to remedy an evil which arose in the first New Jersey contested case under the statute of 1787. That act has no such clause, and the Governor had no power to get in the lists or returns from the different counties; he and his Council could only adjourn from day to day, and wait a reasonable time, as they did in that case; but owing to the neglect or misconduct of the returning officer, in the county of Essex, the votes of that county never got in or were counted; and this caused the contested election. For the township return, sir, the statute makes provision, by requiring its rejection if not sent in within the prescribed time; for the county return, which was the only one the Governor could recognise, there was no remedy if it was not transmitted in time; the statute did not, like that of the township, reject it, nor was any person empowered to get until this statute authorized the Governor to send an express to the clerk, and get the "general list" made out by him. Well, as in this case, all the list had been transmitted to the Governor in due time; there was nothing for which he could send; and, if he had sent, it must be to the clerk who had already transmitted his list, and, of course, he could only get the same thing. The Governor had no power to send beyond the clerk, or, even if he differed in judgment with him, to compel him to alter his return or send a different list. The Governor, then, having no power to exercise under this law, of course exercised none.

Mr. R. said that, although there had been several cases in New Jersey where the clerk's lists did not contain all the votes of all the townships, yet there never was a case where the Governor had sent beyond the clerk, or had attempted to get any other returns than those sent him by the clerks; such an idea was never advanced till the present case occurred. The cases before referred to, which occurred in 1822, 1828, and 1836, all proved this. The latter was a remarkable case. This clerk of Somerset, a prominent supporter of the Administration, made out the "general list" of his county, leaving out the votes of Montgomery township because it was not returned before five o'clock. This township gave a majority for the distinguished gentleman across the House, (Mr. GRANGER.) and the distinguished statesman of Ohio as well as for himself and colleagues; and he was informed by one of the Privy Council who officiated on that occasion, that he had distinctly raised the question under this statute, whether it was not the duty of the Governor to send an express for the votes of the missing township, and that the Governor examined the law, and decided that the statute did not apply, and that he had no power under it to send the express, and the Privy Council concurred in that opinion, a majority of whom were the leading supporters of the Administration in New Jersey. That Governor, sir, who made that decision, was PHILEMON DICKERSON, now here claiming his seat. It is true, sir, circumstances have changed; Mr. DICKERSON ceased to be Governor and became a candidate for Congress, and, in counting the returns, the same question had occurred, and the same decision which Governor D. had made against him (Mr. R.) and his colleagues was applied to Mr. D. and his associates, and now it is alleged to be erroneous and fraudulent!

This point, however, (said Mr. R.) was considered so plain and self-evident that the honorable Senator, (Mr. WALL) who argued the matter before the Governor and Council, seems to have placed but little or no reliance on it; he raised another question, and insisted that the Governor and Council should then receive the certificates of votes from Millville and South Amboy and count them—aliens and all. This the Governor and Council decided that they had no right to do; their duty was plainly and explicitly stated in the statute—it was simply to "cast up" the votes, and "determine," from the "general lists" of the clerks, "who had the greatest number of votes in the whole State;" else the illegal return of an election held on a wrong day, by persons neither chosen nor sworn, and who received an indefinite number of illegal votes, might be received. No authority is given them or intended to be given them, by the statute, to go beyond those lists or procure other evidence. The Governor can receive nothing but what comes from the county clerk, and that only can he lay before the Privy Council, and from that only can they determine. They have no power to swear witnesses or to send to or beyond the clerk. If they had received the certificates and affidavits of the election officers of Millville and South Amboy to prove that Messrs. DICKERSON and Co. were entitled to the additional number of votes, then they must also have received evidence of the frauds committed there, and of the number of alien and illegal votes, and thus usurp the power of this House of judging of the "elections of its members"—a course in violation of all principle, and censured by this House as illegal in the case of Wing vs. Biddle. The Legislature itself, sir, had no power, nor did they ever intend or pretend to confer such authority on the Governor and Council. Three only—all political partisans—may constitute the Privy Council; and shall they have such an enormous power conferred on them? Never. The county clerks have the same power in returning members to the Legislature that the Governor and Council have in returning Representatives in this House; and shall they also be raised into the character of courts, to receive evidence here ask determine the question of election? How long, he would as in these exciting party times, would the free institutions of the country endure under such a law and such a construction? It was as destitute of precedent to sanction it as it was of principle to support it. The Governor and Council having determined that himself (Mr. R.) and colleagues were elected, they were commissioned accordingly. That commission did not, it is true, state by what vote the person holding it was elected, nor did that of the Chief Justice, or of any other State officer—all of which he believed were in the same form; but it was conclusive, until the House, in the regular exercise of its constitutional power, determined that others instead of his colleagues were entitled to their seats; it was the determination of a competent, constitutional tribunal—not a mere certificate of facts based upon better evidence; that construction would bring us to the people themselves as the best evidence, and the sovereign people, instead of sending a return through their agents, must come up en masse to this House, and declare who were their Representatives.

Mr. Speaker, since I last had the honor of addressing myself to the members here, a change has come over the proceedings of this House. The seat which you occupy has been filled; the desk beneath you, which was then held by a mere locum tenens, who, according to his own decision, was powerless for good, but potent for evil, has been supplied with a permanent occupant, and the lucrative appointment of printer has, in effect, been made. New Jersey, sir, has been disfranchised, and I no longer rise here the proud Representative of a free people enjoying equal rights and equal laws with those of other States, but rather as the mere remnant that is left to what was once my State. I feel deeply humiliated, sir, at my situation. The degradation of my State degrades all her sons, and if there is any degree of shame, I, sir, feel it the more sensibly, from the prominence of the position in which I have been placed. Sir, history will record the circumstances that led to the commission of THE DEED, and there, sir, it will be learned that parties stood in this House 119 for the Administration; 123 with, and 118 without my five colleagues, against it; that South Carolina held the balance of power in the twenty-sixth, as she had in the twenty-fifth Congress. And, sir, she held the balance on the question of Speaker, and, also, on the Jersey question; and although I impeach the motives of none, yet I did suppose, from her professed principles, that in her hands the State rights of New Jersey were safe. Sir, New Jersey, being the point on which the power of the Administration, if not its very existence, depended, was doomed to be sacrificed; and whilst gentlemen were making great professions for the people, in order to effect that sacrifice, a majority of this House determined that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NAYLOR,] with his 800 majority, should not vote on a New Jersey question, when his vote was essential to a decision of that vote in favor of New Jersey; although a majority of the House determined, shortly after, that he might vote even in his own case. Sir, his was but one vote to be gained or lost, and political power depended not on that; New Jersey had five votes, on which hung the power of the House, and New Jersey was rejected. I disagree with my honorable friend from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] in exonerating the Clerk from all blame; he was but the means, the instrument, it is true, by whom the wrong was effected, and without whom, I believe, it would not have been done; yet as such I blame him, whilst I detract not an iota of the responsibility from the party and its chief, by whom the deed was done. Sir, one of the first acts of the first of the Stuarts was an attempt to extend his prerogative over the returns to Parliament. The Chancellor, sir, the creature of his will, was the instrument on that occasion; but his audacity was rebuked by the House of Commons; and the same game was attempted, with more success, by Oliver Cromwell, as the Protector of the dear people. And these, sir, are the illustrious precedents by which the returns from a State Executive have been disregarded, and the State disfranchised. It is not a matter of surprise that the honorable member from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] should be sick of this New Jersey question. Sir, I doubt not but he and his political friends will grow much worse before the Jersey question is done ringing in their ears, with the knell of departed power.

Mr. Speaker, I have been placed, in this controversy, in a delicate and responsible position. High and important duties to my colleagues, my constituents and my country, have devolved upon me, and I have endeavored, sir, to perform them to the best of my ability, faithfully and honestly. Selected, sir, for the station now occupied, twice without my solicitation—once after a positive declension—I have felt and acted on this as I trust I shall ever do on all other questions, fearlessly, independently; and as I neither expect nor desire again to be a candidate for a seat on this floor, I feel no personal interest in this question other than should be felt by every Jerseyman and every friend of his country.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

In Senate, April 3, 1840.—The bill making further appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland Road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, then came up as the special order:

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, wished to say a few, and very few words on this bill, and to assign briefly his reasons for the vote against it at this time, which he felt himself compelled to give. He had always believed, and still believed, in the existence of a power in the General Government to provide for the construction of works of internal improvement; but he had never thought it expedient to create a national debt in order to provide the ways and means to construct them. It was only when it could be done without inconvenience to the Treasury, that he had been willing to concur in appropriations to that object. Of late years, considering how much the States have done for themselves, and how much had been contributed by the General Government, in aid of them, under the act distributing the surplus revenue among them, he for one was willing to waive the exercise of the power in respect to canals and roads, especially if a law could be passed to distribute the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands. That would supply a fund, in perpetuity, abundantly sufficient for all desirable objects of internal improvement.

Since President Jackson's veto of the Maysville and Lexington Turnpike road, which in fact was but a section of one arm of the Cumberland road, the operation of the Constitution of the United States, as to the construction of artificial roads, has been suspended in all part of the United States, except in the three States of Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois. We have had, in effect, two Constitutions of the United States, one for those three States, and another for the rest of the Union. For I repeat, what I have before said, that the proposed appropriations to the Cumberland road are wholly indefensible, but upon the ground of the existence of a general power in the Constitution, authorizing words of internal improvement. And I so understand Senators, immediately interested in this bill, to maintain. It has been contended, indeed, that the United States, as a great land proprietor, has a power to open roads, with a view to the sale and enhancement of the value of their land; and so they have. But no one can, I think, allege that, if that were the object, a road so costly as this would be made, or that it has been in fact constructed with that view.

It has appeared to us, on the southwest side of the Ohio river, very hard that, under a common Constitution, our neighbors on the northwest side could have constitutionally appropriated the public money to the object of erecting these roads, whilst it would be unconstitutional to apply it to ours. We have felt the injustice of being taxed to supply the means of constructing the roads of others, without any reciprocal taxation of them to assist in making our roads.

This inequality has made me heretofore, since the veto of the Maysville and Lexington turnpike road, vote with great reluctance for appropriations for the continuance of the Cumberland road. That reluctance was increased by a knowledge of the fact that the very States which were thus exclusively benefited, constantly maintained the Administration which originated and inflicted this inequality. Nay, more; a majority of their delegations has been always opposed to a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, by which other States, as well as themselves, might have acquired the requisite funds to construct their works.

Perhaps, after that veto, I ought not to have voted for any appropriation for the Cumberland road until the general power was restored, or an equivalent obtained. But I have voted for such appropriations, and would have continued, for a time, to do so, if we had possessed the means without going into debt, and if the President and Secretary of the Treasury had recommended the appropriation.

The Secretary of the Treasury presents the annual estimates for the service of the current year. That for the Cumberland road is not amongst them. Both he and the President urge the observance of the strictest economy. The President goes so far as to intimate the use of that veto, which, instead of being a power of occasional and extraordinary use, has been too frequently exercised. The Treasury is literally empty; and we are called upon to borrow money, as the issue of Treasury notes is called, to supply means for the current expenses of the Government.

It is under these circumstances that we are asked to appropriate $225,000 to the Cumberland road; and to force the appropriation upon the Executive against its wishes, and against all the motives to economy which exist, and which have been so earnestly, and I hope sincerely, pressed upon our consideration.

We of the Opposition have been accused unjustly, by the friends of the Administration, with swelling the annual expenditures of the Government, which have certainly reached a most extravagant amount. If we concur in the passage of this appropriation, contrary to what I suppose to be the desire of the Administration, shall we not, so far as it goes, give color to the accusation to which I have referred? If the friends of the Administration wish the bill passed, they have majorities in both Houses sufficient to pass it.

Another consideration operates very strongly with me to dissuade me, at the present time, from concurring in the passage of this bill; and that is the necessity, which I think exists, for a thorough investigation into the causes of the extraordinary expenditure upon this road in those States, and especially in Indiana. I understand that the road has cost thirteen or fourteen thousand dollars per mile. And, after all that has been already expended upon the work, it has been stated that it will require seven or eight millions of dollars to complete it as far as the river Mississippi.

Now, sir, this astonishing expenditures requires a most rigorous examination. To what is it owing? I think it is not explained by the alleged tardiness or want of appropriations, and a consequent necessity of repairs. When the trees on the site of the road are felled and removed, and the road is graded by filling up valleys and cutting down hills, that work must remain unaffected seriously by any use or neglect of the road. The repairs necessary in consequence of the premature use of the road, can only require a trifling expense compared to the original cost of grading it. There must be some other cause of the enormous expenditure upon this road, and before we make further and lavish appropriations to that object, that cause ought to be probed, and certainly and carefully ascertained.

Why, sir, since the veto of the Maysville and Lexington road, we have in Kentucky made upon our own means between four and five hundred miles of McAdamized turnpike road, at an average cost not exceeding, I believe, six thousand dollars per mile. Why should a mile of that description of road cost on the northwest side of the Ohio river more than double what it does on the other side? And that, too, notwithstanding the difference in the character of the labor on the two sides of the river. Assuming the distance between Wheeling and St. Louis to be about six hundred miles, one-half of the sum of eight millions of dollars, now said to be necessary to complete the road, after all the immense expenditures which have been made upon it, ought to be sufficient, according to the rate of cost of such roads in Kentucky, to construct the whole road, if not a stroke of work had been executed upon it.

Under all these circumstances, Mr. President, I cannot, at this time, vote for the appropriations proposed in this bill, whatever I might have been disposed to do in a more auspicious state of public affairs. I think that it will be better to remit the whole subject to the administration of President Harrison. Under that, an investigation can be made into the causes of the vast cost of this road, and a proper correction will, no doubt, be applied. And his identity, throughout almost his whole life, with the interests of the three States more directly interested in the road, will secure for it a just and liberal patronage. Whether that patronage should be extended by a direct grant from the public Treasury, by a division among all the States of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, or by other means, will then be fit subjects of inquiry. And we may rest in perfect confidence that the Administration which, with the aid of the people, and with the blessing of God, will commence on the 4th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1841, will do in respect to this road whatever may be demanded by the interests of the particular States and of the whole Union.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said he rose under feelings of a character that he had not language to express, to say a word in reply to the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY) and the Senator from New Jersey, (Mr. SOUTHARD.) I have heard those Senators to-day, said Mr. S. with deep mortification and regret. I hope I need not point to my short political life, to prove that I have been the friend of those Senators through evil as well as through good report. I have felt for them all the devotion which their brilliant career, and especially that of the Senator from Kentucky, was calculated to produce in the mind of a young and ardent politician of the West. I have been so located, that the Cumberland road has been the all-absorbing question of interest to those whose immediate interest I represent here; and I have looked up to and advocated the high pretensions of the Senator from Kentucky, on more than one occasion, to the highest office in the gift of the American people; and when doing so, I have with pride and satisfaction pointed to him as the champion of this work. He has been true to our interest, so has the Senator from New Jersey, in by-gone days. I did fondly hope, Mr. President, that I could still have enrolled them among our Western friends; but in this I have been doomed to bitter disappointment. Had the sounds which I have heard from these Senators to-day proceeded from another part of the chamber—had the arguments which they have presented to the Senate to-day, in justification of their votes against this bill, been urged by Senators from whom I have been accustomed to hear them, I should have remained silent. But when two of the former friends of this measure, so distinguished as the Senators to whom I am replying, all at once bound from their original position, and come out with set speeches against this road, I feel that I should be recreant to my duty were I to suffer the interests of my State and the wishes of her people to yield to any personal or political considerations whatever. I confess, sir, that never in my life have I been called upon to perform a duty which has given me so much pain as does that which I am about to perform in replying to these distinguished Senators; and while I shall treat them with the courtesy and respect due to their age and standing in the nation, I shall examine, with the freedom and candor which become me, as a Senator of a free and independent State deeply interested in the question before the Senate, the positions which they have assumed, as satisfactory to their minds, for the vote against the bill which they have advertised us they are about to give.

These Senators say that they are unwilling to vote for this appropriation, as it will add so much to the national debt, and they are opposed to a national debt. Let us see how this position tallies with the course they have heretofore pursued on this question. I understand that both those Senators voted for or supported the Cumberland road bill when there was a national debt of over $150,000,000 upon the country, and when it required immense sums annually to pay the interest on that debt. It is true the sinking fund was applied to its gradual extinguishment; still, that fund had to be raised by the ordinary means of raising revenue. And can those Senators now satisfy themselves that they can place their votes on such grounds? It seems to me that this is an afterthought, as the fund is already raised, and the money will be expended at all events. But it is said by those Senators that the Treasury is exhausted. I answered this proposition at large, when replying to the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY;] and I will only repeat, that I am unwilling to accept of this plea to our application. The same cry was raised last year, and the bill fell—no money in the Treasury. And so long as the West can be put off with this plea—so long as they can be tickled with the idea of obtaining an appropriation when there is money in the Treasury that there is no other use for—just so long we shall have the consolation of aiding in filling the Treasury from the purchase of the public lands, and the equal portion we pay in the shape of duties, and in return receiving the answer to our applications, The money has all been expended, and we cannot let you have a dollar. Sir, this is no answer to me. I ask, I demand, in the name of my State and people, to know why it is that we are to be excluded from the operations of these expenditures? What has become of the money? Has it been expended in objects of paramount national importance to those we present to the consideration of Congress? This argument of an empty Treasury I had heard from other Senators; but I confess I was not prepared to hear it from the Senator from Kentucky, or the Senator from New Jersey. Sir, it may do for the enemies of this work, who are the friends to expenditure elsewhere, but it sounds badly in the mouth of a friend to the Cumberland road. The tendency of this doctrine is to exclude that great national work from any participation in the expenditures, and to encourage other objects, to its total exclusion now and forever.

But, sir, how stands the fact on this point? Have we not replenished the Treasury by the issue of Treasury notes to the amount of five millions of dollars, with the power of reissuing those notes so as to keep that amount out for the year? Have we not granted all the supplies called for by the Treasury? Does not the chairman of the Committee on Finance favor this appropriation? Then, sir, in point of fact, the Treasury is not empty, as the Senator supposes. The Senator from Kentucky, however, tells us that he is not in a situation to vote this appropriation, because, by his vote against the bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes, he denied to the Administration the supplies called for in aid of the Treasury. I have no doubt but that the Senator voted conscientiously on that occasion. So did I. He voted one way and I voted the other, though, as I said, I would have preferred raising the money differently; but does not the Senator see the position in which this doctrine places him? He voted against the Treasury Note bill. Still the bill was carried, and has become a law. The notes will be issued; they will be expended. The Senator says it was an Administration measure. Suppose it to be so, then the argument is, because the Administration have filled the Treasury in a manner exceptionable to the Senator, he will abandon the Cumberland road—his own darling child. He will refuse to vote the appropriation to this cherished work, although he knows that the money will be expended on other objects, if it is not on the Cumberland road; he, therefore, prefers every other object of expenditure that may be selected by the Administration, to this great Western work. The Senator from New Jersey has said that none of the objects of appropriation within the estimates can be dispensed with; and, although he set out with the strongest declaration of friendship for the Cumberland road, still he is willing to abandon this work in its dilapidated situation, and appropriate the whole revenue of the nation to every object suggested, to its total exclusion. If those Senators are satisfied with such positions, I confess these reasons have operated on their minds very differently from what they have on mine. We have been told, sir, by both the Senators that the Administration has not asked for this appropriation, or they would have been disposed to have granted it. I confess, sir, this was surpising doctrine to me, coming from that quarter. I did suppose that those Senators were the last men in this body, who would yield a tithe of their own judgment to the request of the Administration. Did those Senators go for the Sub-Treasury bill, when it was the request of the Administration that Congress should pass it? Sir, I had supposed that a recommendation of the Administration would have very little influence in favor of a measure in the minds of those Senators. But they say that they might be chargeable with prodigality by the Administration and its friends, should they vote this appropriation, as it was not contained in the estimates. I have been heretofore unwilling, Mr. President, to believe that either of those Senators could be deterred from doing what he believed to be right for fear of censure from any quarter, much less from the Administration and its friends. I hold that Congress is an independent branch of the Government, and while it shall look to the estimates from the proper department for information, it should act on independent principles. No Executive shall ever control, with my consent, the independent action of this co-ordinate branch of the Government. To be bound, either by the objects or amounts contained in the estimates, would be to circumscribe the free and independent action of Congress, and to make an entire surrender of the powers of the Legislative into the hands of the Executive Department of the Government. For one, sir, I can never consent to that surrender. I stand in this body a representative of an independent State, and I am resolved to discharge my duty here to the very best of my abilities, regardless of the will of the Executive, in a manner that shall give peace to my own conscience.

The Senator from Kentucky has adverted to the great expense of this road. He says it costs over twice as much as the turnpike roads in Kentucky, and asks how is this. I will tell him, at least in part. The country through which the Kentucky roads have been constructed is very different from the route of the Cumberland road. Rock is found on their lines in abundance, the soil is dry, the width and dimensions of their roads much less, the travel is kept off them until they are finished, their appropriations have been timely made in sums sufficient to insure economy in construction—while the Cumberland road passes over a flat, alluvial country, from Columbus to Vandalia, without rock for considerable distances, and cut up the whole time by the immense travel that is thrown upon it in its unfinished state. The appropriations have been made at so late periods in the season that a great portion of the sums have been required to put the road in as good repair as it was the preceding year. But, sir, admitting all the prodigality and waste of which the Senator complains in the expenditure of the fund under the compacts, I put it to those Senators, as lawyers and statesmen, to say whether it lies in their mouths, as the organs of this nation, to say that such prodigality has been committed. The Senators admit that the General Government was a trustee for the benefit of the States west of the Ohio to the full extent of the trust funds reserved by her under the compacts to make this road, and as she was bound to expend it in good faith upon the object intended, it does not lie in the mouth of such a trustee to point to her own waste of the fund as an excuse for not fulfilling the trust. I have answered this argument before at large, but as it was put forth by the Senator from Kentucky in a more imposing aspect, I have felt called upon to notice it.

I trust, sir, that I have examined the positions of those Senators, and, to my own mind at least, have shown the sandy foundation upon which they are based; they are precisely what I have heard from the enemies of the road, and in their mouths would have created neither surprise nor the necessity of a reply; but coming, as they have, from those to whom I have been accustomed to look for friendly aid and support, I have felt it to be due to the occasion to say what I have said. I part from those Senators on this subject with deep regret. I have felt the weight of the opposition to this great Western work, coming from the usual quarter, as quite as much as we could bear. I have seen from the commencement of the session that the battle was to be warm and the struggle desperate to defeat us; but I have met it, I trust, as it became me. I have had my forebodings as to the result, even while the shouts came from the camp of our usual enemy, but I did hope, if the bill was to fall, it would be left to its enemies alone to deal the fatal blows. I did hope to be spared the mortification of seeing it fall by the hands of its former friends, acting in concert with its former enemies. The course taken by those Senators may be satisfactory to their own minds, but they are wholly irreconcileable with continued friendship for this measure. I repeat, I thank them for their former friendship to our interest, and part from them now with deep mortification and regret. Sir, let the vote be taken, and if it is the will of the Senate to defeat the bill, and deny us the appropriation, we must submit to your power, but will never admit your justice, or surrender our claims until justice is done us.

After some remarks by Mr. YOUNG, of Illinois, in favor of the bill, the question was taken on the engrossment by yeas and nays, resulting as follows: yeas 20, nays 22.

So the bill was rejected.

SPEECH OF MR. CLAY,

OF KENTUCKY,

In Senate, January 20, 1840—On the Sub-Treasury bill.

Mr. CLAY rose and said: I have been desirous, Mr. President, before the passage of this bill, not to make a speech, but to say a few words about it. I have come to the Senate to-day unaffectedly indisposed, from a serious cold, and am in no condition to address this body; but I regard this bill as so pregnant with injurious, and dangerous, and direful consequences that I cannot reconcile it to a sense of duty to allow it finally to pass without one last, although unavailing, effort against it. I am aware that the decree for its passage has gone forth—a decree of urgency, too, so urgent that a short postponement of the consideration of the measure, to admit of the filling of vacant seats in the Senate by legislative bodies now in session—seats which have remained vacant, not by the fault of the people, but from the inability of those bodies to agree in the choice of Senators, has been refused by the vote of the Senate—refused, scornfully refused, although, whether the bill be transmitted two or three weeks sooner or later to the House of Representative, owing to its unorganized condition, and its known habits of business, will not expedite its passage a single hour! Refused by the concurrence of Senators who, not representing on this subject the present sentiments and opinions of their respective States, seem unwilling to allow the arrival of those who would fully and fairly represent them!

It is remarkable sir, that, judging from the vote on the engrossment of the bill for a third reading, it is to hurried through the Senate by less than a majority of the body. And if the two Senators from Tennessee had clung to their seats with the same tenacity with which other Senators adhere to theirs, who have been instructed to vote against the bill, and are violating their instructions; and if the Senate were full, the vacant seats being filled, as we have every reason to believe they will be filled, there would be a clear majority against the passage of the bill. Thus is this momentous measure, which both its friends and foes unite in thinking will exert a tremendous, if not revolutionary, influence upon the business and concerns of the country—a measure which has so long and so greatly distracted and divided our councils, and against which the people have so often and so signally pronounced their judgment, to be forced through the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, it is no less the duty of the statesman than the physician to ascertain the exact state of the body to which he is to minister before he ventures to prescribe any healing remedy. It is with no pleasure, but with profound regret, that I survey the present condition of our country. I have rarely, I think never, known a period of such universal and intense distress. The General Government is in debt, and its existing revenue is inadequate to meet its ordinary expenditure. The States are in debt, some of them largely in debt, insomuch that they have been compelled to resort to the ruinous expedient of contracting new loans to meet the interest upon prior loans; and the people are surrounded with difficulties; greatly embarrassed, and involved in debt. Whilst this is, unfortunately, the general state of the country, the means of extinguishing this vast mass of debt are in constant diminution. Property is falling in value—all the great staples of the country are declining in price, and destined, I fear, to further decline. The certain tendency of this very measure is to reduce prices. The banks are rapidly decreasing the amount of their circulation. About one-half of them, extending from New Jersey to the extreme Southwest, have suspended specie payments, presenting an image of a paralytic, one moiety of whose body is stricken with palsy. The banks are without a head; and, instead of union, concert, and co-operation between them, we behold jealously, distrust, and enmity. We have no currency whatever possessing uniform value throughout the whole country. That which we have, consisting almost entirely of the issues of banks, is in a state of the utmost disorder, insomuch that it varies, in comparison with the specie standard, from par to fifty per cent. discount. Exchanges, too, are in the greatest possible confusion, not merely between distant parts of the Union, but between cities and places in the same neighborhood. That between our great commercial marts of New York and Philadephia, within five or six hours of each other, vacillating between seven and ten per cent. The products of our agricultural industry are unable to find their way to market from the want of means in the hands of traders to purchase them, or from the want of confidence in the stability of things. Many of our manufactories stopped or stopping, especially in the important branch of woollens; and a vast accumulation of their fabrics on hand, owing to the destruction of confidence and the wretched state of exchange between different sections of the Union.

Such is the unexaggerated picture of our present condition. And amidst the dark and dense cloud that surrounds us, I perceive not one gleam of light. It gives me nothing but pain to sketch the picture. But duty and truth require that existing diseases should be fearlessly examined and probed to the bottom. We shall otherwise be utterly incapable of conceiving or applying appropriate remedies. If the present unhappy state of our country had been brought upon the people by their folly and extravagance, it ought to be borne with fortitude, and without complaint, and without reproach. But it is my deliberate judgment that it has not been—that the people are not to blame—and that the principal causes of existing embarrassments are not to be traced to them. Sir, it is not my purpose to waste the time or excite the feelings of members of the Senate by dwelling long on what I suppose to be those causes. My object is a better, a higher, and I hope a more acceptable one—to consider the remedies proposed for the present exigency. Still, I should not fulfil my whole duty if I did not briefly say that, in my conscience, I believe our pecuniary distresses have mainly sprung from the refusal to recharter the late Bank of the United States; the removal of the public deposites from that institution; the multiplication of State banks in consequence; and the Treasury stimulus given to them to extend their operations; the bungling manner in which the law, depositing the surplus treasure with the States, was executed; the Treasury Circular; and although last, perhaps not least, the exercise of the power of the veto on the bill for distributing, among the States, the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands.

What, Mr. President, is needed, at the present crisis, to restore the prosperity of the people? A sound local currency; mixed with a currency possessing uniform value throughout the whole country; a re-establishment of regular exchanges between different parts of the Union; and a revival of general confidence. The people want, in short, good Government at Washington; the abandonment of rash and ruinous experiments; the practice here of economy, and the pursuit of the safe lights of experience. Gives us these; and the growth of our population, the enterprise of our people, and the abundance, variety, and richness of the products of our soil and of our industy, with the blessings of Providence, will carry us triumphantly through all our complicated embarrassments. Deny these—persevere in a mal-administration of Government—and it is in vain that the bounties of Heaven are profusely scattered around us.

There is one man—and I lament to say, from the current of events and the progress of Executive and party power—but one man, at present in the country, who can bring relief to it, and bind up the bleeding wounds of the people. He, of all men in the nation, ought to feel as a parent should feel, most sensibly, the distresses and sufferings of his family. But, looking to his public course and his official acts, I am constrained to say that he surveys unconcerned the wide-spread ruin and bankruptcy and wretchedness before him, without emotion and without sympathy. Whilst all the elements of destruction are at work, and the storm is raging, the Chief Magistrate, standing in the midst of his unprotected fellow-citizens, on the distinguished position of honor and confidence to which their suffrages have devoted him, deliberately wraps around himself the folds of his India-rubber cloak, and, lifting his umbrella over his head, tells them, drenched and shivering as they are under the beating rain and hail and snow falling upon them, that he means to take care of himself and the official corps, and that they are in the habit of expecting too much from Government, and must look out for their own shelter, and security, and salvation!

And now allow me to examine, and carefully and candidly consider, the remedy which this bill offers to a suffering people for the unparalleled distresses under which they are writhing. I will first analyze and investigate it as its friends and advocates represent it. What is it? What is this measure, which has so long and so deeply agitated this country, under the various denominations of Sub-Treasury, Independent Treasury, and Divorce of the State from Banks? What is it? Let us define it truly and clearly. Its whole principle consists in an exaction from the people of specie; in the payment of all their duties and dues to Government, and the disbursement of specie by the Government, in the payment of all salaries and of all the creditors of the Government. This is its simple and entire principle. Divest the bill under consideration of all its drapery and paraphernalia, this is its naked, unvarnished, and unexaggerated principle, according to its own friends. This exclusive use of specie, in all receipts and payments of the Government, it is true, it is not to be instantaneously enforced; but that it is the direct and avowed aim and object of the measure, to be accomplised, gradually but in the short space of a little more than three years. The twenty-eight sections of the bill, with all its safes, and vaults, and bars, and bolts, and receivers general, and examiners, have nothing more nor less in view than the exaction of specie from the people, and the subsequent distribution of that specie among the officers of the Government and the creditors of the Government. It does not touch, nor profess to touch, the actual currency of the country. It leaves the local banks, where it found them, unreformed, uncontrolled, unchecked in all their operations. It is a narrow, selfish, heartless measure. It turns away from the people, and abandons them to their hard and inexorable fate; leaving them exposed to all the pernicious consequences of an unsound currency, utterly irregular and disordered exchanges, and the greatest derangement in all business. It is worse; it aggravates and perpetuates the very evils which the Government will not redress: for, by going into the market and creating a new additional demand for specie, it cripples and disables the State Banks, and renders them incapable of furnishing that relief to the people which a parental Government is bound to exert all its energies and powers to afford. The divorce of the State from banks, of which its friends boast, is, not the only separation which it makes—it is a separation of the Government from the constituency—a disunion of the interests of the servants of the people from the interest of the people.

This bill, then, is wholly incommensurate with the evils under which the country is suffering. It leaves them not only altogether unprovided for, but aggravates them. It carries no word of cheering hope or encouragement to a depressed people. It leaves their languishing business in the same state of hopeless discouragement.

But its supporters argue that such a system of convertible paper as this country has so long had, is radically wrong; that all our evils are to be traced to the banks; and that the sooner they are put down, and a currency exclusively metallic is established, the better. They further argue that such a metallic currency will reduce inflated prices, lower the wages of labor, enable us to manufacture cheaper, and thereby admit our manufactories to maintain a successful competition with foreigners. And all these results, at some future time or other, are to be brought about by the operation of this measure.

Mr. President, in my opinion, a currency purely metallic is neither desirable, in the present state of the commercial world, nor, if it were, it is practicable, or possible to be attained in this country. And, if it were possible it could not be brought about without the most frightful and disastrous consequences, creating convulsion, if not revolution.

Of all conditions of society, that is most prosperous in which there is a gradual and regular increase of the circulating medium, and a gradual but not too rapid increase in the value of property and the price of commodities. In such a state of things, business of all kinds is active and animated, every department of it flourishes, and labor is liberally rewarded. No sacrifices are made of property, and debtors find, without difficulty, the means of discharging promptly their debts. Men hold on to what they have, without the apprehension of loss, and we behold no glutted markets. Of all conditions of society, that is most adverse in which there is a constant and rapid diminution of the amount of the circulating medium. Debtors become unable to pay their debts, property falls, the market is glutted, business declines, and labor is thrown out of employment. In such a state of things, the imagination goes ahead of the reality. Sellers become numerous, from the apprehension that their property, now falling, will fall still lower; and purchasers scarce, from an unwillingness to make investments with the hazard of almost certain loss.

Have gentleman reflected upon the consequences of their system of depletion? I have already stated that the country is borne down by a weight of debt. If the currency be greatly diminished, as beyond all example it has been, how is this debt to be extinguished? Property, the resource on which the debtor relied for his payment, will decline in value; and it may happen that a man, who honestly contracted debt, on the faith of property which had a value, at the time, fully adequate to warrant the debt, will find himself stript of all his property and his debt remain unextinguished. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) has put the case of two nations, in one of which the amount of its currency shall be double what it is in the other, and, as he contends, the prices of all property will be double in the former nation of what they are in the latter. If this be true of two nations, it must be equally true of one, whose circulating medium is at one period double what it is at another. Now, as the friends of the bill argue, we have been and yet are in this inflated state, our currency has been double, or in something like that proposition, of what was necessary, and we must come down to the lowest standard. Do they not perceive that inevitable ruin to thousands must be the necessary consequence? A man, for example, owning property to the value of $5,000, contracts a debt for $5,000. By the reduction of one-half of the currency of the country, his property, in effect, becomes reduced to the value of $2,500. But his debt undergoes no corresponding reduction. He give up all his prorerty, and remains still in debt $2,500. Thus this measure will operate on the debtor class of the nation, always the weaker class, and that which, for that reason, most needs the protection of Government.

But, if the effect of this hard money policy upon the debtor class be injurious, it is still more disastrous, if possible, on the laboring classes. Enterprise will be checked or stopped, employment will become difficult, and the poorer classes will be subject to the greatest privations and distresses. Heretofore it has been one of the pretensions and boasts of the dominant party, that they sought to elevate the poor by depriving the rich of undue advantages. Now their policy is to reduce the wages of labor, and this is openly avowed; and it is argued by them that it is necessary to reduce the wages of American labor to the low standard of European labor, in order to enable the American manufacturer to enter into a successful competition with the European manufacturer in the sale of their respective fabrics. Thus is this dominant party perpetually changing; one day cajoling the poor, and fulminating against the rich; and the next cajoling the rich, and fulminating against the poor. It was but yesterday that we heard that all who were trading on borrowed capital ought to break. It was but yesterday we heard denounced the long-established policy of the country, by which, it was alleged, the poor were made poroer, and the rich were made richer.

Mr. President, of all the subjects of national policy, not one ought to be touched with so much delicacy as that of the wages; in other words, the bread of the poor man. In dwelling, as I have often done, with inexpressible satisfaction upon the many advantages of our country, there is not one which has given me more delight than the high price of annual labor. There is not one which indicates more clearly the prosperity of the mass of the community. In the features of human society, there are none, I think, which more decisively display the general welfare than a permanent high rate of wages, and a permanent high rate of interest. Of course, I do not mean those excessive high rates of temporary existence, which result from sudden and unexpected demands for labor or capital, and which may, and generally do, evince some unnatural and extraordinary state of things; but I mean a settled, steady, and durable high rate of wages of labor, and interest upon money. Such a state demonstrates activity and profits in all the departments of business. It proves that the employer can afford to give high wages to the laborer, in consequence of the profits of his business, and the borrower high interest to the lender, in consequence of the gains which he makes by the use of capital. On the contrary, in countries where business is dull and languishing, and all the walks of society are full, the small profits that are made will not justify high interest or high wages.

Wages of labor will be low where there is no business, and of course but little or no demand for labor; or where, from the density of population, the competition for employment is great, and the demand for labor is not equal to the supply. Similar causes will tend to the reduction of the rate of interest. Our vast unpeopled regions in the West protect us against the evils of a too crowded population. In our country, such is the variety of profitable business and pursuits that there is scarcely any in which one can engage with diligence, integrity, and ordinary skill, in regular and ordinary times, that he is not sure of being amply rewarded. Surveying our happy condition in this respect, it was, during the last war, remarked by the present Lord Jeffries, that America was the heaven of the poor man and the hell of the rich. There was extravagance in the assertion, mixed with some truth. It would have been more accurate to have said that, with good government, it was an earthly heaven both of the rich and poor.

It is contended, however, that the reduction of wages would be only nominal; that an exclusive specie currency being established, the prices of all commodities would fall; and that the laborer would be able to command as many of the necessaries of life with his low wages, as he can at present.

The great error of Senators on the other side is, that they do not sufficiently regard the existing structure of society, the habits and usages which prevail; in short, the actual state of things. All wise legislation should be founded upon the condition of society as it is; and even where reform is necessary, it should be introduced slowly, cautiously, and with a careful and vigilant attention to all consequences. But gentlemen seem disposed to consider themselves at liberty to legislate for a new people, just sprung into existence, and commencing its career—one for which they may, without reference to what they see all around them, speculate and theorize at pleasure. Now, if we were such a people, and were deliberating on the question of what was the best medium of circulation to represent the property and transact the business of the country, it is far from being certain that it would be deemed wisest to adopt an exclusive specie standard. But when we glance at society as it actually exists, with all its relations and ramifications, its engagements, debts, wants, habits, customs, nothing can be more unwise, it seems to me, than to attempt so radical a change as that which is contemplated.

I cannot admit that the laborer, with his low wages, would be in as eligible a situation as he now is. The argument excludes all consideration of his condition during the transition from the paper to the specie medium. In the descending process from an abundant to a scarce circulation, there would be for him nothing but distress and wretchedness; and he would be in the greatest danger of starvation before the El Dorado of gentlemen was reached. The adjustment of prices to the state of the currency is not so sudden a work as is imagined. Long after the specie standard should be established, the old prices of many articles would remain; and all foreign productions which enter into the consumption of the poor man would continue unaffected by our domestic currency. If it be true that there would be no alteration in the condition of the laborer, if he would really get as much, in value, in the new state of things as the old, how is that of the capitalist, engaged in manufactures, to be improved? Would not his situation also remain unaltered?

The assumption that an exclusive hard money circulation is best for the laborer, best for the manufacturer, best for the country, is against all the experience of the world. Beyond all doubt, England is the most prosperous of all the nations of the old world, and England is the greatest paper money country that exists. Her manufactures find a market in every portion of the globe; her operatives and laborers are paid better and fed better than any in Europe. Have the manufacturers of the hard money countries of the continent prevailed over those of England, and driven them out of the market, in fair competition? Far from it. Their policy is to exclude, by prohibitions and heavy duties, the entry of British goods into their ports. England has sought to make treaties with them all, and especially with France, upon the basis of free trade; and France has replied that her manufacturers are too much behind those of England to admit of their being placed upon a footing of equality. Paper money-inflated England manufactures about two-thirds of all the cotton exported from the United States; and her cotton manufacture alone is probably greater than that of all the rest of Europe.

But, Mr. President, if the banishment from circulation of all bank paper, and the exclusive use of specie in this country, were desirable, is it practicable, can it be possibly brought about? I have said that the legislator is bound to have due regard to the wants, wishes, necessities, and condition of the country for which he acts. But a practical American statesman has a further duty to perform—that of attentively considering the distribution of the power of Government in this Confederacy. Here we have local Governments for the respective States, and a General Government for the whole. The General Government has but few, limited, and well defined powers, the States severally possessing all power not denied to them or delegated by the Federal Constitution. Whatever difference of opinion might exist, if it were a new question, it cannot now be controverted that each of the twenty-six State Governments has the power to bring into existence as many banks as it pleases. Banks have accordingly been created, and will continue, and must exist, in spite of the General Government. The paper of banks will therefore remain, as it has been, a part of the general circulation, in defiance of any policy which this Government may proclaim. And if one or more of the States were to adopt the hard money policy, there would be others which would find, in the very forbearance of certain members of the Confederacy to establish or continue banks, a fresh motive to create and sustain them; for the issues of their banks would run into the States which had them not, and they would thus appropriate to themselves at the expense of others, all the benefits of banking. I recollect well how banks were originally first introduced into many of the Southern and Western States. They found themselves exposed to all the inconveniences, without enjoying the benefits of the banking system; and they were reduced to the necessity of establishing banks to share the advantages as well as the disadvantages of the system.

Banks, bank notes, a convertible paper money, are, therefore, inevitable. There is no escape from them. You may deliver as many homilies as you please, send forth from this Capitol as many essays and disquisitions as you think proper, circulate President's messages denouncing them as widely as you choose, and thunder forth from a party press as loud and as long as you can, against banks, and they will continue to exist in spite of you. What, then, is it the duty of a wise practical Federal statesman to do? Since he finds a state of things which is unalterable, to which he must submit, however convinced he may be of the utility of a change, his duty is to accommodate his measures to this immutable state of public affairs. And, if he cannot trust the eight or nine hundred local banks which are disbursed through the country, create a Federal Bank, amenable to the General Government, subject to its inspection and authority, and capable of supplying a general currency worthy of its confidence; make, in short, the Government of the whole partake of the genius and conform to the fixed character of the parts.

Mr. President, I never have believed that the local banks were competent to supply such a general currency, of uniform value, as this people wants, or to perform those financial offices which are necessary to a successful administration of this Government. I pronounced them incompetent at the period of the removal of the deposites; and we foretold the unfortunate state of things that now exists. But the party in power, which now denounces them, proclaimed their entire ability not only to supply as good but a better currency than that which was furnished by the Bank of the United States, and to perform all the financial duties which that institution fulfilled. After that party had succeeded in putting down the Bank of the United States, and got their system into full operation, it continued, year after year, to announce to the public that all its expectations had been fully realized.

A Bank of the United States established by this Government would not only furnish it a currency in which it might safely confide, in all receipts and payments, and execute every financial office, but it would serve as a sentinel, a cement, and a regulator to the State banks. The Senator from Pennsylvania has urged that the present Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania has a charter more extensive than that of the late Bank of the United States; that it is in fact the old Bank with a new charter; and that, with all its vast resources and means, it has been not only unable to act as a regulator of the local banks, but was recently the first to set the pernicious example of a suspension of specie payments.

Mr. President, can the distinguished Senator be serious in his description of these attributes of the Pennsylvania Bank? Surely he must have intended that part of his speech for some other theatre. In the first place, Pennsylvania, besides sundry other onerous conditions of loans and subscriptions to objects of internal improvements, levied upon the present Bank, in the form of bonus, some four or five millions of dollars. Then, the General Government has withdrawn from it the seven millions of stock which it held in the old bank—a circumstance which I have no doubt has tended to cripple its operations. And it is wholly without the deposites of the Government, which the former Bank possessed. Instead of being an ally, the General Government has been in the relation of an enemy to it. And it has had to encounter all the enmity of a powerful party within the bosom of the Commonwealth. So far from assuming the office of a regulator of the local banks, its late distinguished president, upon whose authority the Senator relies for proof of the extent and liberality of its new charter, expressly declared that it had ceased to be a general agent, and had retired within the circle of its State duties. So far from having derived any strength from its connection with the late Bank of the United States, there cannot be a doubt that that connection rendered it far less efficient than it would have been, if it had gone into operation with an unencumbered capital, freshly subscribed, of thirty-five millions of dollars.

To guard against all misconception or misrepresentation, I repeat, what I said on a former occasion, that, although I am convinced, thoroughly convinced, that this country cannot get along well without a Bank of the United States, I have no thought of proposing such a bank, and have no wish to see it proposed by any other, until it is demanded by a clear and undisputed majority of the people of the United States.

Seeing that a bank of the United States could not be established, two years ago I expressed my willingness to make an experiment with the State banks, rather than resort to this perilous measure. And now, such are my deep convictions of the fatal tendency of this project of a Sub-Treasury, that I would greatly prefer the employment of the agency of State banks. But whilst I should entertain hopes of their success, I confess that I should not be without strong apprehensions of their failure. My belief is, that the State banks will be constantly exposed to disorder and derangement without the co-operation of a Bank of the United States; and that our banking system will only be safe and complete when we shall have both a Bank of the United States and State banks.

We are told by the President of the United States, in his Message at the opening of the session, that a great moneyed power exists in London that exerts a powerful influence on this country; that it is the result of the credit system; and that every bank established in a remote village in this country becomes bound to that power by a cord, which it touches at its pleasure.

There is, sir, some truth in this representation, and every genuine American must feel it with shame and regret. It is a melancholy fact that the arrival of steam vessels in the port of New York from England is looked for with more curiosity and interest, on account of the financial intelligence which they bear from London and the Bank of England, than the arrival of the mail from Congress. Our people have been taught, by sad experience, to expect nothing good from the councils of their own country, and turn their attention towards the operations in a foreign country. Was this eager inquiry into the transactions of the Bank of England made during the existence of the Bank of the United States? No, sir; no, sir. You denounced this bank as a monster, and destroyed it; and you have thrown us into the jaws of a foreign monster which we can neither cage nor control. You tore from us our best shield against the Bank of England, and now profess to be surprised at the influence which it exercises upon our interests! We do not find that the continental nations of Europe that have National Banks, complain of the influence of the Bank of England upon them. On the contrary, the Bank of England has recently been compelled to apply to the Bank of France for a large sum of specie to sustain its credit and character.

But, sir, we must look to a higher and much more potent cause than the operations of any bank, foreign or domestic, for the lively interest which is felt in this country in the monetary transactions of England. In England the credit system, as it is called, exists in a much more extensive degree than in this country; and if it were of the nature of that system, as is alleged, to render one country dependent upon another, why should not England be more dependent upon us than we upon England? The real cause of our dependence arises out of the unfavorable balance of our foreign trade. We import too much and export too little. We buy too much abroad, and make too little at home. If we would shake off this degrading foreign dependence, we must produce more or buy less. Increase our productions in all the variety of forms in which our industry can be employed; augment the products of the soil, extend our manufactures, give new stimulus to our tonnage and fishing interests, sell more than we buy, get out of debt and keep out of debt to the foreigner, and he will no longer exert an influence upon our destiny.

And this unfavorable balance of our foreign trade is wholly independent of, and unconnected with, the nature of the character of the currency of the country, whether it be exclusively metallic, or mixed of paper and the precious metals. England, in a great measure, by means of that credit or paper system, now so much denounced, has become the centre of the commerce, the exchanges, and the moneyed operations of the world. By the extent, variety, and perfection of her manufactures, she lays most nations that admit them freely under contribution to her; and if we had no currency but specie, we should be just as much exposed to the moneyed power of London, or, which is the true state of the case, to the effects of an unfavorable balance of trade, as we now are. We should probably be more so, because a large portion of the specie of the country being in the vaults of a few depositories, it would be easier then to obtain it for exportation in the operations of commerce, than now, when it is dispersed among nine hundred or a thousand banks.

What was our condition during the colonial state, when, with the exception of small amounts of Government paper money, we had no currency but specie, and no banks? Were we not constantly and largely in debt to England? Was not our specie perpetually drained, to obtain supplies of British goods? Do not you recollect that the subject of the British debts formed one of those matters which were embraced in the negotiations and treaty of peace which terminated the Revolutionary war? and that it was a topic of angry and protracted discussion long after, until it was finally arranged by Mr. Jay's treaty of 1794?

Look into the works of Dr. Franklin, in which there is more practical good sense to be found than is to be met with in the same compass any where. He was the agent of Pennsylvania from about the middle of the last century until the breaking out of the Revolutionary war, and a part of the time the agent, also, of the Colonies of Georgia and Massachusetts. His correspondence shows that the specie of the Colonies was constantly flowing from them for the purchase of British goods, insomuch that the Colonies were left absolutely destitute of a local currency; and one of the main objects of his agency was to obtain the sanction of the parent country to those issues of paper money which the necessities of Pennsylvania compelled her to make. The issue was strenuously opposed by the merchants engaged in the American trade, on account of the difficulty which it created in making collections and remittances home. So great was that drain of specie, that we know that Virginia and other Colonies were constrained to adopt tobacco as a substitute for money.

The principal cause, therefore, of the influence of the moneyed power of London over this country is to be found in the vast extent of our dealings with her. The true remedy is to increase our manufactures and purchase less of hers, and to augment our exports by all the means in our power, and to diminish our imports as much as possible. We must increase our productions, or economise much more than we have done. New Jersey, before the Revolution, being much pressed for £100,000 sterling, Dr. Franklin proposed a plan by which she could, in one year, make up that sum. The plan was this: She was in the habit of importing annually from England merchandise to the amount of £200,000. He recommended that the ladies should buy only half the amount of silks, calicoes, teas, &c. during the year, which they had been in the habit of consuming; and in this way, by saving, the colony would make the required sum of £100,000. If we would, for a few years, import only half the amount from England that we have been in the habit of doing, we should no longer feel the influence of the London money power.

Mr. President, gentlemen, in my humble opinion, utterly deceive themselves in supposing that this measure is demanded by a majority of the people of the United States, and in alleging that this is proven by the result of elections of the past year. That there were a vast majority of them opposed to it, was demonstrated incontestably by previous elections. The elections of the last year did not in many, perhaps most instances, turn at all upon the merits of this measure. In several States, the people were deceived by assurances that the Sub-Treasury was at an end, and would be no longer agitated. In others, the people had reason to be dissatisfied with the conduct of their banks; and they were artfully led to believe that this bill would supply a corrective of the errors of the banking system. And where they have apparently yielded their assent to the bill, it has been that sort of assent which the patient yields, whose constitution has been exhausted and destroyed by the experiments of empiricism, and who finally consents to take the last quack medicine offered to him, in the hope of saving his life. I know the people of the United States well. They are ever ready cheerfully to submit to any burden demanded by the interest, the honor, or the glory of their country. But what people ever consented to increase their own burdens unnecessarily? The effect of this measure is, by exacting specie exclusively from the people, and paying it out to the official corps and the public creditor, to augment the burdens of the people, and to swell the emoluments of office. It is an insult to the understanding and judgment of the enlightened people of the United States to assert that they can approve such a measure.

[No true patriot can contemplate] the course of the party in power without the most painful and mortified feelings. They began some years ago their war on the Bank of the United States. It was dangerous to liberty; it has failed to fulfil the purposes of its institution; it did not furnish a sound currency, although the sun, in all its course, never shone upon a better; it was, in short, a monster, which was condemned to death, and it was executed accordingly. During the progress of that war, the State banks were the constant theme of praise, in speech and song, of the dominant party. They were the best institutions in the world, free from all danger to public liberty, capable of carrying on the exchanges of the country, and of performing the financial duties to Government, and of supplying a far better currency for the people than the Bank of the United States. We told you that the State banks would not do, without the co-operation of a Bank of the United States. We told you that you find them a weak league—a mere fleet of open boats tied together by a hickory withe, and which the first storm would disperse and upset. But you scorned all our warnings, and continued year after year to puff and praise the operations of these banks. You had the boldness, in the face of this abused nation, to aver that the country had been supplied by them with a better currency and better exchanges than it had been by the Bank of the United States! Well, by your own measures, by your Treasury Circular, distribution of the surplus,

&c. you accelerated the catastrophe of the suspension of the banks. You began with promises to the people of better currency, better times, more security to civil liberty; and you end with no currency at all, the worst possible times, an increase of Executive power, and a consequent increase of danger to civil liberty. You began with promises to fill the pockets of the people, and you end with emptying theirs and filling your own.

I now proceed, sir, to the object which constituted the main purpose of my rising at this time. I have hitherto considered the bill, as its friends in the Senate represent it, as a measure simply for exacting specie, keeping it in the custody of officers of the Government, and disbursing it in a course of administration. I mean now to show that, whatever its friends here may profess or believe, the bill lays the foundations deep and broad of a Government bank —a Treasury bank, under the sole management of the President. Let us first define a bank. It may have three faculties, separately or combined. The faculty of issues, entering into and forming a part of the circulating medium of the country; that of receiving deposites; and that of making discounts. Any one of these three faculties makes it a bank; and by far the most important of the three is that of the power of issues. That this bill creates a bank of issues, I most sincerely believe, and shall now attempt to prove, and the proof will be first extraneous, and secondly intrinsic.

As to the extraneous proof, I rely upon the repeated declarations of the late President of the United States in his annual messages. On more than one occasion he stated the practicability of establishing a bank on the revenue of the Government, and to be under the superintendence of the Secretary of the Treasury. And when he vetoed the charter of the late Bank of the United States, he expressly declared that, if Congress had applied to him, he could have furnished the scheme of a bank free from all constitutional objections; doubtless meaning a Treasury bank. The present Chief Magistrate and the present Secretary of the Treasury have, also, repeatedly, in language, in their messages and reports, characteristically ambiguous, it is true, but sufficiently intelligible, intimated the facilities which the commerce and business of the country would derive from the drafts issued by the Treasurer in virtue of this bill. The party, its press, and its leaders, have constantly put this Sub-Treasury scheme in competition with a Bank of the United States, and contended that the issue was Sub-Treasury or Bank of the United States. But how can they be compared or come in competition with each other, if the most important function of a bank of the United States, that of supplying a medium of general circulation and uniform value, is not to be performed under this bill?

I pass to the more important, and, I think, conclusive proof, supplied by the provisions themselves of the bill. After providing that all money paid to Government for duties, public lands, and other dues, shall be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, the receivers general and the mints, the tenth section enacts:

"That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer the moneys in the hands of any depositary hereby constituted, to the Treasury of the United States; to the Mint at Philadelphia; to the Branch Mint at New Orleans; or to the offices of either of the receivers general of public moneys, by this act directed to be appointed, to be there safely kept, according to the provisions of this act; and also to transfer moneys in the hands of any one depositary constituted by this act, to any other depositary constituted by the same, at his discretion, and as the safety of the public moneys and the convenience of the public service shall seem to him to require; which authority to transfer the moneys belonging to the Post Office Department is also hereby conferred upon the Postmaster General, so far as its exercise by him may be consistent with the provisions of existing laws; and every depositary constituted by this act shall keep his account of the money paid to or deposited with him, belonging to the Post Office Department, separate and distinct from the account kept by him of other public moneys so paid or deposited. And for the purpose of payments on the public account, it shall be lawful for the Treasurer of the United States to draw upon any of the said depositaries, as he may think most conducive to the public interests, or to the convenience of the public creditors, or both."

Thus is the Secretary invested with unlimited authority to transfer the public money from one depositary to another, and to concentrate it all, if he pleases, at a single point. But, without this provision, the city of New York necessarily must be the place at which the largest portion of the public money will be constantly in deposite. It collects alone about two-thirds of duties on imports, and is becoming, if it be not already, the money centre of the United States. It is not indispensable, to create a bank of issues, that the place of issue and the place of payment should be identical. The issue of the paper may be at one city, and the place of payment may be at a different and even distant city. Nor is the form of the paper material, so as to carry it into the general circulation of the money of the country. Whether it be in the shape of bank notes, bank checks, post notes, or Treasury drafts, is of no consequence. If there be confidence in it, and the paper be of convenient amount, passes by delivery, and entitles the holder to demand the specie upon its face, at his pleasure, it will enter into the general circulation; and the extent of its circulation will be governed by the amount issued, and the confidence which it enjoys.

I presume that no one will contest these principles. Let us apply them to the provisions of this bill. The last clause of the tenth section, already cited, declares:

"And for the purpose of payments on the public account, it shall be lawful for the Treasurer of the United States to draw upon any of the said depositaries as he may think most conducive to the public interests, or to the convenience of the public creditors, or both."

Here is no restriction whatever as to the amount or form of the draft. There is nothing to prevent his making it for $100, or $50, or $10. There is nothing to prevent the use of bank paper; and the draft will have the number of signatures usual to bank paper. It will or may be signed by the Treasurer, Register, and Comptroller.

Now sir, let me suppose that a citizen has a demand upon the Government for $5,000, and applies to the Treasurer for payment. On what receiver-general will you, he will be asked, have the amount? On the receiver-general at New York. In what sum? One-half of the sum in drafts of $100, and the other in drafts of $50. The Treasurer cannot lawfully decline furnishing the required drafts. He is bound by the law to consult the convenience of the public creditor. The drafts are given to him. What will he do with them? There is not a spot in the whole circumference of the United States, in which these drafts will not command a premium or be at par. Every where to the south and west of New York they will command a premium of from one-fourth to two and a half per cent. Every where, east and north, they will be at par. What, I again ask, will the holder do with them? Will he commit the indiscretion or folly of cashing these drafts, and expose himself to the hazard and inconvenience of losing or carrying the specie about him? No such thing. Being every where better than, or equal to, specie, he will retain the drafts and carry them with him to his home, and use them in his business. What I have supposed likely to be done by one, will be done by every creditor of the Government. These drafts, to a considerable extent, will remain out, enter the general circulation, and compose a part of the common currency of the country, commanding at particular places, as notes of the Bank of the United States have done, and now do, a premium, but any where being certainly good for the amount on their face. All this is perfectly plain and inevitable. And the amount of this element of Government drafts, in the general currency of the country, will be somewhat governed by the amount of the annual disbursements of the Government. In the early administration of this Treasury bank, its paper will command general and implicit confidence. It will be as much better than the paper of the Bank of the United States or the Bank of England, as the resources of the United States are superior to those of any mere private corporation. Sub-treasurers and receivers-general may fly with the public money committed to their charge—may peculate or speculate as they please, and unlike the condition of banks, whose fraudulent officers squander the means of those institutions, the nation remains bound for the redemption of all paper issued under its authority. But the paper of the late Bank of the United States acquired a confidence every where, more or less, in and out of the United States. It was received in Canada, in Europe, and at Canton. The Government drafts upon receivers-general will have a much more sure and extensive circulation. Who will doubt their payment? Who will question the honor and good faith of the United States in their redemption? The bankers of Europe—the Rothschilds and the Barings—will receive them without hesitation, and prefer them to the specie which they represent, whenever the rate of exchange is not decidedly against this country, because they can be more safely and conveniently kept than specie itself. And, with respect to our State banks, these Treasury drafts will form the basis of their operations. They will be preferred to specie, because they will be more convenient and free from the hazards incident to the possession of specie. The banks will require no more specie than the wants of the community for change make necessary.

Thus, sir, will these Government drafts, or bank notes, as they may be called, remain out in circulation. The issues of the first year, under appropriations of the public revenue, will be followed by the issues of succeeding years. More and more will it be perceived to be needless and indiscreet to cash them; and more and more will the specie of the country accumulate in the custody of the receivers-general, until, after a few years, the greater part of the specie of the country will be found in the vaults of the depositaries, represented by an equal amount of Government paper in circulation. I can conceive of no case or motive but one for withdrawing the specie from the vaults of the depositaries, and that is, when, from an unfavorable state of our foreign trade, the course of foreign exchange is much against us; and then this system will furnish great facilities to the export of the precious metals.

In process of time, it will be seen, as was observed with respect to the Bank of Amsterdam, that there is a much larger amount of specie in deposite with the receivers-general than is likely to be called for by the paper representing it in circulation, in the common transactions of the business and commerce of the country. And what has been done before will be done again. Government, in a time of necessity, will be tempted to increase its paper issues upon the credit of this dormant specie capital. It will be tempted again and again to resort to this expedient, since it is easier to make emissions of paper than to lay the burden of taxation on the people. The history of American paper money, during the Revolution, of French assignats and of Government banks, throughout the world, tells the whole tale, and gives you the denouement.

But we shall be informed, as has been insisted, that this bill cautiously guards against the degeneracy of the system into a Government bank, by the provision contained in the 23d section, enjoining the Secretary of the Treasury "to issue and publish regulations to enforce the speedy presentation of all Government drafts for payment at the places where payable; and to prescribe the time, according to the different distances of the depositaries from the seat of Government, within which all drafts upon them respectively shall be presented for payment, and in default of such presentation, to direct any other mode and place of payment which he may deem proper."

Then it is to depend upon the Secretary of the Treasury whether we are to have a Government bank or not! We are delivered over to the tender mercies of his legislation in the form of the regulations which he may choose to issue and publish! And the extraordinary power is vested in him, if any dare violate his regulations, of denouncing the severe penalty of receiving payment "in any other mode and place which he may deem proper." Now, sir, between a draft on the receiver general at St. Louis and at New York, there will be a difference at all times of at least two per cent. and at some periods a much greater difference. Is it fitting—is it in accordance with the genius of free institutions, with the spirit of a country of laws, to confide such a power to a mere Secretary of the Treasury? What a power is it not to reward political friends or punish political enemies!

But, sir, I look at the matter of this restriction in a higher point of view. You cannot maintain it. Why should you? You have provided all the means, as you profess to believe, of perfect security for the custody of the public money in these public depositaries. Why should you require the holder of a Government draft, often ignorant of the legislation of the Secretary of the Treasury, to present it for payment by a given day, under a severe penalty, depending upon his discretion? Will not the inconvenience to the community, of a precise day and a short day, for the presentation of the draft be vastly greater than that of the public in retaining the money for an indefinite day, until it suits the holder's convenience to demand payment? And will you not be tempted to keep possession of the specie, for the incidental advantages which it affords? Ah! sir; are we to overlook the possible uses to which, in corrupt days of the Republic, this dormant specie may be applied in the crisis of a political election or the crisis of the existence of a party in power?

Congress will be called upon, imperatively called upon, by the people, to abolish all restrictions which the Secretary of the Treasury may promulgate for the speedy presentation for payment of Government drafts. The wants of the people and the necessity of the country for a paper medium, possessing a uniform value, and capable of general circulation, will demand it at your hands, and you will be most ready to grant the required boon. We should regard the system according to its true and inherent character, and not be deceived by provisions, inevitably temporary in their nature, which the policy or the prudence of its authors may throw around it. The greatest want of this country, at the present period, in its circulating medium, is some convertible paper, which, at every extremity of the Union, will command the confidence of the public, and circulate without depreciation. Such a paper will be supplied in the form of these Government drafts.

But if the restriction which I have been considering could be enforced and continued, it would not alter the bank character of this measure. Bank or no bank is a question not depending upon the duration of time which its issues remain out, but upon the office which they perform whilst out. The notes of the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania are not deprived of their character of composing a part of the circulating medium of the country, although they might be returned to the bank in some ten or twenty days after their issue.

I know that it has been argued, and will be argued again, at that all times since the commencement of the Government the practice of the Treasury has been to issue its drafts upon the public depositaries; that these drafts have not heretofore circulated as money; and that, if they now do, it is an incident which attaches no blame to the Government.

But heretofore these drafts were issued upon banks, and the holders of them passed them to their credit with the banks, or received payment in bank notes. The habit of the country—and habit is a great thing—was to use bank notes. Moreover, there were bank notes of every kind in use—those which were local and those which were general in their credit and circulation. Now, having no Bank of the United States in existence, there are no bank notes which maintain the same value, and command the public confidence, throughout the Union. You create, therefore, an inexorable necessity for the use of Government drafts as a medium of general circulation, and argue from a state of things when no such necessity existed!

The protestations of the friends of the bill in this chamber, the denunciations of its opponents, and the just horror which the people entertain of a Government bank, may prompt the Secretary of the Treasury slowly and slyly to lift the veil which masks its true features. A Government bank may not suddenly burst upon us, but there it is, embodied in this bill. And it is not the least objection to the measure, that it depends upon the discretion of a Secretary of the Treasury to retard or accelerate the commencement of its operation, at his pleasure. Let the re-election of the present Chief Magistrate be secured, and you will soon see the bank disclosing its genuine character. But, thanks be to God, there is a day of reckoning at hand. All the signs of the times clearly indicate its approach. And on the 4 h day of March, in the year of our Lord 1841, I trust that the long account of the abuses and corruptions of this Administration, in which this measure will be a conspicuous item, will be finally and forever adjusted.

Mr. President, who is to have the absolute control of this Government bank? We have seen, within a few years past, a most extraordinary power asserted and exercised. We have seen, in a free, representative, Republican Government, the power claimed by the Executive, and it is now daily enforced, of dismissing all officers of the Government, without any other cause than a mere difference of opinion. No matter what may be the merits of the officer; no matter how long and how faithfully he may have served the public; no matter what sacrifices he may have made; no matter how incompetent, from age and poverty, he may be to gain a subsistence for himself and his family; he is driven out to indigence and want, for no other reason than that he differs in opinion with the President on the Sub-Treasury, or some other of the various experiments upon the prosperity of this people. But this is not all. If you call upon the President to state the reasons which induced him, in any particular instance, to exercise this tremendous power of dismission, wrapping himself up in all the dignity and arrogance of royal majesty, he refuses to assign any reason whatever, and tells you that it is his prerogative! That you have no right to interrogate him as to the motives which have prompted him in the exercise of any of his constitutional powers! Nay, more: if you apply to a subordinate—a mere minion of power—to inform you why he has dismissed any of his subordinates, he replies that he will not communicate the grounds of his action. I have understood that, in more cases than one, the person acting as Postmaster General has refused this session to inform members of Congress of the grounds on which he has dismissed deputy postmasters. We have witnessed the application of this power to a Treasurer of the United States recently, without the pretence of his failure to discharge the public duties, all of which he performed with scrupulous exactness, honor, and probity.

And what, sir, is the consequence of a power so claimed and so exercised? The first is, that, in a country of Constitution and Laws, the basis and the genius of which are that there is, or should be, the most perfect responsibility on the part of every, even the highest functionary, here is a vast power, daily exercised with the most perfect impunity, and without the possibility of arraigning a guilty Chief Magistrate. For how can he be impeached or brought to trial if he will not disclose, and you have no adequate means of ascertaining, the grounds on which he has acted?

The next consequence is, that, as all the officers of Government, who hold their offices by the tenure to which I allude, hold them at the President's mercy, and without the possibility of finding any redress if they are dismissed without cause, they become his pliant creatures, and feel that they are bound implicitly to obey his will.

Now, sir, put this Government Bank into operation, and who are to be charged with the administration of its operations? The Secretary of the Treasury, the Treasurer of the United States, the Register and the Comptroller of the Treasury, and the receivers general, etc. Every one of them holding his office at the pleasure and mercy of the President—every one of them, perhaps, depending for his bread upon the will of the President—every one of them taught, by sad experience, to know that his safest course is to mould his opinions and shape his conduct so as to please the President—every one of them knowing perfectly that, if dismissed, he is without the possibility of any remedy or redress whatever. In such a deplorable state of things, this Government Bank will be the mere bank of the President of the United States. He will be its PRESIDENT, CASHIER, and TELLER. Yes, sir, this complete subjection of all the subordinate officers of the Government to the will of the President, will make him sole Director, President, Cashier, and Teller of this Government Bank. The so much dreaded union of the purse and the sword will at last be consummated; and the usurpation by which the public deposites in 1837 were removed, by the advancement of the one, and the removal of another Secretary of the Treasury, will not only be finally legalized and sanctioned, but the enormity of the danger of that precedent will be transcended by a deliberate act of the Congress of the United States!

Mr. President, for ten long years we have been warring against the alarming growth of Executive power; but, although we have been occasionally cheered, it has been constantly advancing and never receding. You may talk as you please about bank expansions. There has been no pernicious expansion in this country like that of Executive power; and, unlike the operations of banks, this power never has any periods of contraction. You may denounce as you please the usurpations of Congress. There has been no usurpation but that of the Executive, which has been both of the powers of other co-ordinate departments of this Government and upon the States. There scarcely remains any power in this Government but that of the President. He suggests, originates, controls, checks every thing. The insatiable spirit of the Stuarts, for power and prerogative, was brought upon our American throne on the 4th of March, 1829. It came under all the usual false and hypocritical pretences and disguises of love of the people, desire of reform, and diffidence of power. The Scotch dynasty still continues. We have had Charles the First, and now have Charles the Second. But I again thank God that our deliverance is not distant; and that, on the 4th of March, 1841, a great and glorious revolution, without blood and without convulsion, will be achieved.

SPEECH OF MR. PROFFIT,

OF INDIANA,

In the House of Representatives, April 27, 1840—On the General Appropriation Bill.

Mr. Chairman: It is now, I believe, about four weeks since the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole upon this bill; and during all that time, day after day, and night after night, I have been a silent but attentive looker on in this unrivalled scene of contention. The first two days of the discussion convinced me, sir, that we of the Opposition could propose no amendment, use no argument, which would in the slightest degree affect the determination of the majority to pass the bill in the form reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. It required no stretch of intellect to perceive that the order had gone forth to vote down every proposition of the minority; and, sir, up to this hour, that order has been most implicitly obeyed. It comports not with my taste to describe the tumult, the legislative depravity, the utter recklessness, which I have here witnessed. It has been but a continuation of the disgraceful scene with which our sitting opened; and it is now lamentably palpable that a Congress which commenced in revolution, riot, and anarchy, must terminate in disorder and disgrace. Nothing beneficial to the people need be expected; for this Hall, which was intended for deliberation, for discussion, for legislative action, is converted into a mere arena for the display of the gladiatorial feeling of party. With every feeling of my heart, I respond to the language of my honorable friend from Virginia (Mr. BOYD) when, on a former occasion, he said, "I wish to God, from my very heart and soul, that our constituents, especially such of them as are friendly to this Administration, were thronging our galleries." Yes, sir, they would soon see who it is that has caused Congress to become a by-word and a reproach. Who, sir, is accountable for these scenes, and for this delay of the public business? Who, sir, is chargeable with introducing and suffering this unparliamentary and unprofitable discussion? Sir, the countenances of the prominent Administration members give the reluctant answer. They know that they commenced and prosecuted this partisan debate. They cannot deny that they encouraged it. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. DUNCAN) knows that he commenced it. If I do him injustice by this accusation, he or any of his friends may correct me. No, sir, it cannot be denied. Without the slightest provocation, and without one word having been said by the Opposition on the subject, he, for one whole day, violently assailed the character of General Harrison; exhibited caricatures—vile filthy daubs, manufactured by his own party for political effect; disgusted and fatigued us with the execrable rhymes of some wretched "ballad-monger;" read scraps from outcast newspapers, which, until now, were rotting in the oblivion to which they were long since consigned by the universal consent of all decent men. Sir, for days the friends of the Administration inflicted upon us the same stale, stereotyped speeches, which have served their purposes, in every need, for the last few years. The "anti-bank," "anti-monopoly," "anti-associated-wealth" speech was recited by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WELLER;) and I mean no disrespect to the gentleman when I say that I have unhappily been compelled to listen to that speech upon at least one hundred different occasions. I hope, most sincerely hope, that I have heard it for the last time. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. PARMENTER) broached another favorite theme of the Administration, making known his horror of the Hartford Convention; and on this interminable topic, tested for hours the patience of the committee. The gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. ATHERTON) who so frequently professes to abhor irrelevancy in debate, occupied, for hours, the attention of such as could listen, by reading from sundry British essays, pamphlets, and reviews, &c.; among which I recollect Blackwood's Magazine occupied a very conspicuous place; and, not content with hours thus wasted, the gentleman must have the benefit of an adjournment, in spite of the remonstrances of myself and others; and, on the next day, with refreshed energy and renewed vigor, continued to inflict upon us the punishment of listening to his dull, unmeaning, and irrelevant quotations. The honorable gentleman from Maine, (Mr. CLIFFORD,) despite the agony depicted on every countenance around him, unfeelingly introduced another subject, on which all Administration men are eloquent—"The History of the Federal and Democratic Parties;" and hour after hour was consumed in reading from and descanting on all the partisan writers of the first thirty years of our Government. Sir, against this waste of time I must distinctly protest, because the party in power published some years since a pamphlet under this title. It was compiled under the supervision of its choice spirits, and was sown broadcast and gratuitously over the whole land, particularly in the west. I have a copy of it now before me. I therefore think this new edition by the gentleman from Maine quite unnecessary, especially as it is much inferior to the first; and, sir, I would, with due deference, suggest to gentlemen that, if they wish to recommend themselves to Executive favor, by becoming partisan authors and pamphlet scribblers, would it not be better that they should betake themselves to the closet, and in that retirement scrawl to their heart's content. Thousands of dollars could be thus saved to the people, and yet the public receive the benefit of their vast knowledge and literary gleanings. But, sir, the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. JAMESON) outstripped all his compeers in the ingenuity of his cruelty; for, in spite of all entreaty and all remonstrance, he caused to be read to us one whole newspaper and parts of several others. The "Nashville Union" was, I believe, the name of the paper which he gravely informed us he should adopt as a part of his speech. To this, sir, I have no objection. Gentlemen may adopt any bantling they please. I care not what its color or its origin; but I do wish that some rule could be devised, whereby gentlemen could be permitted to give us these pamphlets, and reviews, and newspapers, and old songs, by the tittle. Then, sir, a bill providing for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government might be discussed and disposed of in somewhat less time than forty days and nights, and some exhibitions might be avoided, which, to say the least of them, reflect any thing but credit upon us as legislators. I could proceed, sir, to name many other gentlemen of the Administration party who occupied day after day without one moment's reference to the subject before the committee. I could prove, beyond the possibility of denial, that a very large portion of the misspent time of which the people are justly complaining was occupied by the declaimers of the Administration party. Yet, sir, the organ of that party, with unparalleled effrontery, accuses the Opposition of procrastination, of wasting time unnecessarily, and its petty satellites throughout the Union echo the baseless charge, notwithstanding the facts which I have here stated stand uncontroverted by any gentleman on this floor.

There is, Mr. Chairman, one gentleman of the Administration party who participated largely in this debate, who is not obnoxious to the charge I have made: it is the honorable chairman of the Ways and Means, (Mr. JONES.) I must, in justice to that gentleman, say, that he attempted to curb and repress the reckless spirits with whom he is unfortunately associated. But dignity and common sense, and courtesy of manners, have but little influence with them; and, therefore, his counsels and his example passed unheeded. I, sir, well understand the object of those who have polluted this atmosphere with their ribaldry and misrepresentations. They think that they are working wonders in their daily labor of manufacturing political capital for the Presidential election. They suppose that the people will implicitly believe any slander they may utter. They imagine that, under the imposing title of a Congressional name, any absurdity will pass current in the country; and this, sir, is the manner in which they carry on their machinations.

A base falsehood is manufactured at the fountain-head. It is then inserted in some contemptible newspaper in an obscure corner of the country, or blazoned forth in staring characters in the "Official organ," as the occasion may demand. It then takes the rounds of the Administration journals, with such comments as suit the political atmosphere in which it appears. If it succeeds in poisoning the public mind, the object is accomplished, and the party rejoice, and are satisfied with the result of their labors. But if the good sense of the people, distrustful of the base source from which it emanates, should hesitate to receive the falsehood—if, in anxious inquiry after truth, the honest yeomanry of the nation demand proof of the charge preferred, or assertion made, and the slander receives but a momentary check, then, sir, the eye of the Administration is cast upon Congress, and some supple tool is selected to become the "Congressional endorser." Then, sir, in the shape of a speech made upon this floor, and with increased malignity, and improved venom, it is poured forth to the world. And from what I have witnessed, there certainly is much competition for the honor of serving as the sewer of the party, through which all the filth of the Administration shall pass into this Hall, and from this to the country. Upon this occasion, I will say, that more than one of the organs selected have shown themselves to be of fitting material, not to be the sewer only, but the reservoir of all the pestilential misrepresentations of the Administration.

I cannot notice what different gentlemen have said. I had not intended to have opened my lips during this debate; but after what has fallen from the gentlemen from Ohio (Mr. DUNCAN) and from Virginia (Mr. HOPKINS) I should consider myself as remiss in duty did I not say a few words in reply. The first of these gentlemen is the acknowledged idol of the party and the especial object of their reverence. The latter, not less beloved, because more recently installed as a priest in their political temple. Both have figured conspicuously on this occasion, and have succeeded in throwing into the shade all other aspirants to the title of party leaders. Of the speech of the gentleman from Ohio I will say but little. All that part of it impeaching the civil and military character of General Harrison is but a compilation of the slanders which have appeared again and again in the Administration prints, and have so often been refuted that further notice of them might possibly raise their authors "to the dignity of a decent man's contempt." I have no wish to give them even that importance, but shall content myself with replying to the attacks made upon General Harrison by the gentleman from Virginia, both in his speech and in his letter to Colonel Piper, which, having been published in pamphlet form, and alluded to on this floor, is legitimately a subject for criticism.

I perceive, Mr. Chairman, that the last Globe contains the speech of the gentleman from Ohio, and that, in recommending the speech to the public, its editor says, "it has a spice of coarseness suited to the Western people." I presume, sir, that our people of the West will fully appreciate the compliment paid to their taste. I, sir, have yet to learn that our people are less intelligent, or less observant of the decencies and proprieties of life, than the people of other portions of the Union; and I have greatly mistaken their character if any respectable man of any party will countenance and approve any such vile garbage as is contained in this specimen of coarseness issued to suit the taste of the West. Could I overcome my repugnance to read such ribaldry, I would give the committee some "beautiful extracts" from this speech; but I should then be compelled to pollute my printed remarks with their insertion, and, therefore, I forbear. At the suggestion of a gentleman immediately before me, I will, however, read one extract, assuring the committee that I mean no contempt by its introduction:

> "Mary Rogers are a case,
> And so are Sally Thompson;
> General Jackson are a horse,
> And so are Colonel Johnson."

This, sir, is a specimen of Congressional speech making, and if it is not coarse enough to suit the taste of the most vulgar, the gentleman will, doubtless, upon another trial, improve both his style and his rhymes. With the aid of other kindred spirits, he will, doubtless in his next effort, favor us with something still more disgusting and foolish.

I, Mr. Chairman, as a Western man, have watched with something both of sorrow and of anger, the continued insults which have been offered to the West, since General Harrison became a candidate. No sooner was his name announced, than we were sneeringly told that he was but a "paltry Log Cabin Candidate;" as though a residence in an humble dwelling constituted a crime, or at least a disqualification for office. Another writer of the Administration, defending this scornful allusion to the people of the West, speaks of the tenants of the log cabins as "having souls suited to the dirt hovels in which they live." And now, sir, the most loathsome trash is published under the name of a speech, and it is said by the official organ that its coarseness will suit the Western people.

Sir, I know the people who are the objects of this continued abuse. I know full well the answer they will give to these pampered menials of power. They await impatiently the coming of November next; and then, sir, with one simultaneous thunder-shout of indignation, will they pronounce the death-doom of the Administration which, not content with injuring, has dared to insult them.

And now, sir, I will turn my attention to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. HOPKINS,) and although I could wish to follow him closely, and examine his position minutely, this, sir, is impossible, both from the lateness of the hour, and from the multiplicity of subjects introduced by the gentleman, doubtless to evade the true issue now pending. But, sir, as I had anticipated, the currency question was the principal theme of his discourse; and all the distress and ruin now universal through the country, is attributed to the banks. This is always the cry—over-issues; contraction and expansion; excessive imports; small exports; heartless corporations; combined wealth. These never varying and never failing catch-phrases the gentleman uses in profusion, both in his speech and in his letter to Col. Piper. In the latter, I find it again and again repeated. Page 4, I find he speaks of the influence of the banks, and of the "whole dynasty of associated wealth." Page 9, he is again opposed to the whole "dynasty of associated wealth." Page 10, he speaks of a "powerful combination of bodies, artificial," &c. Again, the banks "combine against the Administration." And again, he tells of "combined encroachments." And, page 11, "incorporated wealth never cloys." Mr. Chairman, we all understand for what purpose these changes are rung. I am inclined to think, sir, that the people of this country understand that it is an attempt to enlist their prejudices rather than their judgments. And further, sir, I think the gentleman underrates their common sense, by supposing that he can, by this ruse, prevent them from examining into the causes of their present troubles. The gentleman says that there have been over-issues by the banks; over-trading by the people, &c. I, sir, have not time to investigate this matter closely; but it has been examined repeatedly, both in this and the last Congress, and proved beyond the possibility of a doubt, that the destruction of the Bank of the United States, and the after policy of the Administration, caused those over-issues of which the gentleman complains. The very state of things now existing, was predicted by the Opposition previous to its destruction. We were told, sir, by the friends of the then existing Administration, that the State corporations would furnish a better currency; that money would be more plentiful; and that money was to be all gold or silver—no bank paper. But no sooner was the bill rechartering the Bank of the United States vetoed, and the deposites removed from its care, than we had message after message lauding the State banks. In 1834, the President proclaimed to Congress that "the State banks are found fully adequate to the performance of all services which were required of the Bank of the United States, quite as promptly, and with the same cheapness." In 1835, the President in his message again assures Congress that the State banks continued to realize every expectation entertained of their capacity to serve the purposes of Government. In 1836, the President again told Congress that the State banks still performed all the duties required of them. Every Administration paper in the Union echoed their praise. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Taney, urged upon the several deposite banks to INCREASE their discounts, and gave as a reason, that "the deposites of the public money will enable you to afford increased facilities." Banks were selected as public depositories, merely on account of the party bias of those who controlled their affairs, as will appear by the published correspondence of certain institutions in New York, and other parts of the Union. According to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, they did extend their issues and speculation—unprecedented expansion became the result. Then came the specie circular; and the very crisis which the Opposition had always predicted, fell with appalling force upon us; and ever since that time the country, like a drunken man, has been reeling to and fro under the influence of the noxious draught administered by the political empirics of that day. This, sir, is a brief sketch of the causes of the over-issues to which are attributed the present embarrassments of the country. But, sir, if mismanagement of banks, and over-issues, are to be alluded to in a party point of view, I would turn the attention of the gentleman to those States where the Administration party had the control. I will instance Mississippi, Alabama, &c. Those States, sir, are edifying specimens of Administration financiering. It is useless, sir, to attempt to satisfy the people any longer with fine spun theories, or specious promises. It is in vain to ask them to submit to any more experiments. They are determined to have a change in the Administration. They can recollect that but a few years since they had a sound currency, good markets, and constant employment for their industry. They know that there has been mismanagement somewhere. Their present condition cannot be rendered more distressing. Any change must be for the better, and therefore a change they will have. This, sir, is the language of common sense, as now coming from the mass of the people.

But, sir, I perceive that the Administration party here affect to sneer, as usual, at the assertion made by myself and others, that general distress pervades the country. I know, sir, that gentlemen have said that it is but imaginary. One gentleman, (Mr. DUNCAN,) in his speech, has told us that, if the people are embarrassed, he would advise them "to take off their coats, and go to work." This language, sir, may suit an Administration rolling in wealth and splendor. It may come with fitting grace from the supporters of men who are receiving large salaries in gold and silver, and actually profiting by the derangement of the currency. But I tell you, sir, that the people will know how to appreciate and to answer such unfeeling, heartless, cold-blooded, and insolent language. They have had their coats off; they have labored; they have vainly used every effort to obtain the due reward of that labor; and now the products of the agricultural community are still remaining unsold, or, if disposed of, it has been at a ruinous sacrifice. And even now the farmer is sowing and planting without hope of remuneration. He knows not whether the sweat-drops of a long summer's labor will avail him aught. In the present derangement of all business operations, the calculations even of the most sagacious fail; and yet gentlemen, as an answer to the every day's experience of these truths, return the old answer, that the Administration is not responsible, and attribute it all to the banks. Sir, the Administration is responsible. It is its exploded and exploding experiments which have occasioned this state of things. Its tamperings; its reckless disregard for every interest; its determination to sustain itself in power at every hazard; its execrable attempts to check the enterprise, and assimilate the condition of the American people to that of the monarchies of Europe. Sir, one week's derangement of the active industry of this country is a greater loss to the country than if you were to throw the whole capital of the Bank of the United States into the Delaware. This, sir, is undeniable, and yet we have had not only weeks, but years, of constant derangement, and the consequences are now hanging darkly as a pall upon the country.

But, sir, as the gentleman from Virginia is so loud in his denunciation of the banks, and now thinks that the public money ought by no means to be placed in their keeping, I will read a passage from the report of the majority of the Investigating Committee, of which the gentleman was a member, and with which majority he acted. After stating that the loss to the Government of large sums of money might have been avoided by depositing in the banks, on special deposite, and citing the Bank of America and the Manhattan Bank as having been used as depositories after they suspended specie payments, the committee, on page 72, say:

"It is, then, apparent that, had the depositing system of banks been continued, Mr. Swartwout could not have had money beyond the collections of a single week, exceeding the current expenses of his office, to have retained on going out of office: and the evidence of his not having diverted any previous to that time, and that all previous collections were in bank, would have been regularly derived from the banks, as well as in Mr. Swartwout's official returns."

I shall have occasion, sir, to refer to this report again; but, in the meantime, I must remark that the gentleman's opinions have certainly undergone a great change since the last session of Congress. It is useless for the gentleman to give as an excuse, that the banks have now suspended; for the report finds fault because the deposites were not made, even after they had suspended.

But, sir, it is not my purpose to defend the banks. I am in nowise identified with them; but the gentleman having thought fit to accuse the Opposition of shifting ground, and acting inconsistently, I deem it my duty to deny the assertion, to investigate his course, and to ascertain whether he is not liable to the very charge he has so unreservedly made against us.

I would, Mr. Chairman, call the attention of the committee to the systematic deception which is now practising upon the people of the United States, on the subject of the promised reforms in the currency. The Administration leaders have now at least some half a dozen various schemes on which they are attempting to coin political capital. The Senator from Missouri (Mr. BENTON) is opposed to the issuing of any bank paper in bills under the denomination of one hundred dollars. The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) is out against all bank paper, and must have nothing but gold and silver. A Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) says that he is in favor of a mixed currency, but asks the Legislatures of the States to confer power on Congress to prohibit the issue of any notes under twenty dollars. Another Administration partisan in this House (Mr. MONTGOMERY) proposes to issue ten dollar Treasury notes as currency, and this without one single dollar of specie basis. Look also, sir, at the action of the Legislatures under Administration control—Pennsylvania, for instance. The Legislature meets, (the Van Buren party having a large majority,) breathing vengeance against the banks; nothing will appease their wrath but immediate resumption or instant destruction. They meet, wrangle, scold, vow that banks are nuisances, and bank paper worthless rags; and terminate the session by borrowing some millions of bank paper, and allowing the banks their own time to resume specie payment. They then go home and hold "indignation meetings," and denounce one another as having acted traitorously to the party. And when, sir, I, as a stranger to Pennsylvania tactics, have asked some explanation of these seeming inconsistencies, I have been told, Oh, never mind us; we will arrange it all; we understand the people of Pennsylvania.

I will now take notice of the complaint made by the gentleman that the Opposition deal unfairly with the Administration, in giving to the public partial extracts from official documents. This charge, sir, is unfounded; is unsupported by any proof; and I defy any gentleman to make good the accusation. I deprecate as much as any gentleman can, any such unfairness; and I consider any man who would knowingly mislead the public mind, a fit object of scorn and contempt. I will read, sir, the document which has given the Administration party so much uneasiness.

(OFFICIAL.)—PUBLIC EXPENDITURE FROM 1824 TO 1838.

Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of expenditure, exclusive of the public debt, for each year, from 1824 to 1838.

(JUNE 28, 1838.—Read, and laid upon the table.)

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 27, 1838.

SIR: In obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 25th instant, I have the honor to "lay before the House a statement showing the amount of expenditure, exclusive of the public debt, for each year, from 1824 to 1838."

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. J. K. POLK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Statement showing the amount of expenditures of the United States, exclusive of the public debt, for each year, from 1824 to 1837, inclusive, stated in pursuance of a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 25th June, 1838.

For the year	1824	$15,330,144 71
Do	1826	13,062,316 27
Do	1827	12,653,095 65
Do	1828	12,396,041 45
Do	1829	12,660,460 62
Do	1830	13,229,533 33
Do	1831	13,864,067 90
Do	1832	16,516,388 77
Do	1833	22,713,755 11
Do	1834	18,425,417 25
Do	1835	17,514,950 28
Do	1836	30,868,164 04
Do	1837	*39,164,745 37

* NOTE.—The foregoing sums include payments for trust funds and indemnities, which, in 1837, was $5,610,404 36.

T. L. SMITH, Register.

Register's Office, June 27, 1838.

Is there a gentleman on this floor who will rise in his place and say that this is not a full and complete document, as sent to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury? Is there a word or figure missing? Is there a syllable added? No, sir; it is the whole of an official report. What does it prove? That the expenditures of this Government, despite all the professions of economy, despite all the promises of retrenchment, have increased from $15,330,144 71 in 1824, to $39,164,745 37 in 1837, nearly threefold; and when, sir, we present this document to the people and ask their judgment upon it, the Administration party complain of unfairness.

The gentleman from Virginia, with much ingenuity, attempts to evade this plain demonstration of facts and figures, by explaining the causes which have led to this vast increase of the expenditures by the Administration. This, sir, he has a perfect right to do; and I, sir, have also a right to answer his explanations, and to show that, notwithstanding his ingenuity and tact at mystifying this subject, this Administration is responsible—justly censurable—for permitting and countenancing waste, extravagance, and peculation.

Amongst other things, the gentleman from Virginia quotes the Florida war as an item of "extraordinary expenses," and says that many of the Opposition voted supplies. I have not examined the journal, neither shall I; for I consider it as quite immaterial who and what party voted for or against the appropriations. It is enough for me to know that a war with the Indians existed in Florida, and that the Government made estimates, and demanded supplies. They were granted; and the Administration is responsible for the manner of the expenditure. But, sir, this is another instance of the fairness with which the Opposition are treated. If they vote supplies, they are accused of extravagance, and the President protests that he is not responsible. Had they refused to vote the money demanded by the Government, a want of patriotism would have been ascribed to them, and they would have been branded as enemies of the country. But, Mr. Chairman, I will proceed to prove that the money appropriated by Congress for the prosecution of this war has been most shamefully wasted; and I will cite a few instances of the lavish extravagance which I charge upon the Administration. In Senate document, 2d session 25th Congress, vol. 3, I find "a statement of contracts for fuel, transportation, &c., for the Quartermaster's department for 1837," and signed "T. Cross, Acting Quartermaster General." Here, sir, I find, in part, how the thirty millions have been expended in Florida. I will give the committee a few items of steamboat contracts for 1837:

For charter of steamboat Watchman, $450 per day, or $164,250 per annum.
For charter of steamboat Mobile, $465 per day, or $169,725 per annum.
For charter of steamboat Anna Calhoun and two barges, $400 per day, or $146,000 per annum.
For charter of steamboat Henry Cromwell, $300 per day, or $109,500 per annum.
For charter of steamboat Hyperion, $300 per day, or $109,500 per annum.
For charter of steamboat Leflore, $200 per day, or $73,600 per annum.
For charter of steamboat Charleston, $3,750 per month, or $45,000 per annum.
For charter of steamboat Florida, $3,000 per month, or $36,000 per annum.
For charter of steamboat John McLean, $4,000 per month, or $48,000 per annum.
For charter of steamboat Camden, $4,000 per month, or $48,000 per annum.
For charter of steamboat James Adams, $4,000 per month, or $48,000 per annum.
For charter of steamboat Altamaha, $5,000 per month, or $60,000 per annum.
For charter of steamboat ————, $3,500 per month, or $40,000 per annum.

In short, sir, by this document it appears that there were CHARTERED, during the year 1837, thirty-five steamboats, forty-three schooners, two sloops, twenty-five brigs, six ships; making, in all, one hundred and eleven vessels chartered, during the year 1837, for the prosecution of this Florida war—this war, sir, which we, a nation of millions, have waged for years with some 500 naked warriors. And, besides the one hundred and eleven vessels chartered, I find upwards of one hundred contracts, some of them of a very large amount, for transportation of troops, forage, arms, horses, &c., during that year, for this war. Sir, the party in power is justly chargeable with having involved the country in this war unnecessarily, and then of having wasted the money appropriated for its prosecution.

I will give also another charge from the same document: "For transporting 100 cords of firewood from New Orleans to Fort Brooke, East Florida, and one assistant surgeon, $2,000." Here, sir, is charged twenty dollars per cord for carrying firewood from New Orleans, besides the original cost and other expenses; and that, too, to a country where, as I am assured by gentlemen well acquainted with the country, thousands of cords of wood could be cut in sight of the fort to which this wood was sent. I am also informed that wood has often been taken from Florida to New Orleans for sale; and I should not be surprised if this wood was originally from Florida, and, after being shipped to New Orleans and properly seasoned, was shipped back again to afford a little patronage. These, sir, are a few specimens of expenditure in the Florida war for 1837. I could for hours read charges equally obnoxious to censure; and, sir, I have had a resolution on your table ever since the first resolution-day of this session, asking the Secretary of War for a detailed account of the expenditures of the war, and the friends of the Administration, by some miserable subterfuge or quibbling point of order, refuse to call for the statement. And yet, sir, this is called a representative Government, and we assume to be the Grand Inquest of the nation, and the people are told that all officers, from the President down, are strictly accountable. Yet we cannot ask how $30,000,000 of their money has been spent without being told by gentlemen that the Opposition voted supplies for the war, and that these expenditures are "extraordinary." Truly, sir, they are "extraordinary;" and therefore it is that I demand a full and explicit statement as to their nature.

I am told, sir, that a steamboat was offered to the Government for about $14,000, and, refusing to purchase, they chartered her until they paid some $72,000. I am told, sir, that plank in several instances has cost $1 25 per foot, or $125 per hundred feet. Also, that firewood has cost $50 per cord. Sir, it is the duty of the Administration party to give the people light on this subject, and to relieve themselves, if they can, from the charges of waste and peculation.

I believe the charges to be true, from what I have seen of the documents now before me, and this is but the account for one year. I should, amongst other things, like to see what amount has been expended for the "bloodhounds," which, as every person now acknowledges, have turned out to be common curs, and not worth a shilling a head. I presume that this experiment, with the contingencies, cost some thousands. I perceive, also, that one man has been paid $7 50 per day, and subsistence, for transporting forty bushels of corn, in sacks, from one post to another in Wiskonsin. Flour has been transported from one place to another until it cost $50 per barrel, and then sold at one-fourth the cost of transportation. In short, sir, did I not see these things stated in official documents, I could not have believed it possible that such gross mismanagement existed: But I must leave this branch of expenditure, thus hastily glanced at, and pass to another.

The gentleman from Virginia, in his anxiety to defend his new allies, quotes the expenses "of Indian emigration, and subsistence for Indians," as an item of expenditure for which many of the opposition voted, and the gentleman classes it under the head of "extraordinary expenses." I shall not deny that many Opposition members did vote for the estimates demanded by the Administration for this branch of the public service. I think they were quite justifiable in so doing. But, sir, could any one of the Opposition have ever supposed that the money voted would have been so shamefully squandered, absolutely wasted, as the reports of the officers in that department PROVE it to have been? I will cite one or two instances, out of the many I could enumerate, to prove the unjustifiable and criminal abuses which have been practised on this subject.

Document No. 127, of 3d session of 25th Congress, is a letter of Mr. Poinsett, Secretary of War. In that document I find a communication from the Commissary General of Subsistence, addressed to Mr. Poinsett, and I there perceive that the Government, after purchasing unnecessarily a vast amount of provisions, &c., "for the army, sent it to the Cherokee country," and, having no use for it, ordered it to be sold, and I will quote an extract from that communication:

"The supplies sold consisted of 50 barrels of pork, 2,645 barrels flour, 821 barrels hard bread, 272½ bushels beans, 16½ bushels cornmeal, 169 bushels corn, 506 bushels salt, 75,027 pounds sugar, 41,297 pounds coffee, 5,438 pounds rice, 531,020 pounds bacon, 28,181 pounds soap, 14,110 pounds candles, 371 gallons whiskey, 5,145 gallons vinegar, and all the issuing apparatus, such as scales, weights, and measures, used while the volunteer troops were in service. These articles produced the net sum of $52,117 90."

This, sir, is the "official account." Does any gentleman here deny it? Is there any one of the Administration party who wishes to give an explanation? If so, I will give way. Not one, sir. Then, let none of the Administration papers throughout the Union dare to deny this statement. And what do I prove by this, Mr. Chairman? That this vast amount of supplies, "collected unnecessarily," cost, as will appear by the accounts of the department, upwards of two hundred and sixty thousand dollars, including transportation, commissions, buildings erected for their preservation, &c., and were sold by this all-wise and competent Administration for less than one-fifth of cost. This, sir, is the manner in which the money of the people is wasted. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia if it was possible for any honest man to anticipate such unjustifiable squanderings of the public money? It seems, sir, that the 28,181 pounds of soap were not needed by the army. It ought never to have been sold, sir. It should have been shipped to Washington, and would have served as a fraction of the quantity requisite to cleanse this foul Administration. But, sir, I will give you another item of sales of stores, &c., purchased unnecessarily, and sold at auction in the Cherokee country, in 1838, and embraced in this same communication. I find, sir, that corn, which cost the Government at least one dollar and a half, and in many instances two dollars, per bushel, and accumulated unnecessarily in vast quantities, was sold by this economical Administration as follows:

8,381	bushels corn,	at 17½	cents per bushel
5,275	do.	at 11⅛	do.
4,990¼	do.	at 10¼	do.
400	bushels corn,	at 3¼	do.
4,239½	do.	at 13¼	do.

This, sir, is a specimen of the prices at which this article was sold, and thousands of dollars thrown away in this one article of corn alone. And this, sir, is only a fraction of the quantity sold. I find, further, sir, that oats, purchased at double the usual cost, were sold at 3½ cents per bushel. This corn and oats were not damaged; for the report states them to have been sound, and the damaged corn sold separately. I could proceed, sir, to enumerate hundreds of cases of the same nature, but time will not permit. I will close by giving an extract from a letter of the Creek agent at Fort Gibson, addressed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, complaining of the action of the Administration, in forwarding such immense quantities of supplies unnecessarily to that post, and which also had to be sold at an immense sacrifice:

"But, whatever be the apology of the measure in question, whether it be ignorance of the resources of the country, distrust of the capability of the officers charged with the subsistence of the Indians, or a dread of a failure of their efforts in that respect, one thing is demonstrably true, that the great loss which is now inevitably consequent upon the measure, might have been avoided had timely directions been given to dispose of this extraordinary supply of provision as soon as it was ascertained not to be needed."

He again says:

"Instead of this, cargo after cargo continued to arrive as the necessity decreased."

Again, sir, the same agent says:

"I repeat, sir, fearless of contradiction, had the agents here been instructed, in the first instance, as agents of the Government ought to have been, where its interest was concerned, the public would not have sustained the loss of a single dollar; the provision purchased in New Orleans would have been sold, and not transported here, as has been the case, at an enormous expense, where it was not needed, and at an additionlal expense of several thousands to erect suitable buildings to cover it from the weather."

This gentleman, sir, for his plain speaking to the Government officers, was treated with official insolence, and immediately resigned his station. A mean, obsequious, fawning sycophant would have been cherished and patronised by them. Here, sir, is another instance of hundreds of thousands of dollars squandered. Who could have dreamed of such "blundering policy?" And yet the gentleman from Virginia says the Opposition voted for "Indian subsistence," &c.; and he is loud in praise of an Administration which is thus, by its own official documents, convicted of incompetency, waste, and extravagance, and, it may be, something worse. I believe, sir, that all these unnecessary purchases were made to give profitable contracts to favorites.

We have been told, sir, that the public buildings are another source of "extraordinary" expense. I will, sir, for a moment refer to this matter, and in that moment convince the committee that another high handed and unjustifiable act of this Administration has cost the people, unnecessarily, three hundred thousand dollars. I refer to the post office building. The Committee on Public Buildings of the House of Representatives, in order to ascertain the actual cost of the building proposed to be erected, made a demand for a detailed estimate of the cost of a split granite building. It was furnished; and amounted to two hundred and eighty thousand dollars. But, sir, no sooner had Congress adjourned, than the President ordered the erection of a marble building—a perfect palace, which is now estimated, even by Administration gentlemen, to cost six hundred thousand dollars. This, sir, will explain to gentlemen why this branch of expenditure is termed "extraordinary." But, sir, there is another matter connected with this subject, and which is admitted even here by the friends of the Administration. After the money appropriated by Congress had been expended, fearing that at its next meeting it might arrest the work, or demand an explanation of this enormously increased expenditure, the Executive actually allowed the work to progress on credit to the amount of $65,000, and the laborers on the building, instead of receiving their pay regularly, were given checks or memoranda of the amount due them; and now, sir, we are called upon to vote money; and our sympathies are appealed to to pay the laborers. They shall be paid, sir; but I would demand to know by what authority of law was this work persevered in after the appropriation was expended? How dare the President and his coadjutors ANTICIPATE the action of Congress? How dare they usurp the power which legitimately belongs to the Representatives of the people? But, sir, my questions are answered by every day's experience. They dare do any thing. They dare violate all law; scoff at all precedent; commit any and every act, however unjustifiable and unlawful, and a drilled party majority will support and countenance their iniquities.

I could refer, also, to the Treasury building as another instance of the wasteful expenditure of public money. I could give repeated instances, in which money appropriated by Congress for one object has been transferred to another, without any authority of law; and when these exposures are made, the party acknowledge that investigation ought to be had, but that it is not convenient to make it at this particular time.

I will mention, Mr. Chairman, one other item of expenditure. Congress ordered a survey of the mouth of the Mississippi, and made an appropriation for improving the channel at the Balize. And how do you suppose, sir, that the money has been expended? One steamboat, one dredgeboat, and four schooners have been built or purchased, and fitted up in the most tasteful style. I find, sir, that there is charged for furniture in one of them, a mahogany sideboard, two splendid card tables, merino curtains, fine cane seated settees, and other furniture to suit, eight patent lever watches, one chronometer, costing $280, silver ware, and numerous other articles of the same description. All this, sir, is for common mudboats. And after expending two hundred and ninety-one thousand dollars, the work is abandoned; and the mouth of the river is now in a worse condition than before the work was commenced. This, sir, is the expenditure at the mouth of the river. I know not how many snagboats and mudboats have been employed on Red river or other rivers, or whether they are fitted out in the same style. But I do know, that when we ask a small appropriation on the Cumberland road, we are told by the Administration that there is no money in the Treasury; and that they are disposed to think that work unconstitutional.

There is another title, Mr. Chairman, under which the money of the people is squandered, if not actually purloined. It is under the head of "contingencies;" and the bill now before us gives a small specimen of the amount thus charged. In it alone, there is appropriated, under the title of contingencies, one hundred and twenty-seven thousand two hundred and thirty-five dollars, besides sixty-seven thousand dollars for miscellaneous, making together one hundred and ninety-four thousand two hundred and thirty-five dollars. And when, sir, we ask how this large sum is expended, we are told that it is quite impossible now to give a detailed statement; but that, no doubt, it will be honestly accounted for. And if any of us insist on receiving the information, we are accused of wasting the time of the House, and of being altogether too inquisitive. Next year, sir, we shall have these sums accounted for in a bill for washing towels, horse hire, &c.

But, sir, it strikes me that gentlemen, in their zeal to defend the Administration, in more than one instance forget that "there is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous." They talk quite feelingly indignant of the unfairness shown to the Administration in this matter of expenditure, and call it "crying injustice," and say that a large item is the three per cent. fund paid to the States. Now, sir, this is rather an amusing defence. Has not the three per cent. fund been paid to the States under every Administration? Is it not paid only in proportion to the amount of sales of the public lands within the different States? Is it not guarantied to the States by the compact under which they became members of the Union? And have they not received it from the first day of their admission as States? Really, Mr. Chairman, these apologies are rather too shallow to deserve serious notice. But, sir, after all, the friends of the Administration are somewhat excusable for these attempts at subterfuge and evasion. They are sorely pressed by many searching inquiries. The stern gaze of the people is at last directed to their action, and they are compelled to avail themselves of any and every excuse, no matter how pitiable and unsatisfactory.

Sir, (said Mr. P.,) I have touched these different branches of expenditure but slightly; and I leave it with gentlemen better qualified to particularize abuses and unjustifiable expenditures. I will leave the subject by saying that, although the expenditures have increased nearly three-fold, I should not so loudly complain had the money been properly expended. But, sir, it has been wasted. Our fortifications were never in a worse condition. We have scarcely a ship of war fit for sea. When the frigate United States received some damage entering the port of New York, and was condemned as unseaworthy after an expenditure of some seventy thousand dollars, there was not a ship ready to receive her crew; and months passed before one could be fitted out to take the place of the condemned frigate. We have not a single steamship of war which deserves the name; I beg pardon, sir, I believe there is one—the "Poinsett"—they call her a steam-frigate; she is nothing but a miserable old scow. If I am rightly informed, she used to be employed somewhere about New York as a ferry-boat; was purchased at an enormous price by the Administration, fitted up, and has cost near one hundred thousand dollars. I am told that it took all hands (when serving in the Florida waters) two weeks to cut wood enough to run her three days. She is now lying at Norfolk, the perfect laughingstock of every sailor; but she is reported to Congress as a steam-frigate. Really, sir, it is a libel upon the name. In short, sir, the money voted by Congress within a few years past, for harbors, for light-houses, for breakwaters, for clearing out of rivers, has nearly all been wasted, foolishly thrown away, by the mismanagement and extravagance of the Administration. The searching question of the people is, "Where is our money?" The laconic answer is, Millions have been stolen; millions squandered; millions unaccounted for.

But the gentleman from Virginia, not content with glorifying the Administration, has thought it necessary to charge us with making unprovoked attacks upon the President and his friends, and, in a tone of triumph, has defied us to prove any act of malfeasance or misfeasance. Sir, I meet the challenge, and I will prove, from under the gentleman's own signature, charges made by him against the present Administration sufficient to blast the fair fame of any party. I shall refer, sir, to report No. 313 of House of Representatives, commonly called the report of the Investigating Committee on the defalcation of Swartwout and others. The gentleman from Virginia was a member of that committee, and although he did not sign the report with the majority, he made a special report to which he affixed his signature. I, sir, shall not at this time enter into an examination of the merits of the document. It is enough for me to know that the gentleman's name is signed to it. The following is the special report of the gentleman, and as he complains that it is unfair to give extracts, I will give it entire:

"Mr. Hopkins's special concurrence in the report of the committee, appended thereto by vote of the committee.

"I have not had the requisite time for scrutinizing the report of the committee with that care and attention which its length and importance deserve, and which I could have desired; and I should have preferred, for this reason, to have presented the journal of the committee, without comment, to the House of Representatives. But, as conflicting opinions prevail in the committee, and are to be submitted to the country in the shape of formal reports, I consider it my duty to say that I concur with the committee in all the conclusions at which they have arrived, so far as those conclusions apply to the extent and character of the defalcations of Samuel Swartwout and William M. Price.

"I should be faithless to my duty, and do violence to the most conscientious convictions of my judgment, if I did not also declare my entire concurrence in those conclusions of the committee which relate to the conduct of the late naval officer of the custom-house at New York; to the late and present Solicitor of the Treasury; to the Secretary and accounting officers of the Treasury Department, including the late Comptroller of that Department; and, in that part of the report which reviews the conduct of J. Hoyt, the present collector of the customs at the port of New York.

G. W. HOPKINS,
Member of the committee."

Now, Mr. Chairman, we find by this report that the gentleman concurs fully in the censure of the committee, passed upon the Secretary of the Treasury; and, that there may be no doubt on the subject, I will read what is said by the committee—page 98:

"The committee will forbear to recapitulate here the extraordinary submissiveness and want of energy that are betrayed by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his tolerance, without known complaint made to the Executive, of the retention and use of the public money collected by the present collector at New York for duties on imports against and under the protests of merchants."

Again, sir, upon the same page, the committee further say:

"It is believed to constitute an imbecility of administration on the part of the Secretary that calls for immediate correction, whether regard be had to the honor of the Government or to the security of the public money."

And further, sir, the report says:

"The negligence and failure of the Secretary of the Treasury to discharge his duty as the head of the Treasury Department, charged by law with the superintendence of the collection of the revenue, and his want of a correct appreciation of the beforenamed records in the superintendence of the collection of the public revenues, and the consequent neglect to continue and complete them, are justly regarded as a primary cause of the escape from detection, for so long a period, of the immense defalcations of the late collector at the port of New York."

Here, sir, is a direct assertion made by the gentleman himself, that the Secretary of the Treasury has manifested "extraordinary submissiveness" and "want of energy;" that he has been guilty of "imbecility of administration;" and that such conduct requires "immediate correction;" and further, sir, that the Secretary, by his "negligence and failure to discharge his duty," is directly responsible for the immense defalcation of Swartwout, amounting to one million and a quarter of dollars.

Sir, where is this "imbecile Secretary?" Has he been dismissed by the Executive? Has even an inquiry been made by this House into these grave charges preferred by the committee? No, sir! no! The same negligent, imbecile, criminal Secretary still presides over the Treasury Department. Instead of having been discarded, as the gentleman said he should be, he is the pampered pet of the Executive, and the gentleman from Virginia is now as loud in his praise as he was in his denunciation; and he has the assurance to lecture the Opposition for complaining of this gross outrage perpetrated on the character and honor of the Government which he himself assisted in exposing.

But, sir, the committee may check the expression of astonishment which at this time seems so sensibly to pervade it. I have but commenced with the gentleman's consistency.

On page 41 of the report I find the following charges made by the gentleman against the late naval officer of the custom-house, New York, (Enos T. Throop:)

"From the preceding testimony the committee report as established facts:

"1. That the late naval officer at the port of New York, throughout the term of his service, from 1829 to 1838, wholly disregarded the requirements of the law prescribing the duties of his office.

"2. That said naval officer, for the same period, wholly disregarded the instructions of the Comptroller of the Treasury, of November 10, 1821.

"3. That said naval officer, by so disregarding the requirements of law and the instructions of the Treasury Department, culpably neglected to keep the accounts and records appertaining to his office, and thereby rendered the office nugatory as a check upon the accounts of the collector.

"4. That if the duties of said naval officer, as authorized and directed by existing laws, had been executed with proper care and vigilance, they would have rendered it impracticable for any fraud or error in any of the accounts of the collector of said port to escape immediate detection.

"5. That the culpable disregard of the plain requirements of law and of Treasury instructions prescribing the duties of naval officers, by said naval officer, and his continued neglect of official duty, are a primary cause of the immense defalcations of the late collector at New York."

Here, sir, is a charge made against this officer by the gentleman from Virginia. Where, sir, is this same Enos T. Throop? Has he been dismissed from the service of the country? No, sir! This man, who was proved to be incompetent to act as "naval officer," instead of being immediately discharged, as he would have been by any honest Executive, has been sent as Chargé to Naples. Unfit to discharge the duty of a subordinate in a custom-house, he is fully qualified to serve as a minister of this great nation at a foreign court. And the gentleman from Virginia, who so recently demanded his dismissal, lauds the Executive, and vows that this is a most virtuous and pure Administration, and tauntingly sneers at us as a fault-finding Opposition.

Again, sir, on page 105, the Committee of Investigation, after citing repeated instances of neglect in the Solicitor of the Treasury to discharge his duty, report:

"1st. That William M. Price, as district attorney, is a defaulter to the Government in a large amount.

"2d. That his defalcations are attributable to the notorious irresponsibility and want of character of said Price at the periods of his appointment and reappointment, and during his entire terms of office; and to the continued neglect of the proper and efficient discharge of duties at the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury, by the late and present incumbents of that office."

Again, I ask the gentleman from Virginia has this officer been dismissed from the service of the State? Has the Executive discharged that duty, which the gentleman deemed so imperative when he signed his report? No, sir. This man who neglected his duty, violated his oath of office, and permitted an immense defalcation, has been sent as Chargé d'Affaires to Belgium! Neglect of duty is now the sure road to preferment. Let a man manifest palpable incompetency as Solicitor of the Treasury, and he is immediately made a foreign minister. I, sir, will not attempt to express my astonishment at the course pursued by the gentleman from Virginia. He proves that Mr. Van Buren has violated every trust reposed in him by the people, not only by continuing unfaithful men in office, but by promoting them for their misconduct. He then, most unexpectedly, becomes his champion and eulogist, and petulantly complains that we are over nice in our demands for correct Government.

Page 140, the gentleman is loud in his denunciations of Mr. Hoyt, collector at New York; thinks his conduct unjustifiable; and yet, sir, Mr. Hoyt is still collector; and the gentleman now preaches to us passive obedience. Page 70, we find the committee saying that,

"From the preceding evidence the committee report the following fact as established:

"That the late Comptroller of the Treasury, George Wolf, Esq., now collector of the port of Philadelphia, was guilty, while in said office of Comptroller, of culpable disregard of law and neglect of duty, both in regard to the bonds of collectors filed in his office, and the records thereof required by law; and in settling and certifying to the register the accounts of Samuel Swartwout, late collector, without having transmitted to him the vouchers therefore required by positive injunction of law."

I will tread lightly here, sir. This officer is now no more. But, sir, after this downright charge of "culpable disregard of law," made by the gentleman from Virginia, this officer, who had neglected his duty and violated all law, was appointed collector of customs at Philadelphia. Unfit to be Comptroller, he was fully qualified to superintend some hundreds of officers, and to receive millions of the public money annually.

Page 41. The First Auditor is denounced as negligent and incompetent. Yet now, not a word of complaint from the gentleman from Virginia; and all this "criminal neglect and official negligence," which in 1839 appeared to the gentleman so unjustifiable, so monstrous, is, in 1840, quite innocent, very excusable, and entirely unworthy of serious consideration. This is, indeed, a change of opinion. Last year, to denounce the Administration, sub-Treasury and all; this year, to support it warmly, and its darling sub-Treasury too. I know, sir, that with some politicians it becomes necessary to alter their opinions; and this change of the gentleman recalls to my recollection a passage I once read in one of Bulwer's works, in which the politic courtier finds it necessary to change his opinions in order to keep pace with the shifting policy of the Court.

"'Well! I have decided on my change of life,' said the lawyer, with a slight sigh.

"'So have I on my change of opinion,' chimed in the Earl. 'I will tell you what opinions seem to me like'—

"'What?' said Brandon.

"'Trees!' answered Mauleverer, quaintly. 'If they can be made serviceable by standing, don't part with a stick; but when they are of that growth that sells well, or whenever they shut out a fine prospect, cut them down and pack them off by all manner of means.'"

I, Mr. Chairman, shall not inquire as to the causes which led the gentleman from Virginia to this sudden, startling, and mysterious change in his political opinions. I am not even inquisitive or interested enough to inquire whether his former opinions shut out a fine prospect. It is sufficient for me to know that he has cut them all down. The reason is with himself. But, sir, he will excuse me when I say that I think it in bad taste for him to criticise too narrowly the ground we tread, when he so recently taught us that it was our duty to walk it fearlessly, as being the path of rectitude and honor. When the gentleman shall favor us with a clew to the labyrinth, the mazes of which he is threading, and shall give us something like convincing proof that he pursues its tortuous windings, not from personal aggrandizement or ambitious aspirations, then, sir, we may again, with indulgent eye, look upon his course. Until then, sir, the gentleman must excuse us if we look suspiciously on his advice, and distrustingly upon the position he has assumed. I will, Mr. Chairman, give one other extract from the report of the committee of which the gentleman was a zealous member, and then leave it to the gentleman to reconcile the opinions then expressed with his present course.

"But the important results which have been attained, notwithstanding the disadvantages adverted to, cannot fail to inspire the country with a confident hope that the high obligation which will rest upon the successors of the present Congress in the legislative councils of the nation, to resume and complete the great work of investigation and reform of the alarming condition and abuses of the Executive Departments of the Government, from the highest to the lowest, and from the nearest to the remotest functionaries, will secure the prompt and efficient attention which its magnitude demands.

"Guided solely by the character of the developments which the investigation imposed upon them by the House has elicited, the committee cannot resist the conviction, that at no period in the history of the Federal Government has there been deeper or better founded cause than exists at the present moment for every patriot heart to desire a prompt consummation of that signal 'task of reform' which public sentiment, many years since, inscribed on the list of Executive duties in characters too legible to be overlooked, requiring, 'particularly, the correction of those abuses that have brought the patronage of the Federal Government into conflict with the freedom of elections, and the counteraction of those causes which have disturbed the rightful course of appointment, and have placed or continued power in UNFAITHFUL OR INCOMPETENT HANDS.'"

We here read of the OBLIGATION which rests upon this Congress "to resume and complete the great work of investigation, reform of the alarming condition and abuses of the Executive Departments of the Government," and yet, sir, the gentleman has not only neglected to "resume and complete" the work he commenced, but has joined the party which permitted and countenanced these abuses, and now refuses to grant investigation. We also read, "that at no period in the history of the Federal Government" has there existed so much necessity for every patriot heart to rally to the rescue of the country; and yet, sir, the gentleman, instead of fighting under our glorious and bright banner of reform, has rallied under the black piratical flag of Van Burenism. Sir, said Mr. PROFFIT, I take no pleasure in criticising the course of any gentleman; I know the fallibility of human nature. I regret being compelled to show to my fellow-citizens the corruptions of their Government. I regret that this corruption exists. I am sorry that the necessity is forced upon me to take any thing like a prominent position in denouncing the conduct of the Administration. I know that a faithful discharge of duty will draw down the execrations and base calumnies of the Administration presses—our motives will be impugned; public course misrepresented; private character assailed; "life's life lied away." But, sir, I, for one, will pursue my course with the same defying spirit which animated the poet when he exclaimed—

> "As little as the moon stops for the baying
> Of wolves, will the bright muse withdraw one ray
> From out her skies. Then howl your idle wrath!
> While she still silvers o'er your gloomy path."

[Mr. PROFFIT then proceeded to defend General Harrison from the charges and insinuations made against him by Mr. HOPKINS, both in his speech and in his letter to Colonel Piper. Mr. P. read extracts from the speeches of General Harrison when in Congress, from his published letters. He referred to his votes to disprove the statements of Mr. HOPKINS. This part of Mr. P.'s speech will be published at some future day.]

BANKS OF THE DISTRICT.

REMARKS OF MR. BUCHANAN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA.

In Senate, July 16, 1840—In favor of the passage of the bill "to continue the corporate existence of certain banks in the District of Columbia."

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had hoped yesterday that he should not feel himself obliged again to address the Senate in relation to these District banks. He would not now utter one word upon the subject if it were not palpable that this bill to continue the corporate existence of these banks, after having yesterday been engrossed by a triumphant majority, was destined to-day to be defeated on its final passage. This was to be accomplished by a union of the two extremes. The enemies of a speedy resumption of specie payments would combine in their votes with the friends of an exclusive hard money currency; and we, who are in favor of moderate measures, must certainly be in the minority.

For my own part, said Mr. B. I never considered this as a question involving any great general principles. I was, therefore, entirely willing, as my votes will show, to continue the existence of these banks for a short period, and until we could establish a new bank or banks for the District upon any reasonable terms. Senators have, I think unjustly, treated this question as if it were a proposition to extend these charters during a considerable period of time, when it is nothing more than a mere temporary measure, justified by the existing peculiar circumstances of the District. These banks, as banking institutions, are already dead. Their charters all expired on the 4th day of July; and Congress have already passed a law providing for the manner in which they shall wind up their affairs.

Now, sir, what is the bill before us? We propose to continue their banking privileges until the 4th July, 1841, and no longer;—immediately, in favor of those which have already commenced the payment of specie, and at any time within sixty days, in favor of the remainder of them, if they shall resume within that period. These banks, under the present bill, can entertain no hope that their charters will ever again be extended. The present Congress will expire on the 4th day of March next, and their banking privileges will expire on the 4th day of July following, when Congress will not be in session. This will be the last limit of their existence; and from and after that day they must commence winding up their affairs under the act which we have already passed.

In addition to this, the bill restricts them during this short period, from paying out any notes except their own; renders the president, directors, and stockholders, liable to the amount of their stock for debts hereafter contracted; and prohibits them from declaring any dividend whilst in a state of suspension, should that again occur before the 4th day of July next.

Under all these restrictions, I confess I cannot feel the force of any argument against this bill, founded upon the principle that these terms are too favorable to the banks. I can never refuse to vote in favor of this measure on any such principle.

As a practical man, I can have no difficulty in giving this bill my support. We are now legislating for a small district of ten miles square, carved out of Maryland on the one side and Virginia on the other; and what is unfortunate, the charters of all its six banks have expired on the same day. In what situation am I then placed? I know nothing of these banks; care nothing for them, except the general good will which I bear to the people with whom I have been long associated; and shall certainly never receive a favor from any one of them. I believe, from the report of the committee in 1836, that some of them have behaved badly. But, after all, I must be governed in my vote by the peculiar circumstances of the case. Alexandria is a city which exports largely, and where the farmers of the valley of Virginia send their produce to market. Georgetown is in a similar situation. As to the city of Washington, I confess I can see no reason why it should have a large banking capital. But here we are, acting as the local Legislature of this small District; and is it right at once to deprive these people of all banking privileges? I think not; and I shall most cheerfully extend these privileges to the existing banks one year longer. Now let us suppose that the State of Maryland, or the State of New York, or any other State, were placed in a similar situation. Suppose it had so occurred that every bank charter in any State had expired at the same moment. Would the Legislature of such a State (no matter how hostile it might be to the banking system generally) determine that all these banks should at once be compelled to wind up their affairs, no matter how prejudicial it might be to the community? Even those who are hostile to all banks, which I am not, ought to adopt no sudden and violent course which might produce disastrous consequences to the people, in accomplishing their object. Two years ago I was not in favor of extending these charters. I should at that time have greatly preferred the establishment of a new bank; but as this was then deemed impracticable, on account of the suspension of specie payments, I yielded to the necessity of the case, and voted for the bill of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] because I regarded it as the less of two evils. It is now admitted by all, that during the short remainder of the present session, we cannot establish new banks, and I am willing to adopt a similar course for the very same reason by which I was actuated on that occasion. I am not prepared to say to the merchants of Alexandria and Georgetown, who have been in the habit of purchasing flour, corn, and tobacco, from the surrounding country, we will cut you off at once from bank accommodations, and you shall not have your usual loans for making these purchases. Now, if I could have regulated this matter for myself, without the interference of the banks, I should have extended these charters for a year; and without sanctioning the suspension of specie payments, I should have prohibited them, whilst in a state of suspension, from paying out any except their own notes, and from making dividends; and I should have afforded to every note holder, who desired to recover specie, with the twelve per cent. interest to which they are subject, the most prompt and efficacious remedy to enforce his claim. Whilst I should have been willing to adopt this course, I could never have voted for the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] sanctioning their suspension of specie payments for so long a period as until the 15th January next, or until the banks of Baltimore and Richmond might think proper to resume. But the District banks have made the law for themselves. Several of them have declared both their ability and their willingness to resume specie payments immediately; nay, some of them have actually resumed; and thus, by their own conduct, they have prevented me from voting for any extension of their charters except upon the express condition that they shall be specie paying banks. When they themselves say they are ready and willing to resume, how can any person expect me to answer: "You are neither ready nor willing, and you must have time for this purpose." I am forced to take them at their word; and never shall incur the responsibility of advocating a protracted suspension of specie payments against the solemn declaration of the banks themselves.

I am, therefore, prepared to extend these charters for one year; not to benefit the banks, but for the purpose of placing the people of this District, so far as I can, on an equal footing with the people of Virginia and Maryland, by whom they are surrounded.

If you should not pass this bill, I shall venture to predict that in less than a fortnight bank agencies will be established in this District by suspended banks in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Richmond, and you will thus be instrumental in establishing a much greater evil than that which you are now desirous of preventing.

I have witnessed in the course of my legislative career some strange things; but I confess I have never been more astonished in my life than at the course this bill has taken. It will be defeated by a most marvellous union of hostile elements. Those who, with my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,], are friendly to an exclusive metallic currency, will vote against it; and those who, I might say, are in favor of an irredeemable paper currency, will also vote against it; and therefore it must be rejected.

And why should any Senator who is not opposed to all banks in all forms, vote against this bill? It contains no compulsory feature, but leaves the banks entirely free to exercise their own discretion whether they will accept its terms or not, and allows them sixty days to make this decision. If they should not accept the terms proposed by the bill, they will then remain in precisely the same condition they are at present.

That all the banks in this District, with a single exception, will accept these terms, I entertain not a doubt; but whether or not, I think we should pass the bill, and impose the responsibility of rejecting it upon them, instead of assuming it ourselves. I was called out of my seat yesterday by a gentleman who stated to me that the banks, or a majority of them, were not only willing, but anxious to accept the present bill, and desired me to state this fact to the Senate. I informed him that I should make no such statement founded merely on a private conversation; that the terms of this conversation might be misapprehended by either of us at the present time, or might be forgotten at a future day; and it was, therefore, always dangerous to rely upon verbal communications upon important subjects: that if the banks really desired that this bill should pass, and their wishes were made known to me in a written official form, it would afford me great pleasure to make them known to the Senate. This gentleman then left me, and in a short time returned and placed in my hands the written declaration of three of the presidents of these banks, which I shall now read. These declarations have been written at the end of a printed copy of the bill itself, and are as follows:

The above bill is certainly better than none. Some of the provisions are very harsh. I prefer this, however, to having no bill.

W. A. BRADLEY,
President Patriotic Bank.

I concur in the above, preferring that the third section should be stricken out, as unjust and injurious to stockholders. We at this institution would decidedly prefer this bill to having none. Bank of the Metropolis, 15th July, 1840.

JOHN P. VAN NESS, President.

I concur in the view of the bill, as stated by Gen. Van Ness.

J. KURTZ,
President Farmers and Mechanics Bank of Georgetown.
Georgetown, July 15, 1840.

In addition to these declarations, a letter from General Van Ness was handed to me this morning by a gentleman with whom I am not acquainted, which I shall also read. Here Mr. B. read the following letter:

WASHINGTON, July 16, 1840.

The Hon. JAMES BUCHANAN:

DEAR SIR: Five of the presidents of the banks of this District met this morning. Three of them agreed according to the enclosed paper, signed by them. The other two expressly pledged themselves not to oppose or object to the passage of the bill; and if it could be so amended as to strike out the third section, it would then be satisfactory to them also.

With high consideration,

Your most obedient servant,

JOHN P. VAN NESS,
President of Bank of Metropolis.

A duplicate of the above, and of the within, have been sent to Mr. Merrick.

The paper to which General Van Ness refers, is one similar in its character to those which I have already read from the three presidents of the banks; and therefore I shall not trouble the Senate by reading it.

Now, sir, the responsibility of accepting or rejecting the present bill, is to be removed from the banks. They are not to be permitted to decide this question for themselves; and for what reason? The Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] has declared that he will not permit these banks to commence the payment of specie, because this would prove oppressive to the people of the District, and "I will not," says he, "go for it, even if the banks want it." I quote the very words of the Senator.

[Mr. MERRICK here explained; but the Reporter has taken no note of the explanation, and cannot furnish it from memory.]

Mr. B. resumed. I understood the Senator perfectly; and shall in a few moments speak of the points to which he refers. But the facts are these, and I wish that the attention of the Senate and the country may be fixed upon them. There are three of these banks willing to accept the bill as it now stands; and two of the others, which have voluntarily pledged themselves not to oppose or object to its passage, and have declared, that if the third section could be stricken out, it would then be satisfactory to them also; and, notwithstanding, the Senator says: "I will not go for it, even although the banks want it." I surely state his proposition fairly.

We have now reached a new point in this war of the money power against the people. Hitherto, unfortunately, my controversy has been with those of my own political friends, such as the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] who are exclusive hard money men; but the question now distinctly presented, and which no human ingenuity can change, is between the advocates of a redeemable and the advocates of an irredeemable bank currency. This is the question, and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] cannot escape from it. On this subject he is so extravagant that he refuses even to permit the banks to judge for themselves whether they are now able, or shall be able within sixty days, to resume specie payments. It is the terrific idea of bank resumption, under this bill, which has so alarmed the Senator, that he opposes it, whether the banks themselves are willing to resume or not. He will not consent to place this question at their own disposal.

We have truly reached a new crisis in this important contest. In every case heretofore, the banks have always urged an extension of the time for resumption, and have always declared their inability to resume at an earlier period than they themselves had indicated; and, unfortunately, the State Legislatures have generally yielded to such suggestions. This is the first instance in the history of the country where the banks have been willing to accept an extension of their charters upon the condition of immediate resumption, and the legislative body has interposed its veto to prevent the banks from redeeming their obligations in gold and silver. We say to them, in effect, "You are too reckless in regard to your own interest and that of the community, in undertaking to pay your honest debts, and it is necessary that we should repress your ardor. Such a course would prove so injurious to the people of the District, that we shall compel you at once to wind up your affairs altogether, rather than grant you an extension of your banking privileges on any such terms."

Suppose this question could be transferred to the Legislature of Maryland, what do you suppose would be the result? One half of the banks in Baltimore, and throughout that State, come forward and offer to accept an extension of their charters, on the express condition of immediate resumption. They say, we are both able and willing to pay specie. Would any State Legislature in the Union, under such circumstances, say to them, you must not adopt this destructive measure? Although we desire to extend your charters, yet it is better that you should be destroyed altogether, as banking institutions, than to grant you the dangerous permission to resume specie payments whilst the surrounding States, and one half of the banks in this State, still continue suspended. Should you pay your debts in gold and silver, as the Constitution and the laws require you to do, you will entail misery and distress both upon yourselves and the people. Are not the two cases precisely parallel? The distinguished honor has been reserved for Congress of refusing to the banks the permission which they ask to resume specie payments.

I had always supposed that one of the greatest calamities which could be inflicted upon the people of any country, was that of being cursed with floods of irredeemable paper, banishing gold and silver altogether from circulation. This has never been justified by statesmen or politicians, except on the ground of absolute, uncontrollable, irresistible necessity. But here no such necessity exists, because three of these banks have not only already resumed the payment of specie, but have declared to the world their willingness and their ability to continue to redeem their notes in gold and silver; and it is evident that the two banks in Alexandria will resume before the end of sixty days, should the present bill pass.

What is the true cause of this extraordinary proceeding? I think there will not be much difficulty in conjecturing. It is an attempt (and I mean neither to charge nor insinuate any thing improper against the Senator from Maryland) to carry the principle into practice here which produced the present suspension of specie payments throughout a large portion of the Union. It is an attempt to play the game over again upon a small scale, which was played upon a large scale in favor of the Bank of the United States. In order to save that Bank from immediate bankruptcy and ruin, the people of this country have been compelled to submit to a suspension of specie payments ever since October. The strong banks voluntarily reduced themselves to the same level with the Bank of the United States; and they suspended simply because that Bank could no longer continue to pay specie.

At the commencement of the suspension under which we are now suffering, there was no foreign demand for gold and silver. The rates of foreign exchange were not against us. There was no drain of specie from this country to Europe. Every thing in the State of Pennsylvania was calm as a summer's morning; and the suspension surprised us as much as a clap of thunder from a cloudless sky.

At the meeting of the banks in Philadelphia, nine voted against the suspension, whilst five only, including the Bank of the United States, voted in its favor. In the face of this vote, that Bank suspended on the next morning, and in order to save it from immediate ruin, all the other banks followed its example, and were willing to share its fate.

The Bank of the United States, instead of preparing for a speedy resumption, by contracting its issues, took advantage of the suspension, for the purpose of expanding them. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] has informed us that it sent its agents throughout the West loaded with its irredeemable notes, for the purpose of capturing the specie with them. Such was its miserable condition, that it was compelled to obtain specie in this manner to send abroad for the purpose of paying its foreign debts. The notes of this Bank became the chief medium of circulation in Philadelphia and throughout many portions of the country. The other Philadelphia banks, after having suspended to save it from bankruptcy, could not discredit its notes by refusing to receive them on deposite, and in payment of debts. In this manner it soon became so largely indebted to them, that, although they were not under the necessity of suspending specie payments at the first, they were soon reduced to such a condition that they could not have resumed had this been their desire. The Bank of the United States, by the process which I have just described, had reduced them to its own level, and placed them in such a situation that they could not resume until it should be able to pay the balances which it owed them in specie. Thus the country suffered and the bank was saved.

Now how does this statement of facts apply to the present case? There is but one bank in this District which is opposed to the passage of the present bill; and I do not intend to make any insinuation against its eventual solvency. Far from it. It has expanded its issues to such an extent that, unlike the other five banks of the District, it is unable at the present time to resume the payment of its liabilities in specie. I cannot ascertain to what extent it has expanded, because we have no recent return of its condition before us; but so far as my information and observation have extended, its notes constitute a very large portion of the circulation in this District. In that respect it bears a close resemblance to the Bank of the United States in Philadelphia. In my opinion, it is to save the character and credit of the Bank of Washington that the other banks will be refused the power of accepting a charter on the condition of resumption; just as it was to save the Bank of the United States from immediate bankruptcy that the other banks of Philadelphia consented to combine with it in suspending specie payments. The interest of the country was disregarded in order that this Bank might be preserved.

It is this spirit of combination among the banks which is one of the worst evils of our present very imperfect banking system. The object of these combinations is never to elevate the weak banks to the level of the strong, but always to reduce the strong to the level of the weak. This evil can only be corrected by an instantaneous, absolute, and irreversible forfeiture of the charter of any and every bank which shall hereafter suspend specie payments; and by placing them at once in the hands of commissioners for the purpose of winding up their affairs. The instinct of self-preservation will then counteract this spirit of combination, and prevent the strong banks from suspending specie payments in order to accommodate the weak. The other advantages which would follow the adoption of such a provision, I shall not now undertake to enumerate.

Congress have now presented to them, by a strange concurrence of circumstances, a most favorable opportunity of expressing their opinion emphatically upon the subject of these combinations. By passing this bill, we can now offer to all these banks an extension of their charters, upon condition that they shall resume specie payments at any time within sixty days. Three of them certainly, and two of them probably, will accept these terms. Ought we, then, to be deterred from granting this charter by an apprehension that the Bank of Washington may not be able to comply with its terms? I hope it may be; but if it should not, it would be flagrant injustice to punish those banks which have conducted their business wisely and prudently, by refusing to grant them a charter, simply because one other bank has placed it out of its own power to embrace the provisions of the bill. Thus, to save the Bank of Washington, the people of this District will be doomed to a protracted suspension of specie payments, just as the people of the Middle, Southern, and Western States have been doomed to suffer the evils of suspension, to save the Bank of the United States from destruction.

But the Senator from Maryland is not willing to trust the banks themselves with this dangerous prerogative of paying their debts to the community on demand, according to the term of their contracts. To permit the banks to resume would, he contends, compel them to oppress their debtors. Now let us examine this objection, and ascertain whether there is any force in it. And first, let us suppose that it should compel them, in some degree, to bear hard upon their debtors, (which I do not believe,) would this be a good reason for preventing these banks from redeeming their notes in specie? The banks exercise the sovereign power of issuing paper money; and this paper money is almost the only currency in use among the people. No man in any kind of business can refuse to receive it. It is forced upon him by the circumstances of the country; and he must accept it, whether he will or not. Besides, this privilege of issuing paper money is a source of great profit to the banks. Now if there be a conflict of interests between the noteholders and the debtors of these banks, which of these two classes is entitled to our most favorable regard? The noteholders are by far the most numerous. They have been compelled to receive these bank notes as money, in the course of their business. They derive no profit from the banks. The depreciation of the notes which they held at the time of suspension was a dead loss to them. On the other hand, the debtors of the banks have received accommodations from them, which have enabled them to do a profitable business, or to embark in profitable speculations. Many of them are stockholders in these very banks. Under such circumstances, I would go for the community who hold the bank notes rather than for the men who have received bank favors. I should compel the banks to redeem the currency which they have put in circulation, even if it should force them to exercise some degree of severity in the collection of their debts.

But I emphatically say that the resumption of specie payments, under the provisions of this bill, would not compel the banks who are willing to accept its terms, to oppress their debtors.

And, in the first place, all the deposites which they have received in any bank paper except their own, since the date of the suspension, have been accepted by them under a special agreement that these deposites should be paid in similar bank paper. The present bill recognises this agreement; and thus the whole amount which they have received on deposite in irredeemable paper is at once wiped away, without the payment of a single dollar in gold or silver. Thus their whole deposites—and these are generally the heaviest item of bank liabilities—will give them no trouble. They will not be compelled to oppress their debtors for the purpose of paying their depositors.

Then, in regard to their bank notes now in circulation. These banks have already enjoyed the benefit of a nine months' suspension. Some of them have been curtailing their issues, and contracting their business, and thus preparing for resumption. Three of them, at least, can pay specie for all their notes in circulation, even should the whole amount be demanded, which is not probable, and have a large surplus of gold and silver left on which to transact business. The most which can be said is, that they may not probably be able to grant many new accommodations to the public. Most certainly they will not be compelled to oppress their debtors for the purpose of raising specie to pay their noteholders. Besides, when we consider those debtors are in a great degree their own directors and stockholders, we need not fear that they will be oppressed without necessity.

But let me ask the Senator another question. Will there be any run made upon these banks by their noteholders after they shall have resumed specie payments? Does not every person perceive that the moment these notes are raised to the specie standard, and public confidence in the ability of the banks to redeem them is restored, all brokerage upon them will cease? Who buys the notes of the specie paying banks of New York? Make bank notes equivalent to specie in the public estimation, and the noteholder, unless for purposes of change, will never ask gold and silver from the banks. After he has tested their ability and willingness to pay, and has loaded himself with the silver received in exchange for the notes, he will be very glad to take the weight from his back, and re-exchange it for these very bank notes. This feeling is strongly illustrated by an anecdote which I heard from an officer of one of these banks. He told me that, since they had resumed, an individual had entered the bank and demanded specie for several hundred dollars of their notes. These notes were promptly redeemed in silver. The man was thus satisfied that the notes were as good as the specie, and before he left the bank, he voluntarily returned the silver, and asked and received in exchange for it the very notes which he had brought to the bank.

There will, therefore, be no conflict of interest whatever between the debtors of such banks as shall accept the provisions of this bill, and of the community which requires a speedy resumption of specie payments.

But the Senator from Maryland says that it would be a great hardship on these banks to be prohibited from paying out the irredeemable notes of other banks. But does not the Senator perceive that if they were permitted to do this, their resumption of specie payments would be no more than a mere empty name? If they could transact all their business with the notes of non-specie paying banks, they would withdraw their own notes entirely from circulation, and leave the people of the District in a worse position than they already occupy. This would be merely a substitution of foreign irredeemable bank paper for the present paper currency of the District banks. If there must be an irredeemable currency in circulation, it is better, far better, that it should consist of the notes of these banks, with which the people are familiar, and in which they have confidence, than of foreign paper. Again, if any noteholder desires to exercise the right of compelling the banks of the District to pay specie for their notes, together with the twelve per cent. interest to which they are liable, he can do this at home; but if he holds a foreign note, the expense and trouble of a lawsuit with a distant bank will always prevent him from thus enforcing his rights. One of the greatest evils attending the present suspension of specie payments is, that the banks generally, as a matter of policy, pay out the notes of foreign banks instead of their own; and thus bank notes are made to circulate every where more extensively than at home.

But although this bill prevents the banks from paying out any notes except their own and the notes of other specie paying banks, it does not prohibit them from receiving the notes of suspended banks in the payments of debts. This, in justice, they ought to do, whenever these notes are offered in payment of loans which were made in irredeemable paper; and this, in most instances, they would be glad to do whenever notes of the solvent banks of Baltimore or Richmond are offered in payment of individual debts. But I am asked, what use could the banks make of these notes, unless they were permitted to pay them out at their counters? I answer, they can send them home to Baltimore or Richmond, deposite the amount to their credit, and draw drafts upon it in payment of the debts which they may now owe to foreign banks in a state of suspension. If there be still a balance in their favor, they can demand interest for it; and if they do not think proper to enforce payment at present, they will receive both the principal and the interest upon the general resumption of specie payments. The District banks can, I have no doubt, get along very well for themselves under this bill, whilst they will greatly benefit the community.

But the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON] says, we might as well attempt to incorporate the paupers of the District on the condition that they should pay specie, as to pass the present bill. As well attempt to incorporate the paupers as these banks, who are now able to redeem their outstanding notes, and have a considerable surplus left in gold and silver! This is a wonderful proposition.

But he is also opposed to the bill because he believes that these banks will again suspend specie payments within the year during which we propose to prolong their existence, and in that event he thinks it wrong to deprive them of the power, as this bill does, of declaring dividends. But is it unjust to deprive banks of the power of dividing profits among their stockholders whilst they refuse to pay their honest debts? No, sir: no. Under such circumstances they ought to be compelled to husband all their resources in order to bring about the most speedy resumption. They ought first to be just towards their creditors before they are permitted to be generous towards themselves. The stockholders, who receive all the profits of banking, ought to suffer rather than those to whom they honestly owe money. The bare statement of the proposition is a sufficient answer to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Now in regard to the great stumbling block which appears to stand in the way of the two banks in Alexandria, and prevents them from yielding their cordial assent to the provisions of this bill—what is it? The third section of the bill renders the stockholders of all these banks individually responsible, to the amount of their stock, for debts hereafter contracted during the period they may remain stockholders. This, I am informed, is already the law of South Carolina. It ought to be the law every where: and although I care nothing for this provision in the present bill, which is a mere temporary measure to endure but for a single year, yet in my own State, with my consent, no new bank shall ever be incorporated without a similar provision. What, sir, shall the stockholders, who have enjoyed all the privileges and profits of prosperous banking, be permitted to say to the poor man who has been compelled to take their notes, our bank has been so badly managed that it has now become insolvent, and we shall keep all we have got, whilst you shall receive nothing? This individual responsibility of the stockholders to the noteholders is one of the essential reforms required in our banking system. Its effect would in the end prove as beneficial to the banks themselves as to the community. If the stockholders were responsible, you would probably never witness another suspension of specie payments. It is they who elect the directors, and if responsible individually for the notes issued, they would take care that the bank should be conducted in such a prudent manner as to keep themselves out of danger. Self-interest would thus be interposed to secure the public. But what is the case now? Every thing is conducted at hap-hazard. The stockholder knows that he can never be made individually liable for the payment of the notes issued by the bank. He is therefore satisfied if he can get his eight or ten per cent. per annum in dividends, with an occasional contingent dividend of fifteen or twenty per cent. and he pays no attention to the management of the institution. But let self-interest bring the question home to his own bosom, and he will be vigilant and cautious, and his whole conduct will be changed. Most certainly if a loss is to be incurred, it ought to fall upon those who have a direct control over the management of the bank and receive all its profits, rather than upon the innocent individual wholly disconnected from it, who has taken its notes in the course of his honest business.

I might remark, in regard to this provision of the bill, that in practice it would prove to be mere brutum fulmen, with which the banks of Alexandria ought not to be terrified. It is only the declaration of a general principle which can never be carried into execution without minute and carefully guarded legislation, in which the present bill is singularly defective. If this bill were not merely intended to subserve a temporary purpose, it ought never to pass without many amendments. It not only omits essential provisions which ought to be inserted in any new bank charter, but the salutary principles which it asserts can never be carried into effective execution under its present provisions. The late hour of the session, and the hasty manner in which it has been got up, and the very short period during which it will exist, must be the justification for its imperfections. It is certainly the only bill which can now pass; and although I have manifested my willingness to accord to the banks more liberal terms, I have no doubt that every bank in the District, with perhaps a single exception, will gladly embrace its provisions, before the end of sixty days. Why should we refuse them the option?

I need not now reiterate what I have over and over again repeated on this floor, at successive sessions, ever since the question first arose, that I am opposed to an exclusive metallic currency, and that I support the reform and not the destruction of the banks. I desire to restrict them in such a manner as to convert them into useful agents of the people, instead of destroying them by their successive expansions, and contractions, and suspensions. I cherish the hope that, ere long, the State of Pennsylvania, which owes much to her sister States for the mischief she has done them by rechartering the Bank of the United States, will set an example worthy of their imitation, by controlling and reforming her banks in such a manner as to make them blessings, instead of evils, to the whole country.

SPEECH OF MR. SMITH, OF INDIANA.

In Senate, February 12, 1840—On the Report and Resolutions relative to the assumption of State Debts.

MR. SMITH said: On the 3d day of March, 1829, Mr. President, the Administration immediately preceding the last terminated its legal and political existence. On the next day, in the presence of many of us, and of the assembled multitude, on the east portico of the Capitol, President Jackson delivered his inaugural address, and took upon himself the administration of public affairs. In that address will be found this language: "As long as our Government is administered for the good of the people, and is regulated by their will; as long as it secures to us the rights of person and property, liberty of conscience and of the press, it is worth defending." Political truths worthy of all acceptation, and should be remembered by every American citizen. They breathe the spirit of our institutions, of freedom, of liberty, and the rights of the people, to every word of which Mr. S. heartily gave his assent. At the meeting of the next session of Congress, in the winter of 1829, after President Jackson had had the season to cast his vigilant eye over the country, to examine the operations of the policy that had preceded his administration since the foundation of the Government, and to ascertain the condition of the country in its various interests, in his annual Message he says:

"The public prosperity is evinced in the increasing revenue arising from the sales of the public lands, and in the steady maintenance of that produced by imposts and tonnage, notwithstanding the additional duties imposed by the act of 19th May, 1828, and the unusual importations in the early part of that year."

This was the first official recognition, on the part of the President, of the prosperity of that country which he had received at the surrender of the previous Administration. It was made at a time when he could look over the whole ground, and after he had had full time to become well acquainted with the matter. Previous to this period, it will be remembered that the whole policy of the Government had passed in review before the party that had just come into power; and what of evil and what of good that had transpired in the policy of the Government from its foundation was before the new Administration, of which President Jackson was the chief, and the only responsible exponent of its views. Nor can it be presumed that he would, under the circumstances, have conceded to his predecessors and their policy the merit of having left the nation in a state of "public prosperity," unless such had been the fact.

Mr. S. said he would rapidly glance over the policy of the nation previous to the administration of President Jackson; not for the purpose of entering into an argument to sustain or deny the correctness or incorrectness of the measures to which he should refer—all that ground of controversy had been fully explored and discussed again and again, and he should enter into no controversy about them now; they had passed and gone by. He did not propose to bring them back, except as facts that had transpired, and were known to all. This Government had, at a very early period, adopted a course of policy that recognised a currency composed of paper and metals, or what is denominated a mixed currency, used by the Administration as well as the people. The policy of sustaining national and individual credit was openly advocated and defended from the earliest period of our national existence, and was at all times recognised by all political parties. The fiscal operations of the nation were carried on in the same kind of currency, through the instrumentality of a National Bank, for about forty years of its existence, during all of which time, while those operations were progressing, not a dollar was ever lost to the Government through that fiscal agent; nor did it cost the Government one cent to collect and disburse her revenues in the different parts of the nation. On the contrary, she received a large bonus for that privilege, and the use of the deposites. The exchanges between the different parts of the country were maintained at from one-half to one per cent. The national debt was reduced to a small amount, which, under the operation of the sinking fund, was soon afterwards extinguished. The ordinary expenses incident to an administration in usual times were about thirteen millions of dollars. Works of internal improvement, of a national character, were sanctioned; harbors and rivers were cleared out, commerce protected, and the national arm of defence, both land and naval, was honored and encouraged; manufactories had sprung up, and, by moderate protection, had been enabled to start fair, to maintain a competition in our own markets with the foreign manufacturer; while the duties imposed operated in the character of protection, and, at the same time, afforded the means of raising a revenue to support the Government. The nation, under this policy, had marched, with strides unparalleled in the history of the world, towards its destined greatness. President Jackson could do no less than acknowledge all this when he received the charge of administering the Government from his immediate predecessor. It is true he spoke of some reform which he thought necessary; but, as to the general prosperity of the nation, he bore willing testimony. The banks were neither numerous, nor the paper money and specie combined too much in quantity for the business of the nation, in the opinion of any body. Thus stood the matter, as acknowledged by President Jackson himself; and none, surely, will refuse full credence to his statement.

The Government was administered by the late Administration for eight years. In some respects, the policy of the preceding Administration was materially changed; amongst which may be named the change in the financial policy. The Bank of the United States was broken down. The State bank system was resorted to; the vacuum created by the withdrawal of the United States Bank capital and currency was filled to order by the State banks. The destruction of the United States Bank, the withdrawal of the public deposites from that institution, the selection of the State banks as fiscal agents, and all the consequences resulting from this policy in the increase of the circulation, the high prices, the great sales of the public lands, the increase of the public revenue, the stimulus to commerce and speculative action, were justly attributed to that Administration and its policy. Whether for good or evil, politicians might, and honestly did, differ in regard to them. That was a controversial ground that it was not the purpose of Mr. S. to tread; his object was not to cast censure, but to state facts, and to give the credit of that policy and its consequences to the Administration that was justly entitled to it. He had his opinions of the policy, and he had freely stated them on other occasions; he would not repeat them now. The administration of President Jackson, with its fruits, will, for good or evil, form a prominent epoch in the history of the country. Whatever might be the opinion of others, it was not for the present Administration and its friends to condemn the preceding one. Mr. S. should rely upon the testimony which he was about to produce to the Senate, to prove that, at the time of the out-going of the late, and the in-coming of the present Administration, the country was in a high state of prosperity. And he should charge the present Administration with the receipt of a people in that prosperous state, and hold it responsible for the maintenance of that state of affairs.

On the 3d day of March, 1837, the administration of President Jackson ceased. The prominent part he had taken in changing some part of the policy of his predecessor, impressed his mind with the propriety of following the example of the Father of his country, and leaving for the benefit of the nation a farewell address, in which it must be supposed he breathed a spirit of truth and candor which an ordinary State paper might well imitate. It was his farewell address to his people, his dying political legacy, in which he would most certainly "nothing extenuate, nor set down aught in malice." It was to some short extracts from that memorable legacy Mr. S. desired to call the attention of the Senate. Mr. S. then read the extracts:

"My public life has been a long one, and I cannot hope that it has at all times been free from errors. But I have the consolation of knowing that if mistakes have been committed, they have not seriously injured the country I so anxiously endeavored to serve; and at the moment when I surrender my last public trust, I leave this great people prosperous and happy, in the full enjoyment of liberty, and honored and respected by every nation of the world."

"The progress of the United States, under our free and happy institutions, has surpassed the most sanguine hopes of the founders of the Republic. Our growth has been beyond all former example in numbers, in wealth, in knowledge, and all the useful arts which contribute to the comfort and convenience of man; and from the earliest history to the present day, there never have been thirteen millions of people associated in one political body who enjoyed so much freedom and happiness as the people of the United States."

Such, Mr. President, is the evidence furnished by the late President Jackson of the condition of the country when he surrendered the reins to his successor. How does this testimony correspond with the speech of the Senator from South Carolina? (Mr. CALHOUN.) He charges the present condition of the country to the tariff of 1828. Mr. S. said the Senator had not relieved the present Administration from the difficulty of being instrumental mainly in bringing the nation to its present state of embarrassment; for, if he will look to the ayes and noes on the passage of that bill, he will find who supported it. Would he not find President Van Buren of the number? But the tariff of 1828 had gone into operation and performed all its mischief, if such was its effect on the country, long before the solemn declarations of President Jackson which Mr. S. had read.

The Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) had traced our embarrassments to the Bank of the United States. But it will be remembered that that bank had ceased to act, and had no connexion whatever with the Government, long before the date of the farewell address of President Jackson.

The Senator from Missouri (Mr. BENTON) attributes the state of public affairs to the paper currency and expanded credit of the country, and seeks relief in a hard-money circulation alone. But did not that Senator admit that all the prosperity of the country had arisen under a mixed currency from the foundation of the Government? Did he not see that, if it was an excess of paper that produced the distress in the country, and the derangement of the currency, no such excess was known during the Administration preceding that of President Jackson? And did he not see that all the excess or redundancy in the currency of which he complained had taken place, and was in full blast, anterior to the parting declaration of President Jackson, when he declared to the world that he left "this great people prosperous and happy?"

Mr. S. said he was apprized that, under the strict rules of evidence, the present Administration could not be charged with having received a nation of prosperous and happy People upon the mere statements of President Jackson that it was so at the time he delivered it over, notwithstanding the fact that the counsels of the out-going and the in-coming President were intimately associated. And that Mr. S. might not be said to place the matter exclusively on that ground, he would read an extract from the inaugural address of President Van Buren, delivered on the 4th day of March, 1837, and which appeared next morning stitched up with the farewell address of his predecessor. Mr. S. then read the following extract:

"At home, while our Government quietly but efficiently performed the sole legitimate end of political institutions, in doing the greatest good to the greatest number, we present an aggregate of human prosperity surely not elsewhere to be found."

Did the in-coming President deny the truth of the statement of his predecessor? Did he say that the tariff of 1828 had injured the country? Did he say, as was contended by the Senator from Ohio (Mr. ALLEN) on yesterday, that the policy of the early financiers and statesmen had cankered the institutions of the country, and paralyzed the prosperity of the nation? Did he contend that, owing to the fact that we had not observed the hard-money doctrines of the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) our prosperity had been blighted, and our energies paralyzed? No such thing, Mr. President; no such thing. He openly, before the assembled multitude, acknowledged the truth of the prosperous condition of the country, the administration of which he was about to take upon himself, and signed the receipt for it which had been read—"We present an aggregate of human prosperity surely not elsewhere to be found."

Mr. S. said he hoped Senators would be satisfied with the condition of public affairs, as declared by both these distinguished individuals at the time the present Administration came into power; they certainly would not attempt to discredit these illustrious witnesses, nor deny the authenticity of the papers which he had read. What had he proved in the case, and what had he disproved? He had proved by President Jackson that at the time he delivered his farewell address he left "this great people prosperous and happy." What else? Why, that, under the policy of the country from its first organization, "the progress of the United States, under our free and happy institutions, has surpassed the most sanguine hopes of the founders of the Republic; our growth has been beyond all former example in numbers, in wealth, in knowledge, and all the useful arts." And he had disproved the charges made against the previous policy of the country. He had shown that it was under that policy that the country had prospered beyond any country in the world. He had proved that the present incumbent had received from his predecessor a nation in the highest state of prosperity, without a national debt, and at peace with all the world. All this he had proved by their own statements; but he would not stop here. He would ask Senators to glance at the state of the business of the nation—of the currency of the nation; at the enterprise and general evidence of prosperity of the nation at the time the present Administration came into power. Mr. S. would speak so as to be understood by all who might do him the honor to read his remarks. At the time alluded to, the manufactories of the nation were doing a fair business; commerce was prospering; the national Treasury was filled; the farmer received a fair price for his produce; wheat in the west one dollar and upwards per bushel; flour six dollars per barrel; pork six dollars per hundred, and all other kinds of produce in proportion; State improvements were rapidly progressing; individual enterprise was every where visible; commercial transactions were carried on with facility and convenience; the laboring classes of society had plenty of employ at good wages; the exchanges of the country were at about one per cent. between the East and the West; money was plenty and interest low. Such was the state of the country at the period of the surrender by President Jackson of the direction of public affairs. Mr. S. said he was apprized that it was said that all this was an unnatural, diseased state of the nation, its finances, and its business. To this he would merely reply, that his object was to present the facts, and not to discuss these controverted questions. He would say, however, to the objectors, that if all this evidenced disease in the affairs of the nation, that disease had been brought upon her by the late Administration to a great extent. It was enough, however, for the purpose of the argument he intended to address to the Senate, that the country was not viewed as diseased by President Jackson, or received by President Van Buren with the least intimation to the people that there was any disease preying on the vitals of the national prosperity. He therefore felt justified in taking these distinguished individuals at their word, and charging to the policy that had been pursued the misfortunes, embarrassments, and distress under which the whole country and its business labored. How stands the case? How stands the prosperity of the people now? What is the state of the monetary affairs of the nation? What the commercial? What the manufacturing? What the farming? What the laboring? What the mechanical? The State improvements? Let each of these interests in the country answer the question.

Sir, (said Mr. S.) Senators could theorize beautifully. He had heard the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) with that interest which the Senator always gave to the subjects he discussed. He theorized and generalized with great effect; but still it was but theory and generalization. That Senator had made on this subject what he called a Northern speech; he had even regretted that the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) was not in his place to hear him, believing, as he said, that he could satisfy even that Senator of the correctness of his views. It was not the purpose of Mr. S. to step between those distinguished Senators; but he confessed that the attitude in which he saw the Senator from South Carolina was a new one. It was the first time he had ever heard him attempting to protect the Northern manufacturers. It had, therefore, directed the attention of Mr. S. to that portion of the argument of the Senator. He believed he fully comprehended the Senator. The Senator had attempted to maintain that the only protection which the Northern manufacturer required was the reduction of the labor of the workman, and a like reduction on the produce on which they subsisted; that, by reducing these, the profit on the capital of the manufacturer whould be increased in the same ratio. This might or it might not be so; but it was certainly a remarkable poor man's argument; it was the very doctrine for which the opponents of this levelling destructive policy contend, that the object and effect is to reduce free labor and produce, for the benefit of the capitalists of the nation; or, in other words, to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer. It was a doctrine against which Mr. S. entered his solemn protest. The Senator from South Carolina would excuse an idea that Mr. S. had received while listening to his speech. There might be nothing in it. He would, however, throw it out for what it was worth. He had thought it possible that, while that Senator was endeavoring to satisfy the Senate that it was for the interest of the North to reduce the labor and produce of that section to a specie standard, his mind's eye was South with his interest, and that his speech was not so much to favor the Northern manufacturer as the Southern planter. Might it not be that the Senator reasoned after this wise: Our staple is cotton; our principal market is in Europe. We own our laborers; it is immaterial to us what the price of labor may be, for we have that within ourselves; it is immaterial to the price of our staple what may be the price of the ordinary American products, our market is not a domestic one; and if we can reduce the price of free labor, and, consequently, that of the produce on which we feed our hands, to one-half what it now costs us, it will be a clear gain to us of so much; while the free laborer and the produce-raiser of the West and North are the sufferers? There might possibly be nothing in this view of the case. If there was not, the Senator from South Carolina was the dupe; if there was, then he held those who acted with him from the North and West in the hollow of his hand. That Senator was sometimes mistaken. If, however, in this instance, he should be right, Northern and Western Senators, from the grain-growing and produce-raising States, might possibly find themselves wrong.

Mr. S. had said that Senators over the way could theorize finely; they could speak like the book, and sometimes they even spoke from the book; but he had become sick and tired of their theorizing speeches, while the whole experience of the nation spoke, in language not to be misunderstood, in direct opposition to the results to which they had come. The Senator from Ohio (Mr. ALLEN) had on yesterday delivered a long dissertation on democracy and federalism, tracing all the mal-administration of public affairs to what he was pleased to call the Hamiltonian doctrines, and winding up with a eulogy on this Administration. That Senator, at the outset, had taken his stand upon a portion of the history of England. Mr. S. had thought, while he was eulogizing an Administration that had reduced the people of his State to their present condition of distress and embarrassment, that a portion of the history of Rome would have suited him much better, which speaks of a Nero fiddling while Rome was in flames. Had that Senator turned his eyes to his own State, Mr. S. was much mistaken if he would have found in the condition of affairs there any thing to require at his hands eulogies or hosannas, even at this time; and unless all the signs of the times are deceptive, he would have less cause to rejoice over a course of measures which must bring even deeper distress upon those whose interest he should have at heart. Did that Senator suppose he could fasten on the policy of the nation, previous to the Administration which preceded the present one, the situation of his people? He, to be sure, attributed it to the effects of inflated paper and credit; but did he not know that it was the late Administration that had given impulse to, and had been the hot-house of, that inflation, if it existed? Did he expect the farmers of his State, when returning home with fifty cents a bushel for wheat in lieu of a dollar, would thank him for his eulogy on the cause of the depression? It might be possible that the people of Ohio were different from the citizens of other States, but he did not believe it.

Mr. S. said he would turn his attention a moment to the Senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN.) He had listened to the speech of that Senator with some feeling. The Senator had delivered it in fine style. He had fallen in with the hard-money doctrines. He had adopted as orthodox the doctrines of a reduction of the price of labor as essential to even manufacturing prosperity. He had anathematized the banks, and in a most especial manner the United States Bank of Pennsylvania. Those around the Senator appeared delighted, but Mr. S. had very different feelings. He believed the Senator wrong in his principles, and that destruction would be the effect produced by his doctrines. The sound of the Senator's fine voice had scarcely died away from the dome of the chamber, before the noble proclamation of the Governor of his own State reached us. The Legislature of Pennsylvania, like a majority here, were pressing on to the destruction of the banks, to the destruction of the currency, credit, and business of the country. Whether prompted from head-quarters here, or not, was not the business of Mr. S. to inquire. The destructive bill had passed the House of Representatives, and was in the Senate for action, when Governor Porter rose above the atmosphere of party, became the Governor of the State, and spoke, in a voice that made the hearts of the warmest partisans around him quail, Stop, stop in your mad career; remove the rack; take away the torture; the patient is expiring; Pennsylvania can bear no more. Mr. S. said Pennsylvania was his native State. She was his real, while Indiana was his adopted mother; and, as one of her absent sons, ever interested in her welfare, he could not do less than say that Governor Porter, in his opinion, had won for himself, in that single act of his life, a claim to a greater degree of the gratitude of his fellow-citizens than in all the rest put together. Mr. S. would let no political considerations prevent him from doing justice to a political opponent, when it was so well deserved.

Mr. S. said he had noticed very briefly the position which the Senators over the way had assumed, as satisfactory to their minds, upon the great matters before the people, in an attempt to account for the embarrassment and distress that pervaded the whole country. He had showed that all those causes existed before the close of the administration of President Jackson, and that when he left the administration of public affairs, he left the people, in his own language, "prosperous and happy." He had showed that Mr. Van Buren received it in that prosperous condition, as admitted in his inaugural address, delivered at the time, and stitched up with the farewell address of President Jackson.

Mr. S. proposed to examine the condition of the country in less than three years in the hands of the present Administration; and then submit the matter to the people, whether this Government is now administered, in the language of President Jackson in his inaugural address, "for the good of the people, and regulated by their will," or whether it had not been administered contrary to their will and against their interest; whether the war on the banks, the credit, the commerce, the business, the currency, and the destructive policy now in full blast, had not brought this "prosperous and happy people" to the very brink of ruin. How stands the case? The exchanges, which evidence the health of commercial action, which were at from one-half to one per cent. before the tampering with the currency commenced, were most unequal and in a ruinous state of derangement. Mr. S. then read from a paper he held, a table of exchanges, dated New York, February 8, 1840:

Philadelphia,	6¼ to 7	Louisville,	10 to 12
Baltimore,	6½	Nashville,	12 to 15
Richmond,	7 to 8	Natchez,	30
Augusta,	10	Cincinnati,	10 to 12
Mobile,	7 to 8	Detroit,	10 to 12
New Orleans,	4	St. Louis,	12

The works of internal improvement in the States have been suspended, and the laborers thrown out of employ, and in many instances left almost without subsistence. The banks have been compelled to curtail their discounts and draw in their circulation. The price of produce has depreciated already one-half, with prospects of still greater depression Money has become so scarce that the impossibility of paying debts is alarming, while the real and personal estates of the debtors are unavailable, no matter how much they may have. Mr. S. said he would read to the Senate some extracts to show how the matter stands in the different sections of the country. He then read an extract from the Zanesville (Ohio) Gazette of the 5th instant:

"Wheat continues to sell in places at 50 cents per bushel; flour, retail, $3 per barrel. We are informed that two hundred barrels were sold last week at $2 62½ per barrel; another lot was sold at $2 75. Pork and every other agricultural product in the west are depreciated in the same proportion."

Extract of a letter from Indiana of the 2d instant:

"I hardly know what to write you, unless I repeat the saying that is here the most familiar—hard times, no collections, suing, breaking up, produce goes a begging, our laborers thrown out of employ; there is no telling who may or who may not break; all our improvements stopped; our debtor class are ruined. What is to be the end of these matters? Let the experimenters answer. God knows times are hard enough now, and getting worse every day."

Extract from the letter of an intelligent Bucks county (Pennsylvania) farmer. Mr. S. said this letter came from the county of his birth, and from a friend of his youth:

"The effect of their measures we farmers already feel sorely. Beef and pork are two dollars per cwt. lower than last year; cattle from 30 to 40 per cent. lower; and the different kinds of grain on an average are not more than half so high as they have been for four years past, and are falling."

"NEW ORLEANS, January 29.

"The anticipations of relief from the prevailing pressure during the present winter are, thus far, not realized. Times are, perhaps, a little harder now than they ever were, with no prospect of a speedy change for the better. During the last few days we have heard of several capitalists bending under the weight, who hitherto stood erect. The opening of navigation in the Ohio, it is to be hoped, may give an impulse to trade that will be found beneficial. Unless succor comes from some quarter, every debtor in the country 'will have to break.' There is no money scarcely stirring, and no way of getting it. Can't the Legislature do something for our help? The public are looking in that direction; but, we apprehend, with slender hopes of receiving effieient and substantial aid."—Bulletin.

Mr. S. said he could read letter after letter, extract after extract, newspaper after newspaper—all, all speaking the same language; and yet Senators here could stand coldly reading extracts from British books; and even the Administration, having derived no light from experience, and disdaining the plain, humble, republican track of our ancestors, had thought it necessary to set on foot an exploring expedition amongst the monarchical Governments of the old world for a financial policy for this Republic, and a bill carrying out that policy had actually passed the Senate, and would probably become a law. But why continue the extracts? Was it not admitted on all hands that every interest and business of the nation was surrounded by embarrassments, heart-rending, and calling not only for the justice but for the sympathy of the Senate? And yet gentlemen over the way could still press on with their fatal policy, without one feeling of sympathy for the sufferings of the people: the Administration was inexorable. Sir, (said Mr. S.) let other Senators feel as they might—let the Senator from South Carolina generalize—let the Senator from Ohio sing hosannas to the authors of these calamities—let the Senator from Pennsylvania contend for the reduction of wages and the destruction of the currency of his State, unmoved by the sufferings and distress around them; he (Mr. S.) was not made of that kind of stuff; he had a heart that he hoped with its last pulsation would beat with sympathy for the sufferings of his fellow-men. He could not fold his arms and look on, like the public executioner, while the Administration put upon the rack and torture the people of his State; he could not see the property torn from his people and sacrificed, themselves and families thrown upon the cold charity of the world, without at least placing before them the whole matter, leaving them to decide whether the Government, under the present rulers, was administered for the benefit of the people; and if not, whether such an Administration was "worth defending," in the language of President Jackson.

Mr. S. said he was sick, heart-sick, of hearing speeches, speeches, and no relief—no prospect of relief to the people. The course of gentlemen (Mr. S. said) reminded him of one of the most affecting incidents of his life. He was sent for to the sick bed of a valued friend; he found his friend near his dissolution; his whole appearance indicated his speedy departure. Mr. S. asked the attending physician if there could be no remedy—if there was no relief? The doctor shook his head, and replied, None, I fear; the case is fever; I have given him calomel, dose after dose, from twenty to fifty grains, but it seems to have no effect upon him. But, Doctor, will not you try something else? No, sir; the case is fever, and the books say calomel is the remedy; we must follow the books. But do you not see the patient is dying? Your remedy is certainly not the correct one, or you would not kill your patients with it. His friend died, and Mr. S. had the poor consolation of knowing that he had taken calomel in doses prescribed by the books; but all were not so well satisfied that it was the best remedy for the disease as applied to that particular patient, although it might have been judicious in some cases. So (said Mr. S.) you have been giving calomel, calomel, calomel, possibly as prescribed by some of your books; but do you not see your patient is dying? Do you not see you will ruin the country by your policy? Will you persist? Mr. S. said he would to Heaven he had the influence with Senators over the way, as well as with the Administration, that Governor Porter seems to have had with his Legislature. He would say to them, Stop, stop; require not the people to drink to the very dregs this cup of your policy; throw away your books and look at your people, and you must become satisfied that your remedy, your policy, has been wholly a mistaken one. If you will not separate from it, rest assured the people will separate from you; patience under such policy will not always be a virtue. There may be relief possibly found through the ballot-boxes, should ruin not overtake them before they reach that constitutional remedy.

Mr. S. said he had heard from the Senator from South Carolina, as well as from the Senator from Pennsylvania, a dissertation on currency, and he was free to admit that he had read some authors on that highly important subject himself. He was aware that the general principles were; that an increase of currency produced a corresponding increase of prices. He had heard much of a redundant currency, and its effects upon the business of the country. It was one of the most difficult questions ever examined. As to when the currency was or when it was not redundant, so much depended upon the business, improvements, increase of population, and a thousand other considerations, that it would be only conjecture. He was aware that there was much speculation and theorizing on the whole subject; but he had thought a single consideration, to which he would advert, had not been sufficiently attended to, either by authors or Senators; and that was, that it was not so much the quantity of money in circulation in a country, as the rapidity of its motion, that created either a supposed redundancy or scarcity in the transactions of society. He held that velocity or motion might be so accelerated as to make one hundred dollars answer more of the valuable purposes of society at one period of time, than one thousand dollars, with less activity, would at another. Motion, applied to currency, would be accelerated either by a suspicion on the part of the holder of the currency in his possession, which would induce him to part with it as soon as possible; or, by that universal and vital principle of all society, confidence between man and man—the first principle operating upon currency—that is, suspicion of its permanent value, could only operate on bank paper, and, when once attacked, must necessarily drive it out of circulation. The absence of the other principle, confidence, must inevitably arrest, in a great degree, the active principle of currency; and, with much more money in a country, the velocity may be so much less that it may be infinitely more scarce than at other times, when there is less money in the country, but when confidence is such as to give it accelerated motion. There was at the present time money enough in the country to relieve greatly the embarrassments of the people. Why, then, was it so scarce? The obvious answer is, that such has been the war upon the banks, upon the credit and currency of the country, that confidence was destroyed between man and man, and between the people and the institutions of the country; in consequence of which, the principles to which he had adverted were brought in full operation against the active principle of currency motion; and, by that means, the money had been driven to its hiding-places, from which it would only be forced through the instrumentality of the usurer, or of persons desiring to speculate on the misfortunes of their fellow-men, until it should be again set in active motion by confidence, the propelling principle. That confidence could never be restored so long as the war on the part of the Administration continued; for, Mr. S. said, he was bound to look upon the proceedings before the Senate as a part of the same policy that had been avowed by the President, and of which the sub-Treasury had formed a component part.

Mr. S. had said all he desired to say on the first branch of the subject. He would call the attention of the Senate to some other views connected more closely with the resolutions before the Senate. It seemed to be resolved that the General Government should set itself up as grand lecturer of the States. Much had been said in the debate by Senators, condemning the report of the committee of which he was a dissenting member, for the manner in which it arrayed the debts of the States before the world; and, after the debate of a day, that report had been sent back to the committee to be so altered as to omit the objectionable statements. The report had been so altered, and reported back. All this was well enough; but did not Senators see that neither the Senator from Missouri nor the committee had the honor of original inventors in that matter? The President of the United States, it seems, was at the bottom of the whole of it. Mr. S. then read extracts from the last message:

"The foreign debt of our States, corporations, and men of business, can scarcely be less than two hundred millions of dollars." "It is easy to see that the increase of this foreign debt must augment the foreign demand on the exports to pay the interest, and to the same extent diminish the imports; and in proportion to the enlargement of the foreign debt, and the consequent increase of interest, must be the decrease of the import trade. In lieu of the comforts it now brings us, we might have our gigantic banking institutions, and splendid, but in many instances profitless, railroads and canals, absorbing to a great extent an interest upon the capital borrowed to construct them, the surplus fruits of national industry for years to come, and securing to posterity no adequate return for the comforts which the labor of their hands might otherwise have secured. It is not by the increase of this debt that relief is to be sought, but in its diminution."

Mr. S. said the entire credit of this whole matter was due to the President, and he was not willing to see it shifted and placed on the head of either the Senator from Missouri or the committee. If the States had been arraigned before the Federal Government, he had shown who was the prosecutor. Sir, (said Mr. S.) this is only a portion of the entire policy, the centralizing policy of the present Administration. State rights and State legislation are to be subject to the animadversion of the federal head of this Government. He had pointed Senators again and again to the inordinate, ingulfing policy of recent times, that swallows up in the tremendous vortex of Executive powers the rights of the States and the legislation of the people. He did not advert to it at this time for the purpose of entering upon that inexhaustible field of debate, but for another purpose. He denied the legitimate authority of this General Government to interfere with the legislative action of the States, either to censure or hold up to the world that course of policy which the States might think proper to adopt. All that was a matter entirely for the States and their own citizens.

Mr. S. said he would, for a few moments, examine the doctrines of that portion of the message which he had read. He did so with the more pleasure, because in the examination he hoped to be able to answer some of the positions of Senators over the way, which were mere commentaries on the text he had read from the message. The great injustice (to say the least of it) of holding up the debts of a State, without at the same time presenting its resources, is too palpable to need comment. Justice requires, at all times, that both sides of the account should be stated. Any other course was only calculated to mislead, and to prejudice the debtor in the eyes of the world. If you say of a man that he owes fifty thousand dollars, and say no more, you affect his credit with the world; none would trust him except those who knew his ability to pay. But if you say of him, in addition, that he is amply good for treble that sum, the credit side brings up the balance in his favor. So in relation to the debts of the States and people. It was possible they might amount to the sum named by the President, but still he only gave one side of the case. The President had kindly told the States that "it is not by the increase of this debt that relief is to be sought, but in its diminution." Now, sir, that may or it may not be so, according to the circumstances surrounding the debtor State; and that was a matter submitted exclusively to the people and Legislature of the particular State. Did it not strike Senators that suspended public works in the States, which must remain wholly useless unless completed, and the money thrown away which had been expended upon them, might be finished to great advantage in many instances, even should an increase of the debt of the State be the consequence? The error into which the President and Senators over the way had fallen, was in the application of their abstractions to the condition of the people and the States as they were. It could not be denied but that the abstraction laid down by the President might be true, if the public works were completed in the States; but, in their present condition, the States may find that, upon principles of the strictest economy, it may be necessary for them to extend their credit, and complete some of their unfinished works; and it was not for the Federal Government to injure their credit, or lecture them as to their internal policy. That matter the people of the States understood best, and with them it should be left. There was another remark in the extract which he had read, and which had been repeated by Senators, commented upon in the public press, in essays, and tables of calculation, to which Mr. S. desired to call the attention of the Senate, for the purpose of exposing its fallacy—"profitless railroads and canals." Yes, sir, in the present enlightened age of the world, the internal improvements of your country were to be reduced to a question of dollars and cents, to be brought to a counting-house calculation, to be conned over by the usurer, to be weighed and tested by the question whether they would pay the interest upon their construction. The minds of statesmen seem to be limited to the most sordid and circumscribed view of the question. We shall surely entitle ourselves to the character that has been given us in the European journals—"a dollar and cent people." Were we, in this enlightened, active, commercial, and enterprising age of the world, to be told that a canal or railroad that did not pay the interest on the cost of its construction, was "profitless" to the people? Why, sir, that is only a question of taxes; you may collect tolls to pay only one per cent. on the construction of the work, or you may increase the tolls so as to pay five; still you have not touched the question of the value of the work to the country. Suppose there was not one dollar of tolls collected on a single work in the United States, but all were left, like your great rivers, free and public highways. Would they be the less useful, valuable, or profitable to the people? Take, for example, the New York and Erie canal. Is it by the amount of tolls collected on that great work that its utility and value to the State are to be tested or ascertained? Surely not. If the State of New York was in a condition to dispense with tolls altogether, would it be contended that her work would not be equally as profitable and valuable to the great mass of her citizens as it now is? What are tolls? Nothing more nor less than taxes on the commerce and business that pass through the canal. That tax may be necessary to raise the interest on the cost of construction; but it was principally drawn from her commerce, and paid ultimately by the consumer, as it entered into the price of the produce and merchandise that pass through the canal. These remarks are equally applicable to railroads. It may then be asked, if the profit of a canal or railroad is not to be tested by the amount of tolls collected, how is it to be done? The answer is obvious: by the benefits resulting to the State and its citizens, in the increased facilities afforded to commercial and agricultural operations, with the corresponding increase in the value of real estate and the price of every article of produce, as well as the reduction in the price of every article conveyed over the work. It might well be assumed that the State of New York would not be the loser, by taking off the tolls entirely from her public works as she would relieve her citizens from that tax, while she would increase the commerce of her great cities, as well as the business of the State generally. It may be asserted, and successfully maintained, that every measure that increases the industry of the people, which is the true wealth of a nation, is beneficial; and every policy which paralyzes that industry is injurious in its tendency, and diminishes the quantum of active wealth. These great improvements have had the effect to increase greatly the enterprising industry of the people, and have therefore been beneficial to the country, greatly beyond the simple question whether they would or would not pay, in the shape of tolls or taxes, the interest of the cost of construction. Mr. S. said he had felt it to be his duty at the first favorable opportunity to protest against the dollar and cent view of this great subject, that had been presented by the message, the Senator from Missouri, and others. He had done this, protesting at the same time against the right of the President or of the Congress of the United States to take cognizance of the policy of the States, and to read them lectures in relation to that policy which he held was for them alone to decide upon.

Mr. S. said the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. HUBBARD) had thanked his stars his State was not a debtor State; he had congratulated himself and his State that they were not sinners like some others. This question, like the others Mr. S. had discussed, was not subject to abstract boundaries. It might or it might not be prudent for a State to become indebted; the same might be said of individuals; but a rule that denounced all the indebted States, and eulogized all those who had not incurred a State debt, might be very liable to deceive those who relied upon it. Surely it would not be contended that either States or individuals who incurred debts were, merely from that circumstance, objects of public censure. This was the great error, Mr. S. repeated, into which the Senators over the way had incautiously fallen; they dealt with abstract principles, and not with facts and a people as they exist. It certainly did not follow that, because a State or an individual was in debt, therefore she or he was not prosperous; on the contrary, it would hardly be contended that, because a State or individual was out of debt, therefore she or he was prosperous. All experience and all knowledge of men proved to the contrary. As the Senator from New Hampshire had thought proper to allude to this matter with much self-complaceny, Mr. S. would say to that Senator that the State of Indiana was one of the debtor States; and still he (Mr. S.) was entirely willing to compare notes with the Senator as to the relative advancement and prosperity of the two States. Mr. S. adverted to that matter with much pleasure, not only as a question of comparison, but because his State and her debts had been made a subject for discussion; her debts had been marshalled before the world, while her resources had been studiously kept out of view. This was, to say the least of it, unfair. If her pecuniary affairs were a proper subject for discussion and animadversion here, (which he denied,) let the whole truth be told. It was true, Indiana had incurred a State debt, (but not to the amount stated,) for the purposes of internal improvement, and for her banking capital. The policy adopted by her was her own, for weal or wo; and it was to the wisdom of her own counsels she had to look in the emergency. And here he would say, let the remark fall where it might, that, so far as those counsels were concerned, he had regretted to see that a spirit of crimination and recrimination had crept in, growing out of general politics. Parties were arrayed, not so much upon the question of her indebtedness, as upon the question which of the great parties had induced her to involve herself so deeply. Mr. S. said he was bound in all candor to say that it grew out of the times in which her debts were contracted; all political parties were stimulated, they ventured too far; but all participated in the matter in a degree corresponding with their locality, and anticipated benefits resulting from her works of internal improvement. Her State Government was in the hands of one political party, while that of her sister, Illinois, was in the other; and yet both incurred responsibilities at the same time, and each had acted doubtless in a manner which she believed at the time to be correct, but which had proved disastrous, owing to the revulsion in business and scarcity of money; but still he felt bound to say that each was, in his mind, amply able to discharge every demand upon her, nor would either ever for a moment violate her faith, or give any just cause to suspect her honor.

Mr. S. said he would read an extract from the last message of the Governor of his State, which would show to the gentleman from New Hampshire, and to the world, that Indiana would at least compare with that State, or any other State in the Union that had made no improvements and incurred no debts. Indiana was admitted into the Union in the year 1816, with about the constitutional number of 60,000 souls. Her population on the return of the next census would be found to be not less than 800,000. Mr. S. read from the last message of Governor Wallace some extracts:

"The assessments of taxable property the present year are quite favorable; they exhibit most gratifying results, and prove beyond a question that both he population and wealth of the State have been steadily on the increase. The taxable polls of 1839 amount to 95,756; but this is evidently much below the true estimate, as the aggregate vote cast at the last Congressional election very clearly demonstrates, that vote being 100,500. Indeed, I have little or no doubt but that a close and careful assessment would have returned not less than 115,000 polls. In 1838, the total valuation of all the taxable property of the State amounted to $97,058,094; this year that amount has been swelled to $107,337,715.

"The principal subjects of taxation, it will be recollected, consist of lands and their improvements, town lots, corporation stock, and personal property; of these, the lands the present year, embracing 7,475,320 acres, have been valued at $65,984,879.

So much for the single item of lands, which the Governor says does not include the whole, the assessment being imperfect. He then adds:

"From the sales of public lands, as reported by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, we ascertain that the 8,922,122 acres of land now subject to taxation will be augmented annually by the following additions: In 1840, by 1,586,904 acres; in 1841, by 3,249,210 acres; in 1842, by 1,249,818 acres; in 1843, by 320,641 acres; proving most conclusively that in 1843 we shall have 15,328,694 acres of taxable land. In times, therefore, like the present, when gloom and despondency seem to pervade every bosom, when the credit of sovereign States even can no longer command money from abroad, and when bankruptcy and ruin, with their attending trains of evil, apparently hang suspended over the great mass of the people, no citizen of Indiana, I presume, devoted to her interest, or who feels himself identified with her prosperity and glory, can avoid receiving the foregoing facts as evidence sufficient to justify him in confidently anticipating a safe deliverance from present and future enthralments. Administrations may change, parties may alternately triumph, and destructive experiments be repeated; but the soil and its fertility will remain unaffected by either. It constitutes an element of wealth which even man in his folly cannot destroy, and which, when all others are swept away from him, continues in the performance of its functions to cheer and support him through every emergency. It is, therefore, matter of heartfelt gratification to see how largely the people of Indiana are possessed of this element; for, combined with the untiring energy and industry which distinguish their character, we feel that we hazard nothing in predicting that the wealth and resources of the State must continue to expand in despite of the most adverse circumstances."

Mr. S. said, after what had been said relative to the banks, and especially those that had been created by debts incurred abroad, and the allusions of the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) he felt called upon to say one word about the banks in his own State. Indiana had no banks, except her State Bank, which was not a bank of deposite, or even discount, but rather a supervisory head; and her branches, he was justified in saying, even in 1837, at the time of the general suspension, were sound to the core. He did not deny but that they suspended at that period, but it was in self-defence. The banks in other States had suspended, and as their notes in the possession of the Indiana banks could not be made available, they acted wisely in the course they pursued. Reciprocity was all they asked. They resumed at the first moment that such a reciprocity was established, and had continued to pay their notes in specie since. Mr. S. said he would read a short extract from the message, on this subject, also:

"The condition of the State Bank appears to be healthy. On the 31st of October last her assets amounted to six million two hundred and forty thousand three hundred and twenty-eight dollars, and her liabilities to three million four hundred and ninety-three thousand and forty-two dollars. At the same date, she had in her vaults $1,021,490 in specie, and $3,124,497 in circulation. The measure of total suspension recently adopted by the banks of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and other States, I am happy to say, has not been followed by the State Bank of Indiana."

So, sir, (said Mr. S.,) you see that, give Indiana fair play, keep your hands out of her pockets, make no assaults upon her credit, arrest your destructive policy, paralyze not her industry, reduce neither the wages of her labor nor the price of her produce by your war upon the currency, and she will shake off the manacles with which you have temporarily bound her, and rise, in her true character, one of the young giants of the West.

Mr. S. said he must notice briefly the immediate subject before the Senate, however unfashionable he might be deemed for doing so. He had, however, said already much that was intimately connected with it. The Senator from Missouri had introduced a string of resolutions on the subject of the assumption by the Government of the debts of the States, and had made his speech upon them; after a very brief discussion, they had been referred to a select committee, of which Mr. S. was a member. He had met the committee in good faith at the outset, with his protest against the whole proceedings: a report had been made, and resolutions introduced from the majority of the committee, to both of which he had dissented. In justice to the chairman of the committee, he would say that, if the subject were properly before Congress, the chairman, in the report, had presented the views of the majority of the committee in a manner as unexceptionable as the nature of the subject submitted would admit, and with the usual ability of that Senator. Mr. S. did not object to the report on that ground. He had heard, with some surprise, Senators on this side of the chamber suppose that the charge against the States came from the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) or the committee. He thought, to use a Western phrase, the saddle had not been placed on the right horse. He had read an extract from the late message of the President, where Senators had seen who originated this attempt to draw the business and pecuniary condition of the States before the Federal Government for its criticism and animadversion. The message says: "The foreign debt of our State corporations and men of business can scarcely be less than two hundred millions of dollars." Such is the statement made by the President: it might all be true; but why blazon it forth to the world? Some London bankers had suggested the propriety of the States giving further security, (meaning, no doubt, the United States,) if they desired to obtain any further credit. Resolutions were introduced, declaring that Congress would not assume the State debts; the resolutions were referred to a committee, and that committee had reported a set of resolutions gravely negativing the assumption. Mr. S. said this was one of the most splendid legislative farces ever played off. He resisted the whole of it. What! was the Senate of the United States, one of the most dignified and august bodies in the world, to resolve itself into a corresponding tribunal, to respond to the Barings, or anybody else, in relation to the concerns of the sovereign States of the Union? Suppose the Rothschilds, in a publication, should desire the United States to pay the claims they held against American citizens. Was the Congress of the United States to solemnly resolve that it would not pay? Can it be possible that this body is to step from its proper and legitimate business to the wayside, to answer calls about affairs over which it had no control? Mr. S. said he denied in toto the whole of the doctrine. He denied that naked resolves, where no legislative action was proposed, upon subjects not before the body, and where it was not intended to bring matters before Congress which might require legislative action, were within the ordinary duties of Congress; and, if resorted to at all, should never be countenanced except on extraordinary occasions. If such a course of action should prevail, the time of Congress might be wholly occupied in resolving on every matter that might be conceived of. There would be, as there had been to very little purpose, endless resolves, giving Congressional expositions of the Constitution and institutions of the country. On the other hand, each political party would lay down its creed, and bring its partisans up to a standard of political action by formal resolves. Congress would override State Legislatures and forge public opinion, become masters instead of the agents of the States and people, and cause the pride of opinion to predominate over the love of justice in after action, when a subject might be legitimately before it. Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. Mr. S. said, for himself and his State, he protested against being called to the bar of the Senate, and compelled to say ay or no to any proposition or abstract question Senators or committees might require him to act upon by their resolutions. Let them bring up a question for legislative action, and he was ready to act upon it at once, to respond directly to it. He had never dodged a question, nor would he ever; but he was not to be catechised in this manner.

He had said at the outset that he viewed the whole of these proceedings as gratuitous and uncalled-for, and he could, by no vote of his, give them any sanction whatever. He should vote against the whole of them, without intending to express any opinion on their merits. He considered them as well calculated to affect the credit of the States abroad, where their resources were not properly known; and he could see no necessity whatever for any proceedings in the matter on the part of the Senate. Senators say the character and credit of the States cannot be injured, because the resolutions merely assume that the General Government will not be responsible for the State debts. But why was it necessary to say any thing about it? Why not leave the matter as it stood, between the States and their creditors? Would not the mere fact of passing these resolutions show that the United States had thought it necessary to apprize the world of her resolves? What would be said of a wealthy parent who should give notice that he would not assume the debts of his son? Would it not operate to destroy that son's credit with all the world, notwithstanding he might be good, and the parent might say so? Certainly such would be the effect. Mr. S. said he hoped no political thoughts had entered the head of the mover of this matter; but still, such might be inferred from some facts in the case. It was known here that attempts were making in the West to fasten the unpopularity of the State debts upon one political party. This movement took the popular side, it was no doubt presumed, of that question. A very large extra number of the report had been ordered to be printed by the dominant party here, without even arousing their economical sensibilities. Mr. S. trusted, however, that very little political capital could be made out of it, if the subject was understood by the people. It had been his object, in the remarks which he had made, to place the responsibility of the times on the right shoulders. He was not willing to see the charge of producing the present distresses thrown upon those who had no control over the administration of public affairs, or to see that responsibility withdrawn from those who, for the last ten years, have had the matter all in their own way; that had put down the Bank of the United States, raised up the State banks, as they as naturally sprung up from the times after the destruction of the United States Bank as vegetation died from the annual inundation of the Nile; that had in turn destroyed the State banks, which they had been the cause of creating, and, by their continual war upon the currency, credit, and business of the country, had brought a "prosperous and happy" people to their present condition. The people bear the burdens of the Government, and suffer from the effects of its policy when injurious to their interests, and they ought to know the truth.

SPEECH OF MR. GARLAND,

OF VIRGINIA,

In the House of Representatives, January 21, 1840.—On the resolution of Mr. W. Thompson, of South Carolina, for the rejection of abolition petitions.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, rose and said: Mr. Speaker, I avow at the outset of my remarks upon this, as I avowed on a former occasion, that, upon the subject of domestic slavery as it exists in the United States, and upon all those questions of "human rights" and the immutable principles of "justice" referred to by the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. SLADE,) as connected with it, I have no remarks to make. I avow now, as I did then, that I never will debate before the House of Representatives of the United States a question of "human rights" involving the domestic institutions of the State which I have, in part, the honor to represent; not because I apprehend any unfavorable result to the discussion, but because it is a subject over which the Constitution has imparted no power whatever to this Government—a subject entirely local, and belonging to the exclusive jurisdiction of the States. In this determination, I believe, I truly reflect the undivided sentiment of the State of Virginia, and the common sentiment of the whole Southern people. They have but one sentiment and one argument upon this vital and deeply interesting question; and that is, to resist to the utmost extremity every invasion of their domestic institutions or domestic rights, whensoever and by whomsoever made.

The principles involved in this debate, Mr. Speaker, are of infinite importance, not only as they affect the question of slavery in the District of Columbia, but as they affect the life, liberty, and property of the people of the District. They involve the question whether, over the people of this District, the powers of this Government are omnipotent and without limitation, or whether they are secured against the tyranny and oppression of the Government by the same constitutional barriers which protect and defend every other portion of the people of the United States. In a word, sir, the question is directly involved, whether the people of the United States have, in this District, unwittingly and incautiously erected an absolute and unqualified despotism; for, sir, if the doctrines contended for so ably by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BIDDLE) and the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. SLADE) be true, and Congress has power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, then are the people of the District without the pale of all constitutional protection, and the subjects of an unqualified, iron despotism; having no rights or no privileges but such as exist at the whim and caprice of this body. If the people of the District of Columbia cannot look for that protection of life, liberty, and property, in the Constitution, which that instrument affords to all the citizens of the United States against the tyranny and oppression of this Government, I should be greatly indebted to any gentleman to inform me where they can look for it? Where is their security? If their property in slaves can be constitutionally invaded and destroyed, what other right of property, or even of life or liberty, is secured? None, sir, none whatever; and the Government may lord it over this people with perfect impunity.

But, before I enter upon the discussion of the question whether petitions for "the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade in the District of Columbia," as the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BIDDLE,) and the ingenious gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. SLADE,) have attempted to prove that this House cannot refuse to receive these petitions without an invasion of that great popular right—the right of petition—I propose briefly to examine the nature of this right of petition, the extent to which the Constitution has secured it against invasion, and what are the powers and duties of Congress when petitions are presented; for the purpose of proving that the right of the people to petition is one thing, and the powers and duties of Congress when petitions are presented, another. And here I will remark, that, in the preservation of this great right, this fundamental principle of liberty, from every species of invasion, the slaveholding are as deeply interested as the non-slaveholding States; and that whatever impairs its force, or destroys its efficacy, affects the people of the slaveholding as much as those of the non-slaveholding States. I am as much, therefore, from interest as from feeling, opposed to any even the slightest innovation upon this invaluable and inalienable right as any member upon this floor; it is the common right of the whole American people, and not of a section. But, sir, the refusal to receive these petitions is no invasion, not even in the slightest degree, of the right of petition; and this is the proposition which I now undertake to demonstrate.

What is meant, Mr. Speaker, by the right of petition? Is it a right which involves not only a demand for a redress of grievances, but the power also of controlling the action of the body to which petitions are presented in their disposition? If it be thus omnipotent and unlimited, then, indeed, has this House nothing to do but to receive petitions and grant their prayers, however unfounded, absurd, or ridiculous they may be. But, sir, this cannot be so. I understand the right of petition simply to mean the right of the citizen to petition the Government for a redress of grievances, and the duty of the Government to redress those grievances as far as it may have power to do so, and the justice and propriety of the demand may require. When the citizen has assembled and presented his petition, he has exercised his right, and then commences the power and duty of the body petitioned. For an illustration of this view, I call the particular attention of gentlemen to the clear and explicit language of that article which secures, not confers, this important right, and to which reference has been so often made. It reads thus:

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

It must be manifest, to the simplest comprehension, that this clause was only designed to protect the people from any interference from Government in peaceably assembling to petition for a redress of grievances, and not to prescribe any rule by which Congress should be governed in disposing of petitions. In this clause of the Constitution there are three great principles protected against any invasion by the Government: the freedom of religious opinion, of speech, and of the press. In order to illustrate my position, let us suppose any portion of our citizens mad enough to assemble and petition for the establishment of a particular religion, or to suppress the freedom of speech or of the press; can there be found, in this clause of the Constitution, any imperious obligation on Congress to receive or consider such petitions—petitions seeking to subvert and destroy the fundamental principles of the Constitution itself? Clearly not. And it would have been madness in the framers of the Constitution to have imposed such an obligation. Why should the Constitution impose upon Congress the obligation of receiving and considering petitions seeking to subvert its proudest and most salutary principles? I would feign believe that no gentleman here would advocate the reception of such petitions, seeking, as they would, the action of this House upon subjects closed to it, and wisely so, by the Constitution itself. These considerations demonstrate, most conclusively, the fact that this clause of the Constitution only does what it was intended to do—prohibits the interference of this Government with the right of the people to make and present their petitions, leaving Congress in possession of all its proper parliamentary powers, and to the performance of all its proper duties upon its responsibility to the people, who will guard this right with becoming jealousy and caution.

But there is another illustration which will make assurance doubly sure. The circumstances under which laws are enacted frequently afford the best key to their interpretation. What were the circumstances under which this provision of the Constitution was made? In view of the fact that, in the monarchical Governments of Europe, the assembling of the people to petition for a redress of grievances was prevented by the infliction of severe penalties; and that in England—that England which then boasted of being the only free Government on earth—assemblages, beyond twenty and ten, were successively prohibited by law. The framers of the Constitution, appreciating the great value of this fundamental and salutary principle of liberty, wisely determined to secure the people of the United States against its invasion by law. Thus, sir, I flatter myself that, upon every principle of reasonable interpretation, I have demonstrated that this clause of the Constitution does not impose upon Congress the obligation of receiving or considering every class of petitions which may be presented. In the case before us, the people petitioning have exercised their constitutional right—they have petitioned, and they have presented their petitions. The question, then, is, what is the power and what is the duty of Congress in in disposing of them? It seems to me too clear for argument, that Congress should have some discretion over this question of the reception of petitions, as well in regard to its own protection from imposition and insult, as to its constitutional powers and the business of the country. Strip this House of this salutary power, and to what insult may it not be subjected; and what subjects may not madness and folly compel it to consider? Thousands and thousands of petitions may be thrown into this House, demanding its action upon the most frivolous and contemptible subjects, and couched in the most vulgar and insulting language. Shall this House have no protection against imposition and insult like this? What gentleman will say it shall not? I should like to see who it is. This discretion over the question is a necessary attribute of parliamentary power, and cannot be taken away without destroying the independence and efficiency of the body itself. This discretion, it is true, sir, should be a sound one, and not capricious or whimsical; and should be soundly exercised, always controlled by the constitutional powers of Congress, and the expediency of the objects of the petitioners. This, sir, is necessary to the body itself, and is not at war with the right of petition; it only protects this body against the abuses of his right. The gentleman from Vermont himself conceded this principle when he said that Congress was not bound to receive petitions which sought its action upon objects not within its constitutional powers; and thus concedes the whole ground upon which I base my argument.

But why argue this proposition, so clear and so plain within itself, when the very proposition to receive and consider petitions when they are presented necessarily concedes the power of the House to receive or not, as it may deem most expedient? If not, why submit the motion? Why go through the idle ceremony of proposing to the House to receive that which it has no constitutional power—no discretion whatever to refuse? There can be no reason for it whatever. But if there is a lingering doubt behind, let us recur to the "Manual" regulating the presentation and reception of petitions, and which has been adopted as the parliamentary code of this House, and I flatter myself it will be instantly removed. It will be found on page 145, sec. XIX, title "PETITIONS." In the first place, it provides that "petitions must be subscribed by the petitioners, unless they are attending." Why? Certainly, sir, to guard against imposition by forgery and aliens. If the petitioner cannot subscribe his name, he must be averred by a member. Why? To prevent imposition.

Again: "Before any petition or memorial addressed to the Senate shall be received and read at the table, whether the same shall be introduced by the President or a member, a BRIEF STATEMENT of the contents of the petition or memorial shall verbally be made by the introducer."—Rule 24.

Why this precaution? Surely, sir, to enable the Senate to determine whether the petitions are couched in decent and respectful language, and seek the action of the House upon objects within its constitutional power of relief: and such is the rule of this House also.

Again: "Regularly a motion to receive it (a petition) must be made and seconded, AND A QUESTION PUT WHETHER IT SHALL BE RECEIVED? But a cry from the House of 'received,' or even its silence, dispenses with the formality of this question. It is then to be read at the table and disposed of."

Now, sir, if a motion to receive is to be made and seconded, and a question put whether it shall be received, why make the motion—why require it to be seconded—why put the question, Shall it be received? if the House has no discretion over the question of reception? It is worse than idle to ask this House to do what it has no power to refuse. Let us suppose a case: suppose a petition presented here, which did not come in the form and with the sanctions of this rule: has this House the power to refuse to receive it? By this rule it certainly has. And if it has the discretionary power, for the want of these forms and sanctions, to refuse to receive a petition, how much more has it the power to refuse those affecting the constitutional powers, business, and decorum of the body? Sir, if Congress has no discretion upon this subject, and cannot deny the reception of petitions, then these rules themselves are unconstitutional, and invade the great right of petition. Who is prepared to press the right of petition to this extremity, and expose this House to all the lamentable consequences which would ensue? Sir, there is but little danger of this House invading the right of petition. If it does, its biennial responsibility to the people will correct the evil. I think, sir, both from the nature and necessity of the case, and the uniform action of parliamentary bodies, I have successfully demonstrated that Congress has a discretionary power over the reception of petitions; and that such a discretion is not incompatible with the right of petition, but a necessary protection against its abuse and licentiousness.

Having thus, as I think, satisfactorily proved the power of Congress over the reception of petitions, the question recurs, whether petitions praying for the abolition of "slavery" and the "slave-trade" in the District of Columbia should be received? In discussing this question, the first inquiry which presents itself is, has Congress the power to abolish "slavery" or the "slave trade," so called, in the District of Columbia? If Congress has the power, such petitions ought to be received; if not, they should not be received. At the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the District of Columbia was a component part of the States of Virginia and Maryland, and its citizens entitled to all the immunities and privileges of the people of those States, and were covered by the broad mantle of the Constitution of the United States. Virginia and Maryland were slaveholding States, and the people of the District, as a part of those communities, were a slaveholding people. In this condition they were found when the Constitution was adopted, and in this condition they were found when the cession by Virginia and Maryland was made. Now, sir, does the Constitution, or do the acts of cession, confer upon Congress the power to invade and destroy this right of property, either by express provision, or by any fair and legitimate inference? I have searched the Constitution and the acts of cession in vain for any such authority. But, sir, independent of this want of declared power, there is, in the Constitution itself, an express prohibition of power. In the fourth article of the amendments to the Constitution it is declared that—

"The right of the PEOPLE to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or thing to be seized."

The adoption of this amendment to the Constitution gave the important protection of this article to the people of the District, as citizens of the States of Virginia and Maryland, against tyranny, vexation, and oppression. Did the acts of cession strip them of it? I answer, no; unless it can be proved that the people of the District are not people of the United States; which, I imagine, no gentleman will be bold enough to assert: for the article refers, in express terms, to the "people" of the United States, and not the people of the States as States. If, then, slavery existed in the District of Columbia at the time of the cession, and the people are protected by the article of the Constitution which I have just read against unreasonable searches and seizures of their persons, houses, papers, and effects, I maintain that, by virtue of the succeeding article of amendments to the Constitution, the people of the District are equally protected against any invasion or violation of their right of property, either in slaves or any thing else. The article reads thus:

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service, in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb, nor shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of LIFE, LIBERTY, OR PROPERTY, without due process of law; nor shall PRIVATE PROPERTY be TAKEN for public use without just compensation."

Now, sir, if the people of this District are entitled to all the important privileges and immunities guarantied in this clause of the Constitution, they are as much entitled to the protection of their private property as any other right, privilege, or exemption; and, as slaves are recognised by the Constitution and laws as property, they come within the very letter of the article, and are protected. If Congress has the constitutional power to abolish slavery in this District, it has the same power to abolish the important right of trial by jury, and all the other important rights and privileges enumerated in the clauses which I have read, and to establish an unqualified despotism. Is this true? Can it be so? If the doctrine that Congress has the power contended for over slavery in this District be true, then all the other consequences necessarily follow; for all the other rights are held by the same authority, and the people of this District are in as defenceless a condition as the serfs of Russia or the vassals of Turkey. I beg gentlemen to pause before they give their sanction to a proposition replete with such dangerous and appalling consequences. Can the security of the "right of petition" require the sacrifice of such an immense amount of individual right and constitutional liberty? I put the question home to every gentleman of sober, sound judgment. To establish this right, shall all the battlements of the Constitution be broken down, and the liberties of a portion of our citizens trampled under foot? If this be the condition of the people of the District, and the Constitution of the United States be not their Constitution and their palladium of liberty, I would incite them, few as they are, to instant rebellion. But, sir, such is not the case. This Constitution is their Constitution, in common with their fellow-citizens of the States; and, by it, this species of property is secured against annihilation by the power of the Government. There is but one cause for which the Government can invade private property, and that is for "public use," and then compensation must be made. This is the only way in which the power of the Government can reach individual property, either in slaves or any thing else. I put the question, and demand an answer from the sober thought and unbiassed judgment of every gentleman present: Can the Government, from considerations of policy, destroy private rights and private property thus secured by the highest authority known to the laws—an authority paramount to that of the Government itself, and by which it exists?

But, Mr. Speaker, I contend that the acts of cession by Virginia and Maryland, in themselves, contain sufficient limitations upon the power of Congress to protect slave property from its grasp, and its subjection to the ruthless spirit of crusading fanaticism. In each of the acts of cession there is to be found the following provision:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to vest in the United States any right of property in the soil, or to affect the rights of individuals therein, otherwise than the same shall or may be transferred by such individuals to the United States."

According to the literal interpretation of this provision, it might seem that the protection intended to be afforded was simply to a right in the soil; but the whole act, taken together, and the attendant circumstances, justify a more liberal interpretation, and extend it to the protection of all private property. But, sir, this provision was totally unnecessary; for the fourth and fifth articles of the amendments to the Constitution, to which I have referred, not only protect the citizen in the enjoyment of his private property against the power of the Federal, but the power of the State Governments also; for, says the Constitution,

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the CONSTITUTION or LAWS of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

The Legislatures of the States of Virginia and Maryland had no power to abolish slavery at the time of the cession; nor could they confer it on the Federal Government, for the citizens of the District stood protected by the Constitution against the power of both. The Constitution, then, has prohibited both the Federal and State Governments from violating the rights of private property, except in the case provided for. Slaves, in the District of Columbia, are private property; and, consequently, the Constitution not only does not authorize, but expressly prohibits its abolition.

But, sir, it is contended that, if Congress has no power to abolish slavery in the District, it has the power to suppress what is tauntingly called the "slave-trade;" and that, upon this ground, abolition petitions containing this prayer should be received. This, sir, is a more daring, more unblushing proposition to violate the rights of private property, if possible, than the other. The rights of sale and purchase are necessary incidents to the rights of property; and, so long as slaves are regarded as property, they must necessarily be subjects of sale and purchase; and Congress has just as much authority to prohibit the buying and selling of horses, cattle, cotton, tobacco, and any other species of property, as the buying and selling of slaves. It is a social right to acquire and to alien property, and stands protected by the Constitution. Such an interference would be well worthy the ignorance and despotism of the dark ages. I do not doubt that, in the exercise of this right, so far as the sale of slaves is concerned, there have been abuses—many acts of cruelty and severity, revolting to the best feelings of humanity. But, sir, these abuses are not confined to the relation of master and slave: they have been sometimes perpetrated in the more endearing relations of husband and wife, parent and child, master and apprentice; and I do not doubt that, in the factories of the North, many such have been perpetrated.

[Mr. CUSHING here denied that any such abuses existed in the Northern manufactories.]

Mr. GARLAND. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that there have been, or that there are now, any such abuses; I have no personal knowledge upon the subject; I only speak what I have read and what I have heard. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts resides in the midst of them, and is intimate with them. Yet, sir, I do not imagine that he has been so constantly within all and each of them as that no abuses could have been committed without his detection. I therefore repeat that I do not doubt that many cruel inhumanities have been perpetrated in those establishments. But, however much we may lament human depravity, and mourn over these exhibitions of cruelty and suffering, we cannot control them by destroying great constitutional rights. We cannot say to a citizen of Maryland, you shall not buy property in Virginia; nor to the citizen of Virginia, you shall not purchase in Maryland. Such a prohibition would be as tyrannical and oppressive as despotism could make it; and if you could prohibit the buying and selling of slaves, by the exercise of the same power you could prohibit all intercourse between the States, by prohibiting the buying and selling of their stock, agricultural productions, and manufactures. Has the Federal Government such formidable and dangerous power as this? If it has, then, sir, we are more the subjects of an iron despotism than I could have imagined. But, sir, Congress has no power to abolish the (so called) "slave trade" in the District of Columbia.

The gentleman, not being able to find any expressly delegated authority in the Constitution or in the acts of cession for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, attempted to derive it by inference from the Constitution. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BIDDLE,) as well as the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. SLADE,) contend that it is derived from the following clause of the Constitution enumerating the powers of the Congress: "To exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, become the seat of Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings." The words which, it is argued by the gentlemen, impart this tremendous and unqualified power over the people of the District are, "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever." Let us analyze for a moment these terms, and see if they are fairly susceptible of so exclusive an interpretation. Does the expression "to exercise exclusive legislation" impart this unlimited power? Certainly not; for the word "exclusive," according to the most approved lexicographers, merely signifies "having the power of excluding," "debarring from participation," "opposed to including," "excepting," and, in the sense employed in this clause of the Constitution, signifies a power of legislation exclusive of all other legislative power, but does not indicate unqualified and unlimited powers of legislation. By the cession, Virginia and Maryland could not have imparted such a mass of unlimited powers, nor could Congress have acquired them at the time of the cession; the District was subject to the legislative jurisdictions of Virginia and Maryland; and this provision does no more than exclude those jurisdictions, and confer it upon Congress.

But it is contended that the words "in all cases whatsoever" embrace the whole circle of legislative powers, and confer them upon Congress. Can this be so, Mr. Speaker? Do not these few words destroy the whole complexion of the Constitution, and prostrate at the feet of a despicable aristocratic despotism all the constitutional rights and privileges of the citizens of the District? If this interpretation be true, it does. Let us examine it, and see if it be true. If these words convey this unchecked and unlimited power of legislation, then are all the barriers of the Constitution interposed between the Government and the citizen broken down, and the acts of Congress alone, liable every day to be altered, amended, or repealed, the only Constitution of the people of this District. This would of itself be a sufficient refutation of the argument. But, sir, let it be remembered that the 4th and 5th articles which I have read are articles of the amended Constitution, adopted after the ratification of the Constitution containing this power of "exclusive legislation," and are in themselves limitations and restrictions upon this exclusive power of unlimited legislation, even if it existed before the adoption of these amendments, and are as available to the people of this District as to any other portion of the people of the United States. If, under the wide range of these words, "exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever," contended for by gentlemen, Congress has power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, it has power at its discretion to search and seize the persons, houses, papers, and effects of the people of the District, take from them the right of trial by jury, and confiscate their property without compensation; for these great rights, these great securities against tyranny and oppression, are not more strongly secured by the Constitution than the rights of property in slaves; and if one can be broken down, so can the other. I call upon gentlemen who maintain this claim of wholesale power to point out in what part of the Constitution these great attributes of liberty are secured against the power of this Government, by which the right of individual property is not alike secured. They cannot do it, for the same articles and the same clauses which secure the one, secure the other.

But, sir, by way of conclusive illustration of the truth of my position, let us reverse the case. Suppose, sir, instead of the location of the District here—for the Constitution makes no location—it had been made in a non-slaveholding State—Pennsylvania or New York, for instance; and the people of the South had petitioned Congress to institute slavery in the midst of a non-slaveholding people: what would Pennsylvanians and New Yorkers have said? Would this clause of the Constitution have authorized it? and would the Representatives from these States have contended so manfully for the reception of such petitions? No, sir, no. The case would have been altered, and their sentiments would have been altered, when we were seeking to conform their institutions to ours, instead of their seeking to conform our institutions to theirs. We should then have heard but little of this immense sweep of legislative power, and the danger to which the great right of petition was exposed by refusing to receive such petitions.

But, sir, the article from which this immense mass of legislative power is derived, contains within itself its own interpretation, and the motive of its adoption. In addition to the power of "exclusive legislation" in the District, the power to "exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings," is also given; the object of which was to prevent the clashing of National and State jurisdiction, to secure National property against State authority, and the dangerous collisions between Federal and State authority which might grow out of it, and not to confer upon the Federal Government unlimited and despotic power. Sir, gentlemen seem not to discriminate between the power to regulate and the power to destroy property. These arguments, Mr. Speaker, I think are conclusive that the words "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever" do not confer upon Congress the extraordinary and unlimited powers contended for by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (MR. BIDDLE,) but that they are limited, by the Constitution itself, within the bounds prescribed for the action of this Government.

SPEECH OF MR. ADAMS,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In the House of Representatives, January 22, 1840—On the subject of Abolition Petitions.

Mr. ADAMS, of Massachusetts, offered the following:

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of this House, to be numbered the 21st:

"Every petition presented by the Speaker, or by any member, with a brief verbal statement of its contents, shall be received, unless objection be made to its reception for special reason; and whenever objection shall be made to the reception of a petition, the name of the member objecting, and the reason of the objection, shall be entered upon the journal. The question in every such case shall be, Shall the petition be rejected? and no petition shall be rejected but by a majority of the members present."

Mr. ADAMS said it was his intention to detain the House but for a short period; indeed, he had been much inclined to suffer the question on the resolution, which after many attempts he had at length succeeded in presenting to the House, to be taken without debate. The proposition (said Mr. A.) is a very simple one, and relates to the reception of petitions presented to this House on any and all subjects. It is not confined to petitions praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade in the District of Columbia; nor to any other of that class of petitions, commonly known by the name of abolition petitions: a term exceedingly indefinite in itself, and in regard to which this House has had a ten-days debate without coming to any understanding as to what is meant by it. I shall not now enter upon that subject at all, nor shall I discuss the subject of abolition, nor of slavery, nor of the slave-trade in any form. If I were to do so, I should think it necessary to enlarge the field very much. As it is, a vast amount of time has been expended without coming to an issue of any consequence whatever to this House or to the country. I say this, because, on the propositions relating to memorials on abolition, the classes of those memorials are so very imperfectly defined that no man in this House knows what memorials would be received, and what would be rejected, under any of the resolutions which have been offered. To exemplify: the first class of these memorials pray for the abolition of slavery and of the slave-trade in the District of Columbia. Well, gentlemen have wasted their eloquence in making constitutional objections against the reception of such memorials by this House, contending that Congress has no power to legislate on that subject. Admit that, (which I do not,) but supposing it is a valid reason for the rejection of all petitions on this subject, there is another class which pray for the abolition of slavery and of the slave trade in the Territory of Florida. What becomes of all these constitutional objections when the question relates to the Territories? That case presents a different question, and must be met by a different argument. Supposing, however, both these classes of memorials to be included in your resolution, there is still another class, which pray that no new State shall be admitted into the Union whose constitution tolerates the existence of slavery. Not one of the arguments which we have supposed valid against the other classes of petitions applies to this class; and supposing you to exclude all which relate to slavery in this District or in the Territory, that does not exclude these, and as soon as one of them shall be presented, the whole subject of slavery and of the slave-trade will be as completely open to discussion as it would have been on the other classes of memorials. A fourth class relates to the admission of the Territory of Florida as a slave State. Congress has the constitutional power to admit or not to admit; the question then arises, shall Florida be received or not received? And here again is the whole subject open to discussion. I shall not enter on the discussion, but I say that these memorials throw the whole subject open as much as any of those which have been specified in the resolution under discussion. But, besides all these, there is another and a distinct class of petitions, which pray for the establishment of diplomatic relations with the Republic of Hayti. I do not believe that it is in the mind of any gentleman in this House to raise a constitutional question on that subject. It is indisputably in the power of Congress to act on such a prayer; and when such a memorial shall be brought up here, the whole subject of slavery and of the slave trade is as fully open for discussion as it could have been on a petition praying for the abolition of slavery in this District. I will not go further; but I put it to gentlemen who complain of the waste of time, and of the agitation in the country, occasioned by the reception of abolition memorials, to inquire of themselves, and answer to themselves, how long they think that the discussion of slavery and of the slave trade can be excluded from this House? I ask whether they expect to suppress that discussion here, by refusing to receive petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia? Supposing a resolution passes that petitions on this specific subject shall be excluded, you do not get rid of the general subject; it goes further. I ask, again, is there here any individual who has the slightest fear of any member rising in his place and offering a resolution to abolish slavery and the slave-trade in the District of Columbia? I wish they would only allow it to be done, that they may see what number of votes can be obtained in support of such a proposition. I say this in kindness to the South; if their object is to put down petitions of that character, I do in my conscience believe that the first thing they should do is to admit them to be presented. If, out of the whole two hundred and forty votes, such a measure receives ten, I shall be much surprised. As to myself, I have long ago professed my belief on the subject. From the time that I first entered this House, (which is now, I think, between eight and nine years,) I have always declared that I am not prepared for the immediate abolition of slavery in this District; and since the adjournment of the last Congress I have explicitly and publicly avowed my sentiments on that matter to the very petitioners who pray for it, and who have sent me their memorials to be presented here. With the exception of my friend from Vermont, over the way, (Mr. SLADE,) who, I am obliged to believe, is prepared for such a measure, I do not know another gentleman in this House who I think would go for it. There may be many others; I do not say there are not; but I do not myself know of one, nor do I believe that ten votes could be got for such a proposition in this House. And even my friend from Vermont himself, whose able argument against slavery, delivered last week, was not as much attended to in this House as it will be by this nation—even he, who, I believe, once offered to introduce a bill for that object, declared to us, in that argument, that abolitionists generally attributed far more importance to the measure than he himself did. I take it for granted that he would vote for such a measure; but I think it at the same time extremely likely that, when the House came to be divided, he would find himself in the "glorious minority of one." I say again to gentlemen of the South, If you want peace, if your object is to allay agitation, if you want to see what is the real opinion of the Representatives of the North, be they Whigs or Administration men, offer yourselves, or get some one else to offer, a resolution for the immediate abolition of slavery in this District, and call the yeas and nays upon it; then you will understand what is our feeling on that subject, and what is the feeling of our constituents. As matters now stand, we often hear one of the gentlemen of the South speak our own opinions more nearly than any one from the North. I believe that this is true in most cases. But what I now say is, that you cannot suppress a discussion on slavery by suppressing petitions for its abolition in this District; and what I say of one class of petitions, I say of them all. I have now in my drawer not less than a hundred and fifty of them, waiting till we shall be allowed an opportunity to present them to the House; and I will here say that I think these petitioners have ground to inquire of this House how it happened that, while the reception of petitions is pre-eminently and most emphatically the business of this House, we have been fifty days in session, and yet the Representatives from only two States have been permitted to present the petitions of their constituents. I have petitions of great importance on other subjects, entirely distinct from abolition, which I am waiting to present here; but I cannot, because this question is now brought up, and the House is openly called upon to suppress the right of petition; and we are here debating, from day to day, about excluding one petty class of petitions relating to an object for which none would vote if they were received. I hope to be discharged from the responsibility of consuming the time of the House on such a matter as this. I have been charged with it. The House has been heretofore debating for weeks, and I have been most unjustly charged with it all, but I cannot be charged with it now. I say to this House and to this nation, that I have no part of the blame. Who is the responsible person upon a debate which has occupied eight or ten days? On the 30th of December, almost immediately after the House was organized, (or rather, let me say, organized in part, for we are not more than half organized to this hour,) a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. WISE,) whom I am sorry not to see in his place, and for the cause of whose absence I am still more sorry, presented a resolution which I believe is identically the same with that now before the House. He presented it out of order—contrary to the rules; so that he was obliged to move that the rules be suspended for its introduction; but he could not carry that motion. There was the first step in this matter. At that time not a single petition had yet been presented. There was the beginning of this debate. The next day he renewed his motion, and it again failed. The gentleman then gave notice to the House that he would renew the same motion every day of the session till the object should be granted. I thought at that time that it was not in order to repeat a proposition which had once been rejected, but the Chair ruled otherwise. The gentleman, however, thought better of the matter, as most of us ought to do in regard to what we often say in the heat of debate, and he did not renew his motion; but, not satisfied with the stoppage which had thus been put to an exciting debate, a colleague of the gentleman (Mr. COLES) offered another resolution on the same subject, in these words:

"All petitions, memorials, and papers touching the abolition of slavery, or the buying, selling, or transferring of slaves in any State, District, or Territory of the United States, shall, upon their presentation, be laid on the table without being debated, printed, read, or referred; and no further action whatever shall be had thereon."

There was this difference between the two propositions: The proposition of the latter gentleman did not make the question of reception the issue; that of the other gentleman (which is the proposition now before the House) did make the question of reception the issue. The one proposed to hang up between heaven and earth the question of reception, so that nobody should know whether abolition memorials were received or not; and we had an edifying debate on that very question, in the course of which I recollect that an astute gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. UNDERWOOD) said that his vote, for or against the resolution, would depend on that point; but that, as the resolution stood, he could not tell whether the memorials were received or not. [Laughter.] I say, sir, the question of reception was suspended between earth and heaven, or between earth and——another place. [Loud laughter.] The resolution now before us does not leave the question of reception in that extraordinary predicament; it is framed in such a manner that, according to a decision made by your predecessor in that chair, (Mr. Speaker Polk,) the fact of the reception of the memorials is established; for that precise question was brought to him in regard to the same proposition now before us, and which was adopted by the last Congress. I say the question was then specifically made, whether petitions, under the effect of that rule, were or were not received by the House; and the then Speaker of the House decided that they were. I presume, therefore, that all the abolition memorials then presented remain still on file in the Clerk's office. Well, this second proposition (Mr. COLES's) again failed, because two-thirds of the House were not willing to receive it; but then came the self-same proposition in the form of an amendment to a report of the Committee on the Revised Rules of Order; and that is the position of it at this time. We are now discussing it as an amendment to the rules of this House, and in that form it did not require a vote of two-thirds to introduce it. It was therefore received and discussed, and, after discussion, was laid on the table by a majority of the House. Still, I say that the whole discussion, in all its forms, has taken place by the agency of gentlemen representing the southern portion of this Union; and, whatever agitation the discussion may have produced either in or out of the House, lies at their door, not at ours—especially not at mine, for I have taken no part in it, unless it has been for the last eight or ten days to worry the Speaker every morning till I could get my resolution before the House. [A laugh.]

I shall not now enter on the great and wide question of slavery or the slave-trade in any State, District, Territory, dominion, or nation on the face of the globe. The subject is too large. I hope the day will come when I shall have an opportunity of delivering my opinions on that whole subject, but I assure gentlemen that I shall not attempt it on a little petty resolution about the reception of petitions. There are ways enough to get at the subject. I could bring it into this House to-morrow. I can tell gentlemen that it will come upon this House in forms very different from this; and, to give the House a piece of my mind, I think it ought to have been before this House already. It should have formed one of the topics of the President's message. Here are at this moment four States of this Union on the verge of civil war, avowedly on this very subject; and we see no more mention of it in the essage, than if those States were in the moon. Do gentlemen from Virginia, from New York, from Georgia, from Maine, from New Hampshire, expect that this question is not to come before Congress?—that it will not be discussed here in all its breadth and length and depth? Very well, gentlemen—go on—to sleep and to slumber; but remember you will be waked from your sleep by voices more than from the dead. I say again, to gentlemen of the North, and gentlemen of the South, you cannot keep that discussion out of this House; and you will soon give up trying to do so, by passing small resolutions about abolition petitions.

And now, having discharged myself, and those with whom I act, from all the responsibility of this debate, I will relieve the South also from all responsibility—at least so far as moral principle goes—by rendering to them here my public thanks for having opened the question. I believe the time thus far consumed in that discussion has been time well spent. We have listened to speeches of great ability on both sides; we have heard slavery defended by all that can be said in its defence, and the cause of freedom advocated—I will not say by all that can be said in its behalf—but at least by something. The reserve has been all on that side. Indeed, I do not think that any gentleman has attempted formally to contend for it, but my friend from Vermont (Mr. SLADE.) All the speeches I have heard, save one by the gentleman behind me, (Mr. GRANGER,) have been on the other side. Gentlemen from the North have shown us how far they can go in supporting the rights of the South. That has been the subject; that has been the argument. They have been arguing the cause of slavery, although they are the Representatives only of freemen. The cause of freedom, in all its power, has not even been touched, save by the gentleman from Vermont; and even by him rather in the way of apology for the unfortunate abolitionists, than by appeals to the laws of God, the laws of Nature, and the Declaration of Independence. When the general subject comes to be discussed, I trust that it will be argued on those grounds; that we shall not merely attempt to apologize for a certain class of petitioners, but that the appeal will be to the laws of God, the laws of Nature, and the Declaration of Independence made by the original thirteen States of this Union, among whom I can bring gentlemen high and illustrious names from Virginia, from Georgia, and from South Carolina. That is the ground that will be taken by the defenders of freedom. But I will not now enter into that question. The resolution I now offer refers simply to the rules of the House; that is the subject we are discussing.

[Mr. COOPER, of Georgia, here interposed and begged leave to correct the honorable gentleman in one particular. The gentleman had made one broad remark, which might seem to cover Mr. C. It was, that all had been said in this debate which could be said in defence of slavery. Mr. C. disavowed having entered upon the general question of slavery at all: he had only endeavored to defend those who held property in slaves under the Constitution.]

Mr. ADAMS resumed. I did not understand the honorable gentleman otherwise. I did not mean to say more than that he thus defined the Constitution as making property of human beings. That is what I call slavery. But the question is now on the rules; and the immediate question before the House is on the resolution moved by the gentleman from South Carolina, in these words:

"Resolved, That, upon the presentation of any memorial or petition praying for the abolition of slavery or the slave-trade in any District, Territory, or State of the Union, and upon the presentation of any resolution or other paper touching that subject, the reception of such memorial, petition, resolution, or paper shall be considered as objected to; and the question of its reception shall be laid on the table, without debate or further action thereon."

This is identically the same resolution which was offered by the first gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. WISE,) and which seems intended to get rid of the question of reception by suspending it between the two parts of the universe I referred to, leaving it utterly uncertain whether these petitions are received by the House or not. That, of itself, is objection enough to me; and I will say, for a high-minded chevalier, which I consider the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. THOMPSON) to be, as brave and gallant as Bayard, without fear and without reproach, it seems to me a very small way of getting rid of the question, to hang it up between those two places. He will not say, reject it; no. He will not say, receive it; no. He will not reject it or receive it, but lay the question of reception on the table; so that neither this House, nor the Clerk, nor the world, shall know whether it is received or not. It seems to me that it would be more bold, open, and candid, and better becoming the gentleman, to say one thing or the other: yet I will say the same thing in regard to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. WISE,) which I have said of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. THOMPSON.) I highly respect him. I believe him to be an honest, fair, open-hearted, open-mouthed man; [laughter;] and I respect and honor him for it. Sir, I am a Yankee, and Yankees are said to be famous for their trickery in public dealing. How that may be, I do not know; but to me it seems that this resolution as well deserves the character of a "wooden nutmeg" as if it had come from the acutest of Yankee pedlars. [Loud laughter.] I know that neither of these gentlemen would ever have proposed to dispose of the question in this way, if they had not found, from experience, that they could not get rid of these abolition memorials in a manner more agreeable to them. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WISE) is for rejecting them at once—for refusing to receive them, and for openly saying so to the world. Where the expedient of hanging up the question of reception came from, I do not know; I hope it did not come from Yankee land. [A voice. Yes it did; it came from New Hampshire.] Well, wherever it came from, I wash my hands of it. That is the proposition, however, on which the House will be called to vote by yeas and nays, if they reject mine that is the proposition on which the previous question was called yesterday, and it failed but by a single vote; and I say that, if Southern gentlemen declare themselves to be ashamed of it, I hope they will vote against it.

Now, sir, I will state to the House why I propose that my resolution shall be entered as the 21st rule of the House.

The 20th rule declared—

"As soon as the Journal is read, the Speaker shall call for petitions from the members of each State, and delegates from each Territory, begining with Maine and the Territory of Wiskonsin, alternately; and if, on any day, the whole of the States and Territories shall not be called, the Speaker shall begin on the next day where he left off the previous day: provided that, after the first thirty days of the session, petitions shall not be received, except on the first day of the meeting of the House in each week."

And the 21st rule, which now immediately follows it, provides—

"The petitions having been presented and disposed of, reports from committees shall be called for and disposed of; in doing which, the Speaker shall call upon each standing committee, in the order they are named in the 70th and 98th rules; and when all the standing committees have been called on, then it shall be the duty of the Speaker to call for reports from select committees; if the Speaker shall not get through the call upon the commitees before the House passes to other business, he shall resume the next call where he left off. Resolutions shall then be called for in the same order, and disposed of by the same rules, which apply to petitions: provided that no member shall offer more than one resolution, or one series of resolutions, all relating to the same subject, until all the States and Territories shall have been called."

I would place mine between the two; and here, as a justification for my extreme anxiety on the subject of the right of petition, I will ask the attention of the House to the order of business which these rules establish. What is it? The very first business in order is to receive petitions; and this regulation dates from the beginning of the Government. There is a reason for it. What is Government instituted for, but to redress the grievances of the people? What is the object of all government? What are we here for? What is the Constitution for? Why does Congress meet every year, if not for the redress of grievances? All else is of subordinate importance. The appropriation bills are very important for the conducting of the Government, and for performing its duties of justice to the people. But what else have we to do but to redress grievances? It is therefore just and reasonable that the first thing the House does should be to inquire what grievances are to be redressed. But how can we know this, unless the people tell us? The right of petition, therefore, is essential to the very existence of government: it is the right of the people over the Government: it is their right, and they may not be deprived of it. I presume it will be admitted here, so thoroughly is this the fact, that if that amendment of the Constitution by which Congress are prohibited from interfering with the right of petition had not been adopted, the right would nevertheless have existed just as really as it now does. The amendment insisting on its preservation was adopted at the instance of the great and glorious Old Dominion. It was inserted then, not to confer the right, but to secure it against violation by Congress. Will any man say that the right to petition Government would not exist, unless written down in the Constitution? It is interwoven with the nature of Government itself; it does not belong to a republic alone, or to a monarchy, or to an aristocracy, but is common to them all. The greatest despot on the globe is compelled to receive petitions from his meanest subject. The Grand Turk never rides out but he is besieged with petitions, and he is obliged to receive them all. Holding, then, that this right is founded in the immortal nature of man, who petitions his Maker, I am against all abridgment of it. But, color it as you please, the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina does abridge this right; for, if you say that you will not receive certain petitions, or if you will not tell whether you receive them or not, I say it is the same thing, in the result, as if you rejected those petitions. And when this is done, not in regard to one petition, or twenty petitions, but to a whole class of petitions, without distinct specification, it amounts to the exercise of an arbitrary discretion in this House whether the House will receive any petition or not. I say you cannot specify any one class of excluded petitions without claiming the right of extending your interdict to all other classes of them.

A very luminous illustration of this is to be found in the practice of the British House of Commons. I remember that, at the last session, the practice of that House was adduced here to justify the refusal of abolition petitions, and we had long arguments to show that there was a discretion in this House as to the reception of petitions, because there was such a discretion in the House of Commons. There is such a discretion in that House, but it extends to one class of petitions only; there is one class which the House of Commons does not receive. When a petition of this class is presented, if objection is made, the petition is refused to be received. I do not, of course, when I say one class, refer to petitions which contain insulting language and are disrespectful to the Government. Nobody pretends that petitions of this description ought to be received by any legislative body; that fact alone is a valid reason for their rejection; but, besides these, there is one class, and one only, which the House of Commons excludes, and those are petitions against taxation. The House of Commons, being a taxing machine, cannot bear to hear petitions against the exercise of its taxing power. If any gentleman will take the trouble to look into Hatsell's Book of Precedents, he will find, that when the petitions of the people of America against the stamp act were presented in Parliament, this rule was applied to them, and they were accordingly not received. There is another instance recorded of the same kind: it is a petition to the King from the first Congress of the United States. The King referred it to the House of Commons: the petition itself may be found in the journals of the old Congress: it was addressed to the King in 1775, and Sir George Saville, it is said, offered to present the petition, (much of the style of some entries made here, of late years, in our Journals.) The name of Sir George Saville is well known as the friend of liberty. It is an historical name, venerable in his native country as it is throughout the civilized world. This gentleman, it is said, "offered to present the petition of persons styling themselves Representatives of the People of the North American Colonies." Objection was made, and an argument ensued which I should be glad to read if there was time to do so. It is the very argument which we now hear in this House. It prevailed then and there. And the petition of our Representatives was in consequence rejected. And these, sir, are the precedents from the House of Commons which were openly adduced in this House (and I do not know but they may be adduced again) to prove the right of the House to refuse abolition petitions!

Now, to apply this to my argument. If this House, on the force of these precedents, is justified in the principle that it may reject abolition petitions, I ask if the same precedent is not much more powerful, and still more in point, if applied to petitions which relate to the tariff? The parallel would then run on all fours. Then the precedent of the House of Commons would be of authority. If it has any force in the one class of petitions, it has still more in relation to the other. I ask gentlemen from the North, and gentlemen from the South, are you ready to reject petitions against duties imposed for the revenue? The rule includes the resolutions of State Legislatures. I repeat, that if you can reject abolition memorials because the House of Commons rejects memorials against taxes, you can reject petitions against all taxation; and the precedent is of stronger authority. If you can do it in relation to one class, you can do it in relation to any other class; and if you can do it in relation to the petitions of whole classes of individuals, you can do it to the petition of any one individual. Nay, I think I heard it expressly argued here, that the right of petition is not infringed when you reject a single petition, because the Constitution says that the people have a right to "assemble" to petition Congress for a redress of grievances. So there must be an assembly of the people, or else the rejection of their petitions is not unconstitutional! I say that argument will apply precisely. If once you admit the principle that the House has a discretionary power to reject petitions, the question will at last be made here, whether the petitioner is of the politics of the majority or of the minority. That will be the next step; and when that step is taken, what will have become of the right of petition?

One objection I have to the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina is, that it is a novelty, and that in two respects. Heretofore, to my extreme grief, sorrow, and, I would add, indignation, if that were of any avail, this House, during the four or five sessions last past, has sanctioned the reception of abolition memorials, and has then ordered them to lie on the table without being read, printed, or acted on in any way. That measure I consider as another wooden nutmeg; it is an expedient to get rid of the consideration of these memorials, and yet to escape the odium of refusing to receive them. That is a distinction of great power with some Northern gentlemen. If you only receive the memorial, they are satisfied; no matter whether you ever read it or look it again. But they will never refuse to receive a petition! Oh, no, sir! But they will not hear them read. That is the argument of one class of reasoners. Still this was something. And, since the question has been up, we have twice had the precise question of reception put to the House, and the yeas and nays called upon it. In examining those yeas and nays, I find that the very distinguished gentleman from New York, over the way, (Mr. VANDERPOEL,) who is ready thus sternly to suspend the question, did vote for reception. Well, sir, every man has his own system of logic. For my own part, I thank no gentleman, either in the name of these petitioners or in my own name, for receiving their petitions, and then laying them on the table without being read. Nay, sir, to me it is insignificant whether they are read or not, unless they are considered. It is the right of the petitioner, and the duty of this House, that, when a petition is presented to it, the House should inform itself what that petition contains—should then consider, and then answer it. As the practice of the British House of Commons has been visited on us in debate, and is likely to be again, I will read from Hatsell:

"We learn, from an examination of all these instances, that this practice has been confined, as it ought to be most strictly, to the refusing to receive such petitions only as object against a tax which the House of Commons is imposing for the current service of the year; and that it has never been applied to petitions which have been offered in a subsequent session, desiring a repeal or reconsideration of the taxes imposed in a former. Indeed, the House ought to be particularly cautious not to be over rigid in extending this rule beyond what the practice of their ancestors, in former times, can justify. To receive and hear and consider the petitions of their fellow-subjects, when presented decently, and containing no matter intentionally offensive to the House, is a duty incumbent upon them, antecedent to all rules and orders that may have been instituted for their own convenience: justice and the laws of their country demand it from them."

This is the comment of Hatsell; and is there any discovery in that? Is it not a dictate of common sense? When you assume the right of petition, does not that right, in all sound logic and in all moral principle, carry with it the duty to receive, hear, and consider petitions? If not, then is the guaranty of that right the greatest of mockery? This House says to an American citizen, "O yes! you have certainly the right to petition, but I will neither read, hear, nor consider your petition when you send it." Sir, what difference is there between saying this, and telling the man at once you have not the right to petition us? You only cheat the man by a false pretence, while you give him a right which you take care shall be of no avail. This is the objection I have to all resolutions which refuse the hearing of petitions. This House should speak the language of a great and generous nation; it should deal with the people in a fair, open, and candid way; and it is not so dealing to say to them, We will receive your petitions, but we will not consider them. If you refuse to hear and consider, as well as to receive, you do in substance deny the right to petition. Sir, decent language will not express what you do. It is conduct that would be unworthy of a single individual, and is vastly more so of the Representatives of this great and mighty nation.

I have already stated the substance of another objection to the resolution—namely, that it will not answer its purpose. If you succeed in rejecting all these memorials, you have not thereby got rid of the question. You will have the question of slavery and of abolition forced upon you every day; you cannot keep it out of the House; and, if you persevere, you will, before you are aware of it, have a civil war raging, while you are excluding the only means that can put an end to it.

I have not taken up, neither will I, the correspondence between the Governors of Virginia and New York, and between the Governors of Georgia and Maine, presenting, as it does, a state of things on which the House at this moment ought, in my opinion, to be deliberating. What is the substance of this correspondence? It is a difference of opinion as to the interpretation of the Constitution. They discuss that difference with great ability on both sides, but they come to no agreement. The Governor of Virginia says that the Governor of New York must give up the point, or——

[At this point Mr. ADAMS was arrested by the Chair, and it was declared not in order to discuss this correspondence.

Mr. ADAMS. Others have spoken of it without being rebuked.

CHAIR. It cannot be done but by consent of the House.

Mr. COOPER, of Georgia. I have no objection to the gentleman's proceeding, so far as New York and Virginia are concerned; but when he comes to Georgia, I give notice that I shall object.

A VOICE. You yourself alluded to the subject.

Mr. COOPER. Yes, but I was called to order.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON. The gentleman from Massachusetts is strictly in order, and I hope he will be allowed to proceed. The question must come up.

Cries of "Go on! Go on!"]

I was going to observe that, in the last sentence of this correspondence, the Governor of Virginia declares that, unless the Governor of New York recedes from his position, either there must be an amendment of the Constitution, or Virginia must recur to first principles and take her rights into her own hands. I pretend not to give the precise words, but that is the substance. Now, I enter not into this question. I said I would not. I ask not which is right—the Governor of New York or the Governor of Virginia; but here is a State which is in population and in wealth the first in the Union, and in intelligence equal to any other; and here is another State, equally distinguished in this Union, equally respected and beloved by me; both are at that point with each other as sovereign States. I ask how long this question is to be kept out of this House? I have named four States, but there are also two other States, of most respectable character, who were recently in the same condition, and who negotiated between themselves and agreed upon some sort of a compromise. The compromise may prove satisfactory, though I doubt it. The principle in question was as much contested between these States, as between Georgia and Maine; and to-morrow Massachusetts and South Carolina may be in the same condition. Sir, there are no two States in the Union—one of them slaveholding, and the other not—which may not be in that condition from day to day. And are we to continue under a state of things, progressing, as such a state of things naturally does, and must, from words to action? For I take it for granted that the Governor of Virginia is no bully; that he did not expect to frighten the Empire State by his message. Suppose these two great States were to come to action; is that a subject to be kept out of this House? No, sir; it cannot be; and therefore I say that the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina is small and paltry. Nor is that of the gentleman from Virginia any better. I do not attribute the fault to those gentlemen; it lies in the nature of the thing itself—it is fanning the sun with a peacock's feather to make it cool. The resolution will not answer its purpose, and its only effect will be to agitate and vex a number of petitioners as respectable as any others in the Union. It cannot suppress the discussion of the subject. I say, again, I thank the gentlemen of the South for having opened that discussion fully. I do not conceive that the eight or ten days expended in the debate have been lost time; much has been said that will be considered. Such discussion has a tendency to bring the parties together, not to alienate them. Let us say what we have to say. Say what you have to say, and then we must come to some compromise, which is required on both sides. This has been done before; it was done in the Convention which formed the Constitution. The discussion was as heating then as it is now; yet they came to an understanding—they agreed upon a compromise. It is true, they were obliged to resort to a little external interference by prayer for it, (and I should be glad we did the same now, and that we had a Chaplain to perform the duty;) still the two parties came together, and they have kept together for fifty years. Do gentlemen from the South believe that, by excluding these memorials, they will ever convert our petitioners? Do you believe it? Do you expect to bring them to your terms? I heard two of the gentlemen yesterday say that, as to slavery, they should not discuss it; they had nothing to say about it; and so says the Governor of Virginia. And what does the Governor of New York say in reply? I did not ask you to discuss it; I did not put it in issue. So we say now. Gentlemen of the South, we do not interfere with you and your institutions. Keep your institutions! Cherish them! Hold them for BLESSING! We shall not disturb either your creed or your practice; but on subjects in which we are as much interested as you, and when the matter has come to a question of peace or war, freemen can stand upon their rights as well as the holders of slaves. When Jove appeals to his thunder, the fable tells us that Jove is wrong. Why will you not discuss this question? Do you fear the argument? If not, why do you refuse to enter into it? If you are so firm, so confident, so immovably resolute, why will you not speak? I call upon you to speak; explain this subject to us who do not understand it. Show us the "blessings" of this institution. Let us look at them. I believe some of you think that slavery is a blessing which we ought to take to ourselves. If so, give us your reasons; show us how it will be for our interest, and how it can be made to conform to our sense of duty. Perhaps we shall come round; who knows but you may convert us? [A laugh.] I do not resist; I am open to conviction. Suppose you try it.

The Governor of Virginia, when he puts on his armor, and clothes himself in complete steel, cries, "I am ready to fight on the question;" and so say the gentleman from South Carolina and the gentleman from Virginia; but I beg leave to say to them that the tone of defiance is not the tone to make peace. No; defend your own institutions as you think proper; if they are assailed by violence, defend them by violence; but if not, I say to those gentlemen, come and let us reason together; let us have a cool, dispassionate comparison of opinion. That is my wish; that, I think, is the true course.

But the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina goes, in two particulars, further than ever this House has gone before. Heretofore, the House, by special resolution, has declared that memorials shall be received and laid on the table without reading, but the effect of the resolution has always been confined to that particular session in which it has passed. But now here is a step forward in the process of rejecting petitions; the petitions are not received, but the question of their reception is suspended. That is one step. Then the resolution, instead of applying to this session only, is proposed as a standing rule of the House. Of course, it will extend through two sessions at least, and, by the ordinary practice which has hitherto prevailed, of adopting the rules of order of a previous session, the rule will, in fact, become, in some respects, a permanent law of the House. On both these grounds I object to it; and I call the attention of the House to an observation of the gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. TILLINGHAST,) which struck me when it was made with peculiar force. These petitions are addressed to the Senate and the House of Representatives—to the whole Congress. The petitioners have as much right to go before the Senate as before the House of Representatives. If you interrupt the progress of their petition by refusing to receive it, or, still more, by suspending the question of its reception, you deprive them of their privilege of going before the Senate. It is a double violation of their right of petition. I know it may be said that the petitioners are at liberty to present another copy of their memorial to the Senate. That is true; but if you suspend the question of reception, you deprive them, in effect, just as much; for, let them present their memorials as they will to the Senate, when they come to the House, here is the rule; for under this resolution I suppose you will not receive a bill from the Senate on the subject of abolition, any more than you will receive a petition. I say, then, that you deprive a whole class of petitioners, and that the largest class of any in the country, of all hearing not only in this House, but in the Senate also.

Now my proposition is very simple. It is this:

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of this House, to be numbered the 21st:

"Every petition presented by the Speaker, or by any member, with a brief verbal statement of its contents, shall be received, unless objection be made to its reception for special reason; and whenever objection shall be made to the reception of a petition, the name of the member objecting, and the reason of the objection, shall be entered upon the journal. The question in every such case shall be, Shall the petition be rejected? and no petition shall be rejected, but by a majority of the members present."

It will be observed that this resolution, if adopted, does not specify in what manner the petitions shall be treated after they are received. I say this by way of answering a large portion of the gentlemen on the other side, who wasted a vast deal of argument by putting supposed cases of the presentation of absurd and unconstitutional petitions. I do not deny the right of the House to refuse to receive a petition when it is first presented; but I wish all petitions to be received, unless their reception is specially objected to. What shall be done with them afterwards, is for the House to determine. What I want to settle is, the principle that the right of petition includes within it the right of having petitions received, unless special objection exists against it; and to show whether this is the case, I require the name of the person objecting and the reasons of the objection to be entered on the journals of the House. Now it is possible for the House to adopt this resolution, and yet to pass another that the petitions, when received, shall neither be read nor considered. But if the House shall adopt this resolution, I confess that it is my impression that there is not a man in this House who will be willing to record as the ground of his objection to its being received, that it is an abolition petition. There may be some—there may be many; but I believe that, if the question of reception is put to the House, they cannot get a majority to vote against it.

I do not believe that there is a man here who is willing to have such a thing go upon the record in a single case; and if there is—there may be many for aught I know—but if there is, put the question to the decision of the House, and see how the majority will go. I do not believe that you can get a majority for it, if there is a man that would move it; and for this reason: by receiving a petition, you decide nothing, and I was willing to put upon the record my acknowledgment of the right of the House to reject petitions. I fully and freely admit it; but I say it must be done for a special reason, which must be assigned on the journal, to go before the world—before posterity; and if there is a gentleman here who would not scruple at putting his name to such an objection on the journal, I will answer for it that in twenty years hence he and his children would blush to see his name with such an addition to it, come he from the North or the South, or where he may. If you adopt my resolution, you only settle the principle that all petitions shall be received, unless a special objection, which is to be entered on the journal, shall be made; and then that there shall be a special vote upon it by the House. Rely upon it, that, if this resolution passes, you will hear no more objections, not only to the reception of the petition, but to its reference; to the hearing it; to considering it, which is as much the duty of the House as to receive it. I am willing to rest it upon this. I am willing to admit the right of the House to refuse to receive, in any case in which a majority of the House is willing that the reason for rejecting the petition shall go upon the journal.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I have no more to say. I will not enter upon the subject of slavery or the slave-trade in the District of Columbia.

SPEECH OF MR. GARLAND,

But, Mr. Speaker, there is still a further limitation upon the power of Congress, which confines its action to the expressly delegated powers, and leaves it no pretext for assuming powers not prohibited. The proviso to the act of cession by Virginia says:

"That the jurisdiction of the laws of this Commonwealth over the persons and property of individuals residing within the limits of the cession aforesaid, shall not cease or determine until Congress, having accepted said cession, shall, by law, provide for the government thereof, under their jurisdiction, in manner provided by the article before recited."

The article referred to is the 8th section of the 1st article, enumerating and delegating the legislative powers of Congress. It is thus referred to in the 2d section of the act of cession, which proves that it was designed as a limitation upon the powers of Congress:

"That a tract of country, not exceeding ten miles square, or any lesser quantity, to be located within the limits of this State, and in any part thereof, as Congress may by law direct, and the same is hereby forever ceded and relinquished to the Congress and Government of the United States, in full and absolute right and exclusive jurisdiction, as well of soil as of persons residing or to reside thereon, pursuant to the tenor and effect of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution of the Government of the United States."

Is not here, sir, a clear limitation upon the powers of this Government over this District, to the enumerated powers of the Constitution? and did not Congress accept the cession with this condition annexed? With what propriety, then, can Congress be asked to usurp power and violate this express condition? But, sir, another view presents itself, growing out of this section of the act, which clearly proves the intention of the contracting parties, and their views of the powers of Congress over this subject when the cession was made. This section conferred upon Congress the power of locating the ten miles square anywhere in the State of Virginia which it might select. Suppose it had been located so as to include the city of Richmond, as it might have been. Do you think, sir, Virginia had bestowed upon Congress a discretion which, in her estimation, would have enabled it to abolish slavery in the very centre of its slave population, embracing its very capital? The idea is too preposterous to think of. Thus, sir, the power of Congress is not only limited by the plain letter of the Constitution, but by its plighted faith, which it is bound, by every consideration of national honor, to fulfil.

The question now recurs, Mr. Speaker, What disposition should be made of these petitions? Should they be received, or not? I contend that they should not be received. First, because they ask Congress to do that which it has no constitutional power to do. I flatter myself that I have satisfactorily proved that Congress has no constitutional power to abolish "slavery" or the "slave-trade" between citizens of this District and the slave States, and between the slave States themselves; and that, if the prayers of the petitioners were to prevail, it would be in violation of the Constitution, and in utter disregard of the rights of private property. Why, then, receive petitions which call upon the House to do what it has, palpably, no power to do? It is an idle waste of time, and a most pernicious example. Second, because from the effects which the introduction of such petitions must necessarily produce. Their introduction uniformly produces excitement and unprofitable discussion here, and a corresponding excitement in the two great sections of the Union. The discussions here are well calculated to produce heartburnings, jealousies, and alienations between the Representatives of the slaveholding and non-slaveholding States, which will act and react upon their constituents, and produce like feelings among them, to the hazard of the peace of the country and the integrity of the Union. Not only this; but these discussions, urged in a manner so violent and unreserved, will find their way to the slave population, and excite among them delusive hopes and a spirit of insubordination, and attempts at insurrection, which, after the butchery of a few helpless women and children, can only end in their own destruction. These are the only effects which the introduction and discussion of these petitions are calculated to produce. Why, then, introduce them? Why cast a firebrand into the midst of such combustible materials, and hazard an explosion so fatal to the harmony of this body, the peace of the nation, and the integrity of the Union? Why produce discord, where harmony and good-will would otherwise prevail? Is there any good likely to be accomplished worth such imminent hazards? None, sir, whatever. The framers of the Constitution—men whose wisdom and patriotism were never surpassed—foresaw the delicacy and danger of this question of slavery, and wisely closed the doors of the Federal Constitution upon it. They saw in this young and rising nation all those elements of greatness which need only be discreetly used to produce unparalleled power, prosperity, and glory. They foresaw that sectional jealousies alone could produce that alienation of feeling which would sever this great fabric of liberty, and break it into powerless, contemptible fragments. They foresaw that, of all other subjects, none were so likely to produce these disastrous consequences as that of domestic slavery in the States; and they, therefore, wisely determined not to clothe the Federal Government with any power over the subject, but leave it entirely to the jurisdiction of the States where it existed. Let us imitate, Mr. Speaker, this high and patriotic example of our fathers, and close for ever the doors of this Hall to this inflammatory, exciting, and dangerous subject, by keeping out this description of petitions, as dangerous to the peace and tranquillity of the country, and the integrity of the Union. Interest, patriotism, and duty, all unite in imperiously demanding it. If, through the instrumentality of this question, this Union, consecrated by the best blood of our fathers, and founded upon the true principles of liberty, should ever be broken down, we shall incur a heavy and irredeemable responsibility to the world and to posterity. Third. Because, if the prayer of such petitions should be granted, it would be in violation of that faith which is fairly inferrible from the compact of cession, and dangerous to the tranquillity and subordination of the slaves in Virginia and Maryland. It cannot be, for a moment, supposed that Virginia and Maryland, two of the largest slaveholding States in the Union, would have been guilty of the gross folly of ceding to the United States a territory of ten miles square, within their very midst, if they had not regarded the faith of the Government pledged not to interfere with this subject. The acts of cession themselves afford conclusive evidence that the ceding States regarded this subject as closed to Congress. But, if the acts of cession were silent upon this subject, the very fact that this territory was gratuitously ceded by the liberality of these two States should protect it against the exercise of this power, if it existed. Abolish slavery here; make it the rendezvous of free negroes and refugee slaves, and what would be the condition of the people of the District and of Virginia and Maryland? Their property would become worthless, and their safety hourly jeoparded. Is there any gentleman here prepared to inflict upon the people of Virginia and Maryland, and this District, such unutterable woes? I trust not. Why, then, receive petitions productive of so little good, and fraught with so many dangers, and the contagion of which must extend through the whole slaveholding States?

But it is said by the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. SLADE) that Congress cannot observe any such plighted faith, because it was unconstitutional. Not so, sir. If Congress had the power to abolish slavery, it would not be compelled to exercise it. It had the right, therefore, to make the pledge, and is bound in honor to redeem it, so long as the circumstances under which it was made exist, and require its observance.

Mr. Speaker, I would respectfully inquire, who are these petitioners? and why should their petitions be entitled to the peculiar favor of this House? Sir, they are intermeddlers—officious intruders into the affairs of others. They seek to redress, not their own grievances, but those of an independent community; they seek to apply the power of Congress to the destruction of the domestic institutions of sovereign States, of which they are not citizens, and with which they have no concern. Our Government is federal, not consolidated; and, in relation to their domestic institutions, the States are as independent of each other, and of this Government, as they are of the Powers of Europe, Asia, or Africa; and the subjects of France or England can, with as much propriety, seek the intervention of Congress upon this subject, as these petitioners. Such an intermeddling spirit should not be encouraged, but frowned down by the most signal marks of disapprobation, as dangerous to the institutions of the States, and threatening to the integrity of the Union. I have been permitted, sir, by the kindness of my friend from Massachusetts (Mr. LINCOLN) to examine one of these petitions. I find it printed, no doubt prepared at an abolition mint, and signed by 229 women, who pray for the abolition of "slavery" and the "slave-trade" in the District of Columbia. I do not doubt that most of the signers are children, for I find many of the same names, mostly written by the same hand, who have been influenced, no doubt, to sign their names to this paper, without any knowledge of its contents, by some long-faced hypocritical missionary of an abolition society. These women undertake to petition Congress to redress grievances of which they know nothing, and of a people to whom they are utter strangers. Yes, sir, the grievances of the superstitious, ignorant, and oppressed people of this District are to be poured into our ears by a few school misses and factory maids in Massachusetts, who are particularly enlightened upon this subject; and, for the reception of such a petition, this House and this nation are to be blown into a flame.

But it is argued by some that the refusal to receive these petitions adds to the strength of the abolitionists, by enabling them to connect with their system the right of petition; and that true policy would require that they should be received, referred, and reported upon. Sir, in 1793, when the Quaker petition was presented, it was received, referred, and reported upon. From that period up to 1836, such petitions were received, referred, and reported upon, but without effect. In 1836, after an animated discussion, abolition petitions were received and referred to a committee of which Mr. PINCKNEY of South Carolina was chairman, and an able report made against the objects of the petitioners, which, so far from preventing discussion, produced a most protracted and violent one. This report evaded the important question of the constitutional power of Congress over this subject. From that time to this, these petitions have been multiplying in numbers, and, I fear, will continue to multiply and be poured upon us, till the doors of Congress are entirely closed upon them. Sir, if the whole Southern representation would unite in the spirit of my colleague, (Mr. BOTTS,) who, I know, has no disposition to favor or respect the abolitionists, I would, not as a concession of principle, but to arm in the most effective manner those of our Constitution-abiding and law-obeying friends of the North, who are ready to bare their breasts to the storm, and maintain the plighted faith of the Constitution, defend the constitutional rights of the South, and preserve the Union of these States, give them such a position as they might deem necessary for their own safety. But, sir, this must be, to command my acquiescence, the united action of the South; for, upon this vitally interesting and important question, the South, to command respect, must present an undivided front, and I will not separate from it.

I should like to know, Mr. Speaker, why there is so much solicitude about the reception of petitions on which no action is sought or desired. I understand that there are scarce ten members on this floor who would respond affirmatively to the prayer of these petitions. I understand the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ADAMS) to avow that he would not vote for any bill to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia at this time. I understand the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. SLADE) himself to say that he does not desire immediate action upon this subject. Why, then, risk the harmony of this body, jeopard the peace of the country, impair the strength of the Union, and hazard its integrity, in pressing the reception of petitions upon which this body has determined it will not act?

[Mr. SLADE said he did desire immediate action.]

I distinctly understood the gentleman to say that he did not desire the immediate abolition of slavery, and therefore inferred that he did not desire the immediate action of the House.

But, sir, it is argued by the member from Vermont that the adoption of this resolution would exclude all petitions or papers touching the subject of slavery in any form, and about which the power of Congress is undoubted. He says that petitions, memorials, or other papers seeking a modification of the laws for the recovery of fugitive slaves would be excluded. The gentleman is mistaken; the resolution, in express terms, refers to all petitions, memorials, or other papers touching the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade—terms which cannot exclude any papers of the description referred to by the gentleman. So that this objection is unfounded; for that is the specific subject referred to, and the resolution embraces nothing else. Whether this resolution is incorporated into the standing rules of the House, or stands as an ordinary resolution, is not material as to its effect; for the rules only bind the present Congress, and this may be hereafter omitted if it should be deemed expedient to do so.

Mr. Speaker, the honorable gentleman from Vermont has charged upon the slave States that they breed slaves for the market as they do horses, cattle, or swine. He calls them, sir, "slave-breeders." I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that there could not have been found a representative of the American people upon the floor of the American Congress who would have repeated that base slander of that prince of demagogues, Daniel O'Connell—a man whose very name should be execrated by every friend of his country, the union of the States, and the liberties of the people.

[Mr. SLADE explained, and read in proof of his assertions the following extracts from the speeches of Messrs. Thomas J. Randolph and James H. Gholson, in the Legislature of Virginia, and a pamphlet of T. R. Dew, Esq., a distinguished professor in William and Mary College:

"In the Legislature of this State, in 1832, Thomas Jefferson Randolph declared that Virginia had been converted into 'one grand menagerie, where men are reared for the market like oxen for the shambles.' This same gentleman thus compared the foreign with the domestic traffic: 'The trader [African] receives the slaves, a stranger in aspect, language, and manner, from the merchant who brought him from the interior. But here, sir, individuals whom the master has known from infancy—whom he has seen sporting in the innocent gambols of childhood—who have been accustomed to look to him for protection—he tears from his mother's arms, and sells into a strange country, among a strange people, subject to cruel task-masters. In my opinion, it is much worse."

"Mr. Gholson, of Virginia, in his speech in the Legislature of that State, January 18, 1831, [see Richmond Whig,] says: 'The legal maxim of partus sequitur ventrem is coeval with the existence of the rights of property itself, and is founded in wisdom and justice. It is only on the justice and inviolability of this maxim that the master foregoes the service of the female slave, has her nursed and attended during the period of her gestation, and raises the helpless and infant offspring. The value of the property justifies the expense; and I do not hesitate to say that, in its increase, consists much of our wealth.'"

"Professor Dew, now president of the College of William and Mary, Virginia, in his review of the debate in the Virginia Legislature, 1831-'32, speaking of the revenue arising from the trade, says: 'A full equivalent being thus left in the place of the slave, this immigration becomes an advantage to the State, and does not check the black population as much as at first view we might imagine, because it furnishes every inducement to the master to attend to the negroes, to encourage breeding, and to cause the greatest number possible to be raised. Virginia is, in fact, a negro-raising State for other States.'"]

Mr. GARLAND resumed. These declarations of Messrs. Randolph and Gholson are not new to me; nor have I forgotten the agitation which they produced, or the excitement which they exerted in Virginia. No man can be ignorant of the fact that the increase of slaves must necessarily partake of the parent stock, and be, so long as property in them exists, subjects of bargain and sale; and that it is the duty of the owners, as far as is compatible with proper considerations of humanity, to employ them in the most profitable way. Nor can any be ignorant of the fact that they sometimes multiply to an extent that it is the interest of the owner, as well as it is his duty, to transfer them to other hands. In doing this, they do not in the slightest degree alter the condition of the slave, but only follow a law of property and the demands of interest, the operation of which cannot be resisted. Many sell from interest—many from necessity; in no case worsting the condition of the slave. But, sir, I do not know a single case in which slaves are bred and raised expressly for the market—made a business of; nor do I believe there can be found any such case in the whole South. I do not doubt that this is the point of view in which Mr. Randolph, Mr. Gholson, and Mr. Dew intended to be understood, and not in that of O'Connell and the gentleman from Vermont; for I do not believe that either of these gentlemen is capable of perpetrating such a slander upon their native State. That such a slander should be perpetrated by a foreigner—an enemy to our institutions, and our prosperity—is not to be wondered at; but I extremely regret that it should be believed and repeated by an American citizen on this floor.

The gentleman from Vermont (Mr. SLADE) has amused us with many arithmetical calculations to prove the increase of slaves. What else did the gentleman expect? and how were we to prevent it? If the number of our slaves has increased, it has been the result of natural causes; and certainly the gentleman would not have us prevent this increase, by slaughter or strangulation. But, sir, the dominion of slavery has decreased, and that to a great extent. New York, Pennsylvania, and Delaware were once slaveholding States, but have abolished slavery; and, by the power of the North, slavery north of the 36th deg. of north latitude is forever inhibited in that immense region west of the Mississippi purchased by the common treasure of the nation; where I trust the gentleman can go without offence to his moral sensibility, if he cannot go to Missouri. Slavery, also, has been excluded from that immense region of country ceded by Virginia, now embracing four large States and Wiskonsin Territory. With these facts before his eyes, the gentleman seems alarmed at the increase and progress of slavery! Sir, the facts prove that slavery, so far from increasing, has greatly declined in the extent of territory over which it prevails.

The gentleman from Vermont has, with an industry and an ability which do him credit, searched from their sleeping tombs, and strung together in admirable order, the opinions of many great and distinguished men upon the moral evils of slavery, and the necessity of its eradication, which would very well apply if we were engaged in the discussion of the question whether slavery should be introduced, but which do not touch the question whether Congress has the power to invade the domestic institutions of sovereign States, and break down their institutions; or whether it is expedient, under existing circumstances, to abolish slavery; and do not need, therefore, to be noticed. The gentleman also referred us to the example of England, and, with an air of apparent triumph, told us what she was, and what she now is. Upon the subject of slavery, sir, England has always been true to her interest. When it was her interest to press slavery into any part of her vast dominions, she has done so; and when it was her interest to abolish it, she has done so. Her interest, and not her principles, has always been the guide of her conduct upon this, as upon most other subjects. It was Old England, sir, seconded by New England, that forced upon the reluctant and remonstrating people of Virginia that system of slavery which now constitutes such an important point in her domestic policy. It was that England, sir, that now reproaches us, and instigates that spirit of fanaticism which threatens the destruction of our property, the peace of the country, and the disruption of our happy Union, that forced upon us that system of slavery, which, since it has become her interest to do so, she seeks to destroy. To show, sir, how unblushing and wanton this attempt on the part of New England fanaticism is, and how graceless are her reproaches, I will state an historical fact, which, if it has not escaped the diligent researches of the gentleman from Vermont, he would not willingly recur to on the present occasion. In the convention which framed the Federal Constitution, one committee reported that no impost could be laid by Congress without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present; another committee reported the immediate abolition of the African slave trade. By the vote of the five New England States and South Carolina and Georgia, the two-thirds principle was given up; and, by the same vote, the African slave-trade was protracted twenty years.

Virginia, and her friend and neighbor North Carolina, voted against both these alterations; and yet New England now reproaches them with their slave institutions—institutions which that very New England aided in forcing upon them. I do not recur to this historical fact for the purpose of reproaching Georgia and South Carolina. I do not doubt they acted, as they thought, for the best; but I recur to it for the purpose of showing how graceless and unblushing are these reproaches, coming from New England. But this is not all, sir; when we look into the slave-trade, and all its atrocities—that dark spot upon the escutcheon of modern civilized nations—what do we see? Among the vessels engaged in that horrid and inhuman traffic, over which the proud star spangled banner waves with shameless desecration, most of them are northern built and northern manned. Yes, sir, where there is one southern man, there are ten northern men in their crews. And shall they reproach us? Let the world answer the question. Posterity will not fail to fix all the odium which attaches to slavery upon its true authors.

I have always been, Mr. Speaker, averse to any agitation of this distracting question here. I have always thought it unprofitable and mischievous, and have, therefore, uniformly voted for every proposition which was calculated to cut off debate and prevent excitement. Having in view this object, I do not doubt that I have given some votes inconsistent with each other upon the question of reception, but it was always with the view of keeping the excitement and agitation, which these firebrands uniformly produce, out of the House, and doing the necessary and important business of the country. I have not done so, Mr. Speaker, because I feared abolitionists—I mean those whose views are ultra—who are prepared to crusade against southern institutions, and accomplish their unhallowed purposes by exciting servile insurrection, drenching our fields with blood, prostrating our rights, severing the Union, and overturning our liberties. Of them I have no fears—none, sir, whatever. Not because they are not formidable—are not actuated by vicious motives; but because I confidently believe that there is in the north a sufficient amount of patriotism, of loyalty to the Constitution, and devotion to the Union, to keep them in check and repel their attempts. If they cannot, then, sir, we can and will. I do not class with these minions of foreign policy—these enemies to our Constitution, our laws, and our liberties—those whose opinions are, in the abstract, opposed to domestic slavery, but who are not disposed, on that account, to disturb our domestic rights, and violate the sacred compact of the Constitution. To such I make no allusion; I allude exclusively to ultra abolitionism, that bane of our peace, and, I fear will be, destroyer of our happy institutions.

One remark more, Mr. Speaker, and I have done. I have been much pained to hear so much said of late about the dissolution of the Union—so many calculations about its value—so many estimates of comparative loss, by north and south, if such an event should unhappily take place. I say, Mr. Speaker, I am pained—not only pained, but alarmed, to hear these things so frequently repeated. Who, sir, can estimate the value of this Union—that Union, consecrated by the blood of our fathers, which flowed in a common stream from Ticonderoga to Charleston, and back again from Charleston to Ticonderoga? By what rules will you calculate the value of the liberty, happiness, and prosperity which it secures to a great and growing people? Sir, it has not entered into the heart of man to conceive its value—a value which we shall never truly appreciate until we foolishly throw it away. Why compare the losses, sir? Each section will sustain such a weight of loss that it will have no inclination to enter into the comparison. It will be sufficiently overwhelmed with its own ruin and misery. Let us, then, having in our own keeping such an important charge, to ourselves, to the world, and to posterity, so equally and benignantly administer the Government as to transmit this great boon of liberty, unimpaired, to the countless millions who are to come after us. And, for the purpose of effecting this, let us keep out every thing that is calculated to mar our peace, weaken our bonds, and destroy our harmony. Sir, whenever and wherever I see the star-spangled banner floating in the breeze, and remember that it is the flag of the Union, the emblem of Liberty, I cannot refrain, in the language of a distinguished man of old, from exclaiming in my heart, "Esto perpetua."

SPEECH OF MR. CUSHING,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

House of Representatives, May 20, 1840—On the motion made by him to strike out the enacting clause of the Independent Treasury Bill.

The House, in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS, of Virginia, in the chair,) having taken up the Senate bill entitled "An act to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue," the bill was read; and the question then being on the first section of it—

Mr. CUSHING submitted a motion to strike out the enacting clause, and said he did this in order to be able, at the present stage in the progress of the bill, to debate its provisions generally; but, before proceeding, he had a suggestion to make to Mr. ATHERTON, who, in the absence of Mr. JONES, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, appeared to have charge of the bill. This measure, important as it was, and it being, in fact, the measure of the existing Administration, had come from the Committee of Ways and Means unaccompanied by any report; and the House, therefore, possessed no knowledge of the views which guided that committee in reporting this project of law. Under these circumstances, if Mr. ATHERTON, or any other gentleman of the committee, was desirous to address the House in behalf of the friends of the bill, and give an exposition of its merits, Mr. CUSHING would yield the floor to him for that purpose. Nay, more, he proffered it; he invited any gentleman to enter into the merits of the bill before he (Mr. C.) spoke of its demerits.

Mr. ATHERTON, for reasons that he assigned, said that he would at present decline to speak.

Mr. CUSHING then took the floor to address the House, but gave way to the general wish that the committee should rise and report progress.

House of Representatives, May 21, 1840.

The House, in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having again taken up the Independent Treasury Bill, Mr. CUSHING proceeded in substance as follows:

Mr. Chairman: This bill, which is a fearfully interesting one of itself, comes before us to-day under circumstances which give to it additional intensity of interest.

The Independent Treasury is an Executive idea and an Executive measure. At the opening of the twenty-fifth Congress, with a new President, there met here a new House of Representatives, coming directly from the people, unbiassed and unsophisticated by the influences which emanate from the federal city. This measure was then urged upon Congress by the Executive; and the Senate, that aristocratic branch of Congress which in these latter times originates so many financial acts, seconded the urgency of the Executive; but the House, with its popular feelings fresh upon it, steadily and sternly rejected the bill again and again, and shielded the people from the federal power of the Executive and the Senate.

Nevertheless, the measure, thus repudiated by the people's Representatives, was put in operation by the Executive, ex mero motu suo proprio, of his own arbitrary power and discretion; and has been so for three years, in defiance of the will of Congress. Nay, the organ of the Treasury Department here in the last Congress told us—triumphantly told us—in contempt as well of this House as of the people, that this measure was in force, and would so continue, under the present Administration, lament who might, here or elsewhere; and he finds the recompense of his zeal in this matter, not through the suffrages of the people, but through the form of the President in the shape of a foreign embassy. And now this Congress, assembled after the President had, for two years, been exerting all the vast power of the Federal Government, and of the party organization of which his Administration is the head, to drill, and persuade, and drive the country into his measure; now, once again, Congress is called upon, by the voice of the same President and the seconding of the same Senate, to pass the bill—to legalize what the Executive has already done—to rivet on the people the chains which the Executive has forged and twisted around their limbs in despite of them and of their Representatives. The critical time has come. Decoyed by the lips of the tempter, the people have dallied in the lap of this Administration until, Delilah like, it is insidiously proceeding to shear the hair of the Samson; and, unless he speedily arouse himself in his strength, will hand him over, bound hand and foot, to the Philistines.

When, therefore, in the midst of these circumstances, the bill was brought on last night, I called on the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. ATHERTON,) I called on the Committee of Ways and Means generally, to rise and justify the measure. In the name of the Opposition here, in the name of the country, in the name of the people of the United States, I invited the friends of the Administration to vindicate its conduct and its purposes. Such a call, at such a time, was a challenge more than an invitation.

And what are the reasons given by the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. ATHERTON) for declining this invitation? He says this measure has been several times recommended by the President in his annual messages. Ay, true enough; there has been no want of exhortations on the subject from him; his individual will is too plainly manifest in the matter, not only in originating the measure and in forcing it upon Congress and the country against the judgment of both, but in the exercise of his power and influence to obtain at last the legal confirmation of his will.

Next, the gentleman refers to past reports. But there has been only one report in the House of Representatives on the subject—that of Mr. Cambreleng in the last Congress; and that was accompanied by the able counter-report of the gentleman from Pennsylvania at my side, (Mr. SERGEANT;) the latter confuting the former, and the antidote going forth to the country along with the poison, neutralizing its venom and destroying its power.

But the gentleman says that this is not a new measure, either to the members of this House or to the country; and that every gentleman present was sent here by his constituents either for or against the bill. Well, suppose it be so; are we then to be mute here? I scorn the idea. This is a deliberative assembly of men, and of men having souls of their own; not a body of dumb and blind machines, with no function but that of registering the will of the Executive. Our constituents sent us here to execute their decisions, not those of the President; and to utter and maintain their opinions, as well as to execute their decisions. I know it is not uncommon to hear complaints made of the consumption of time in debate here; but they who utter such complaints are very short-sighted men; they forget that the Federal Government is composed of an association of sovereign States; that the halls of Congress are the great safety-valve of our institutions; that, for the conflicting opinions, and competing interests, and political passions, which waste themselves in debate here, and which, by discussion in Congress, are conciliated and harmonized, the chief remedy in the other great communities of Christendom is by resort to war.

The remarkable fact remains, then, that we have no affirmative defence of this measure. And it is a most unprecedented fact, that a great bill like this should be thrown haughtily and unconcernedly upon the table of the House as being a law which the Executive demands, and which, in humble obedience to him, there is a party ready and strong enough to pass, right or wrong. We do not, say the friends of the Administration—and is not that equivalent to saying we dare not or cannot?—attempt to justify the measure affirmatively upon satisfactory arguments. For the gentleman from New Hampshire, in conclusion, gravely puts it to me to proceed, contrary to the natural course of debate, and show cause why this bill ought not to pass. I, however, shall not shrink from that challenge.

There is a still more singular fact in the circumstances which now surround us; and it is, that we are now asked to legalize this financial experiment of the President, after it has actually been tried and has failed.

This scheme of policy has been in operation, by Executive will, in defiance of Congress, for three years. It is the measure, and the only measure, of his Administration; or, rather, it is emphatically his measure. One of the ablest of his advocates, the Democratic Review, tells us:

"The great event of Mr. Van Buren's administration, by which it will be hereafter known and designated, is the divorce of Bank and State in the fiscal affairs of the Federal Government, and the return, after half a century of deviation, to the original design of the Constitution."

So that Mr. Van Buren is not only wiser than all the present generation, but wiser than those conscript fathers of the Republic by whom the Constitution was framed and the machinery of the Federal Government set in motion. Regardless of their example, and of the monitory experience of half a century, he resolved to try his experiment, and he has tried it.

Or, rather, it is one of two kindred experiments. General Jackson's experiment, the pet bank system, like this one, was put in operation by Executive will in defiance of Congress; like this, it was in operation for three years before it was legalized; and it exploded in a year after the act for its legalization was extorted from Congress, as this may, involving the Government and the country in common dismay and confusion.

And what has, thus far, been the effect of the two? This we have seen too clearly, in the never-ceasing agitations of currency, commerce, and business of all sorts; in a vast number of individual bankruptcies; in two suspensions of cash payments by the banks—one partial, the other universal; in the prostration of productive industry in all its departments; in the general reduction of prices, especially of cotton, corn, and labor; in a word, in the congelation of the current of the country's prosperity—the paralysis of its industrial energies—an ossification, as it were, at its heart. Such have been the disastrous results of these financial experiments of the Executive; the last of which, in the face of all these facts, Congress is now called on to adopt and to legalize.

And we are called upon to do this at a time when the people, weary of these empirical experiments on their welfare and repose, have arisen in the majesty of their might to rebuke the experimenters, and to cashier that Administration which, in the blind pursuit of its own party interests, disregards those of the nation. Let not the friends of the Administration suppose that the country is agitated for nothing, nor seek to lay that flattering unction to their souls. It is not a ripple on the surface of the waves, but a tempestuous tossing of the deep sea, which you witness. The masses are in motion. It is the upheaving of the vast ocean itself, with that tremendous ground-swell from its uttermost depths, which forebodes and marks the unwithstandable power of the coming onset of the earthquake, and which is about to overwhelm you with the deluge of its waters. If the people cannot reform the purposes of the Administration, and make these consonant to their wishes and interests, they can and will reform the Administration itself.

Such a bill, coming before us under such circumstances, deserves a full and deliberate examination upon its precise merits; more especially as the discussions of it in the House hitherto have been either partial and hurried, or incidental only; and I propose now to subject it to a rigorous and complete scrutiny. But, before commencing on this, I desire to forestall any attempts, on the other side, to stifle debate by the clamor concerning the appropriation bills, which is so common in this House and in the newspapers.

The Administration majority in the House have decided to take up this bill first, to the postponement of those general appropriation bills which remain to be acted on. They have made this decision upon the precise question proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. WISE,) who moved to take up the navy appropriation bill in preference to this. The appropriation bills are of admitted general importance; so much so, that one of the standing rules of the House gives to them a precedence over all other bills. When the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill was on its passage, we heard continual complaints in the House concerning the injury to the public service, and the wrong to the public servants, which was inflicted by the delay of the appropriations for the civil, naval, military, and miscellaneous services of the Government. The Globe was loud in its exhortations on the subject. If the exigency for the passage of these bills was so great a month ago, it must be greater now, as it notoriously is; and it is a violation of duty to the Government and the country to postpone these bills. On the other hand, this bill can well enough wait. The system which it is intended to legalize is practically in force now. It can matter nothing to the Government and the country whether that act of legalization take place a month sooner, or a month later. Of course, this bill is taken up now for party reasons merely—to endeavor to help the falling fortunes of the Administration by a show of courage, or to satisfy the importunity of a certain class of its friends, discontented to see this bill remain so long as it has in the House untouched, or to meet the taunts of the Whigs on the same point. For some such object, also, though the bill remained on the Speaker's table for weeks after it came from the Senate, uncommitted even; yet the friends of the Administration, for nothing else but idle exhibition, have recently consumed the time of the House with motions to suspend the rules, and take it up out of order, on days when it was morally certain that the House would not agree to suspend the rules for that purpose. Now, they have at length got it up, postponing the interests of country to those of party. Let us hear nothing from the friends of the Administration, therefore, in this debate, of the delay of the appropriation bills, as an argument to stifle or cut off debate. The delay is theirs. They alone are responsible for it. They cannot expect this bill to pass without being largely discussed. If they do, they mistake. And if at any time hereafter they complain of the delayed appropriation bills, I say to them, and the country will say,—The fault is yours, and the remedy is at any moment in your hands; for the same majority which took up this bill can lay it aside, and take up the appropriation bills in its stead, to resume it when they shall have been passed and sent to the Senate.

This bill is commonly called by its friends "the Independent Treasury Bill." I shall not quarrel with its name. Its sponsors may christen it as they please; and if to the name of "Sub-Treasury" they prefer that of "Independent Treasury," they are welcome to use it, for aught I care. It is a bill to give to the Government an independent place of deposite for the public treasure—a place of deposite independent, not of banks only, but of the people. This is one of its provisions. But it has another provision; and that is, to give to the Government an independent currency in all its dealings, as well as independent depositories of the public treasure; independent, in one case and in the other, of the whole people of the United States. These two are the main objects of the bill, provided for in the first and twentieth sections—namely, Government depositories, and a Government currency; the other twenty-six sections of the bill being subsidiary to the execution of these two.

The bill, which embodies this scheme, begins appropriately by repealing sundry clauses of the Constitution of the United States. In the first section it is enacted that "certain rooms, vaults, and safes," in the new Treasury building, "are hereby constituted and declared to be the Treasury of the United States." Is the Treasury of the United States a local thing, a building, a vault, or safe? If so, as it is a universal truth that a true definition may be substituted for the thing defined, then is Mr. Woodbury the Secretary of a certain vault or safe in the Treasury building. You might as well declare the arsenal to be the War Department, or a ship or a cannon the Navy Department, or the great seal to be the State Department. The whole enactment is absurd and puerile, this attempt to localize the Treasury of the United States; but when the enactment is compared with the Constitution, it is worse than merely absurd and puerile, it is plainly unconstitutional. The Constitution says that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law;" and that certain duties "shall be for the use of the Treasury of the United States." It is evident that these expressions do not signify a place, but rather an abstract legal entity. And the bill itself, in other parts of it, proceeds on the same idea; for though, if the vaults of the Treasury building be the Treasury of the United States, all appropriations must be drawn therefrom, yet the bill provides elsewhere for drawing appropriations out of other places of deposite all over the United States.

In discussing the numerous and complicated details of the bill and its various parts, I propose, for the sake of perspicuity, to consider it—first, as a fiscal measure only; that is, in its relation to the Treasury;—and, secondly, as a measure of state policy; that is, in its relation to the people.

It is known to the House that, when the idea of this scheme was broached in Congress in 1834, the Administration was decidedly hostile to it. The friends of the Administration here spoke and voted against it in a body. The Globe declared that the effect of the scheme would be to expose the public treasure to be plundered by a hundred hands where one could reach it before. The present Secretary of the Treasury condemned in strong terms the idea of intrusting the public treasure to the keeping of individual agents of the United States. And the plan was taken up in 1837 as an afterthought. Yet, afterthought as it is, and repudiated as it had been by the Secretary of the Treasury, where, think you, it is that he goes to find the origin of the scheme? To any of the trusted names of the Democracy? No, indeed; but to that able man, who is to the friends of the Administration in this House the very by-word of horror, namely, Alexander Hamilton. Yet see how curiously Mr. Woodbury covers this up; how adroitly he insinuates the fact, without speaking out the name. In the Treasury report of September, 1837, he says:

"The other system to which the attention and consideration of Congress are respectfully invited, is a new organization, by means of commissioners or receivers general, to gather the collections to more central points, &c. Such an organization might be at only three or four of the most important points, or it might be made more extensive, &c. This could be arranged in all important particulars substantially in the manner which is now in very successful practice in some of the most enlightened and opulent governments of Europe, and as was urgently recommended by this Department as early as 1790."

That is, Mr. Woodbury seizes upon a temporary idea of Mr. Hamilton the mere imperfect suggestion which occurred to him in the outset of the Government, when we had neither treasure nor fiscal agents of any sort, nor much else but debts; and cites this in support of the present measure. He might have bethought him of the beautiful idea of Burns, that nature tried her prentice hand on man, and made woman afterwards, when experience had taught skill. For, in this reference to Hamilton's authority, Mr. Woodbury refuses the master-workman's fiscal machinery which the Father of his country adopted, which experience approved for many years, and under which the country had long prospered; and proposes, instead of it, to take the first imperfect instruments, on which Hamilton did but try his "prentice hand," sending us, for the idea of his "subtreasurers," to Alexander Hamilton's unfinished and rejected roughdraught.

Looking at the bill in its light of a new fiscal machinery only, the first question is, whether the Treasurer of the United States, receivers general, treasurers of mints, collectors, land office receivers, and postmasters, who are made by this bill the sole depositories of the public moneys, are in all respects the best possible fiscal agents and depositories of the United States.

Are they, as compared with banks, for instance, the safest depositories?

For the security of the public money in the hands of its agents under this bill, the Administration proposes to rely (in addition to the integrity of the officers) upon, 1st. bonds; 2d. inspections; 3d. penal provisions.

Every thinking man must admit that it will be impossible to secure the public treasure by the suretyship bonds which the bill calls for. Individuals cannot give adequate bonds for the millions to pass through their hands or to remain in their custody. The President assumes that only five millions will be on hand at any time. I shall disprove this hereafter, but, for argument's sake, I also assume this at present. Taking the whole sum at five millions, a large sum will be at New York, for example. Can the receiver general at New York give good security for three, two, or even one million of dollars? We know he cannot. There are few men in the country of sufficient wealth to render their bond good to that amount; of such men there is probably not one who would be willing to become security for a receiver general. We know how the thing must and will be done. The receiver general will obtain the signatures of as many friends as he can, each to be responsible to a certain amount; and, if the principal becomes a defaulter, the sureties will, most of them, devise means to convey their property from the Government, and thus to escape. Or, perhaps they will come here and pray for an act of Congress for their relief, as the sureties of Swartwout have done this very session; so that, on the whole, the suretyship must be conceded on all hands to be but very imperfect, at best, as a means of protecting the Government.

Next, the bill provides for the supervision of the depositories by the Treasury Department; but it is obviously impossible for the Government to have conusance of the conduct and personal habits of numerous agents scattered all over the Union. The ingenuity of fraud will outstrip the vigilance of the Government. Special or itinerating agents may be sent, without notice, to inspect the depositories; but how easy it is, by the artful arrangement of accounts, to deceive such inspectors!

But whatever security the Government may have, by these or any other means, with individual depositories, it has identically the same in the case of banks, and something more. Personal integrity is a thing not peculiar to Government officers on the one hand, nor to bank officers on the other; nor is the want of it peculiar to either. In each case the individuals trusted are men, and subject to the infirmities of the human condition, and alike capable of the breach of trust and of crime. In each case the person offending may be arrested and punished for his criminal acts. In the case of bank officers, as of the officers created by this bill, bonds are taken to make good any defalcation of which they may be guilty. To one, as to the other, a system of supervision by public agents is applicable. But while, in all these particulars, the two cases are perfectly parallel, or, at any rate, there is no advantage in favor of special Government depositories, it is obvious to see that other and great advantages, on the score of safety, remain altogether peculiar to banks, as they have been constituted hitherto, under charters, either from the States or from Congress. For, in addition to all the security which is common to the two modes of deposite—a special or a bank depository—the depositor in bank has the ample and complete security of the capital stock of the bank; the Government has the inspection of the directors and stockholders, in addition to its own; and, above all, the bank cannot abscond. Its officers may abscond, but its capital stock remains fixed by its charter in the State which establishes it. Your Swartwouts may, on the approaching discovery of their defalcation, take passage for England by the first packet; but not so the Bank of New York, or the Massachusetts Bank.

Upon the whole reason of the thing, therefore, I hold it to be clearly shown that bank depositories are, in their nature, safer than individual agents as depositories. And the unbiassed and spontaneous action of individuals in the management of their own private affairs, where no party influences intervene, (or, if they do, are overcome by the consideration of private interest) confirms the conclusion; for who, that is in the way to have large sums of money on hand, keeps it in his own safe or vault, or in the custody of his clerk or other agent? No man does this willingly. Every body sees that, if he is known to have large sums of money in his house and in his own custody habitually, he exposes himself to robbery or theft; and that, whatever confidence he may place in the integrity of a clerk or cash-keeper of his own, money deposited in bank is much more securely disposed of, and he acts accordingly.

And the history of the Treasury of the United States furnishes a great body of facts to the same point. In a Treasury report which I have before spoken of, Mr. Woodbury elaborately argues, and conclusively proves, from the experience of the Government, the superior safety of bank depositories over all others. Nay, in that document he covers the whole question; for he says that individual agents will probably be found "less responsible, safe, convenient, and economical." As a specimen of the spirit and reasoning of that document, I give the following extracts:

"It is a singular fact, in praise of this description of public debtors, the selected BANKS, that there is not now due on deposites, from the whole of them which have ever stopped payment, from the establishment of the Constitution to the present moment, a sum much beyond what is now due to the United States from one mercantile firm that stopped payment in 1825 or 1826, and of whom [which] ample security was required, and supposed to be taken, under the responsibility of an oath. If we include the whole present dues to the Government from discredited banks, at all times and of all kinds, whether as depositories or not, and embrace even counterfeit bills, and every other species of unavailable funds in the Treasury, they will not exceed what is due from two such firms." * *

"These circumstances, with the preference in case of failure belonging to depositors and holders of their bills over the stockholders, united with the security, if not priority, given to the Government, render them, in point of safety, generally much superior to individual agents of the United States."

"It is gratifying to reflect that the credit given by the Government, whether to bank paper or bank agents, has been accompanied by smaller losses, in the experience under the system of State banks in this country at their worst period, and under their severest calamities, than any other kind of credit the Government has ever given in relation to its pecuniary transactions."

These paragraphs of Mr. Woodbury's report contain statements of facts which it is impossible to contradict. Nor have these facts, so far as I know, ever since been denied, notwithstanding the change in the policy of the Administration. It is true, a Treasury document has come in this session, which is calculated, on a hasty inspection, to mislead the mind into some conclusions adverse to those of the Secretary's old report; but which, more carefully examined, confirms it in all its parts.—(Ex. Doc. No. 10.)

This document comprises a table of the amount of loss to the Government in successive periods by the non-payment of custom-house bonds; and this it is obvious has nothing to do with the present question, which is a question, not of debt, but of breach of trust on the part of the agents of the Government.

Another table in the same document gives the losses by deposite banks as follows:

Year.	Losses by deposite banks.	Year.	Losses by deposite banks.
From 1789 to 1812, incl've.	None appearing on the books.	1825 1826 1827 1828	$130,244 None left unpaid.
1821 1822 1823 1824	$327,530 34,398 56,929 204,693	Total from 1789 to 1836, inclusive,	$894,722

That is to say, the whole sum which the Treasury has lost by deposite banks, from the beginning of the Government to 1837, is but about two-thirds of what has been lost under this Administration by a single collector of the customs in New York. The same table undertakes to give an estimate of the amount the Government lost, chiefly during the last war with Great Britain, by the receipt of bank paper; but that question belongs to another branch of the subject.

The same document contains a table of the loss of the Government by disbursing officers, and a table of loss by collecting officers, in each case from 1789 to 1836, inclusive, which present the following results:

1. Disbursing Officers.

Aggregate amount of loss in civil department	$898,023 59
Aggregate amount of loss in military and naval	4,058,549 97
	4,956,573 56
Number of defaulters, civil department	244
Number of defaulters, military and naval	2,516
	2,760
Loss per head, civil department	$3,680
Loss per head, military and naval	1,613

2. Collecting Officers.

Aggregate amount of loss by collectors of the customs	$1,198,979 91
Aggregate amount of loss by collectors of internal revenue and direct tax	442,265 76
Aggregate amount of loss by receivers of sales of lands	397,304 14
	2,038,549 81
Number of defaulters in the custom-house	87
Number of defaulters in the internal revenue, &c,	243
Number of defaulters in the public land receipts	27
	357
Loss per head among collectors of the customs	$13,781
Loss per head among collectors of internal revenue, &c.	1,820
Loss per head among receivers of public lands	14,715

Be it observed, that these tables do not include the large defalcations which have occurred or come to light under the administration or Mr. Van Buren. And yet here we have seven millions of loss by defaulting Government agents, to contrast with less than one million of loss in the same period by deposite banks; those defalcations occurring in every branch of the public service, but being especially large in the disbursements of the army and navy. And this document, therefore, the latest on the subject, completely substantiates the statements made by Mr. Woodbury in his former report, and confirms, in the most striking manner, the conclusions to which I had arrived by general argument in proving, by the actual experience of the Government, the superior safety of banks over individuals as the fiscal agents of the Treasury.

Without enlarging to enforce this argument further, (though I might adduce a multitude of other facts from the experience of the Government to the same point,) I proceed to another fiscal question—and that is, the probable expense to the Government of this experiment of an Independent Treasury.

I call the attention of the House to the fact, that, though this bill makes the necessary appropriations for carrying the new system of deposite for the public moneys into effect, yet it is impossible to judge, from any thing expressed in the bill, what precise amount of appropriation it may require. We see, on the face of it, the creation of sundry new officers with large salaries; but we do not know, nor can we, in this early stage of the experiment, how many additional officers it may call for. One thing I venture to predict—that it will prove impossible to conduct all the machinery of the new system without the appointment of many additional officers not mentioned in the bill; and that a host of new clerks and special agents will follow in the train of the receivers general, and of the important duties here imposed upon the treasurers of the several mints and collectors of the customs, as well as upon the superior officers of the Treasury. What appointments are here set down in so many words, are but the entering wedge to others. And so it is with the new sub-treasuries to be constructed, and the safes and vaults in the various existing public edifices which are to be used as sub-treasuries. The bill itself makes a specific appropriation for the purchase of sites and the construction of new buildings at certain points. Does anybody imagine that the expense is to end here? We know it will not. Every day's experience shows that the course is to ask in the outset for barely money enough to lay the foundations of a building, and then to call for more and more yearly, to continue and complete the work. Thus it has been with the great freestone, marble, and granite palaces which are now in the course of construction here and elsewhere, to be used in part as places of deposite for the public money, and one of which is by this bill declared to be the Treasury of the United States. These magnificent edifices, these temples to Mammon, these shrines of the gold-God Plutus, whose worship it seems to be one of the special objects of the Treasury to advance, are to be essential parts of the new fiscal plan. How much, I say, all this is to cost, we are nowhere told; and the bill disguises all this in a sweeping clause, placing the Treasury at the unlimited discretion of the President for the expenditure of whatever money, more or less, he may choose to apply to the execution of his darling experiment. All this undisclosed and unknown expense is to be incurred to obtain new places of deposite and deposite agencies, instead of those which have heretofore cost the Government nothing.

Another fiscal consideration is the comparative convenience of the new plan; for Mr. Woodbury, in his last annual report, relies much on the alleged convenience of the plan to the Government.

This alleged convenience consists, in the first place, of the pretended facilities of transferring its funds from the place of receipt to the place of expenditure. I deny that the system affords any such facilities. On the contrary, unless the Government has as many sub-treasuries scattered all over the country as there are banks in the several States, the latter will continue to be, as they always have been, the most convenient channels for the transfer of credits from place to place by the negotiation of drafts. In this matter, as in that of deposites, every man's experience and conduct in his own affairs contradicts the theory of the Secretary of the Treasury.

In addition to this pretended advantage of the plan, much has been said, at all times, of the inconvenience of having the Government subject to be deprived of the use of its funds by the failure of deposite banks, or the suspension of cash payments on their part, or the funds being discounted on by these banks, and so not capable of being repaid at a moment's warning; and the experience of the year 1837 is referred to in support of this view of the subject To which it is obvious to reply, in the first place, that no such difficulty ever occurred under the fiscal agency of either of the two Banks of the United States; in the second place, that individuals are much more likely to fail, or to withhold the public funds in their hands, than the banks of the States, as I have already demonstrated by Treasury documents; and, finally, that so far as it may be the object of the Government to guard against any possible inconvenience from this source, by reason of the money being used by the banks, it is as easy to enact that it it shall not be discounted on, or otherwise used, by bank agents, as by individual agents; and as easy to secure the observance of the prohibition by penal provisions in one case as in the other.

And upon this branch of the question the conclusion seems to me irresistible—that, in a mere fiscal point of view, looking only to the naked, narrow consideration of what kind of deposite agency is best for the Government as a Government, the new plan is less safe, less economical, and less convenient for the Treasury, than the old one, which a half century's experience has sanctioned and approved.

What may be the operation of the new plan upon the resources of the Treasury is a different, but a very important fiscal question. If, as I shall endeavor to prove in discussing other branches of the question, the effect of the financial policy of the Administration, considered in all its parts, should be to cripple commerce and check production, will it not, in reducing the business of the country, reduce in the same proportion the resources of the Treasury? And if the immediate resources of the Treasury be reduced, what is the remedy to be? Either you must impose additional taxes by augmenting the rates of duty in the tariff, or you must borrow money to meet the daily wants of the Government. This result is not mere speculation. It has been reached already; for already the Government is in debt. I know that, in the debates in this House upon the Treasury Note Bill, the friends of the Administration denied that those notes constitute a debt. But in the Senate this point was given up. And it had long before been given up at the Treasury; for, in the various tables of the public expenditures which have recently come to Congress from the Treasury Department, the Treasury notes are expressly treated as a public debt, and classed in the same column with the old funded debt. This is the only common-sense view of the subject. Already, therefore, the financial policy of the Administration has acted seriously on our fiscal resources, foreshadowing to us the greater evil of the same kind to come, either of a new debt or new taxes, to supply the necessities of the Treasury.

But the Secretary of the Treasury, notwithstanding all these considerations against the employmen of individual Government agents as the depositories of the Treasury—in the face of all the adverse experience of the Government on the subject, and of his own express and emphatic declarations of his own conviction in favor of bank depositories—in spite of all this, the Secretary, in that same sentence in which he covertly seeks to screen the new scheme by throwing over it the mantle of that federalist of federalists, Alexander Hamilton—monarchist, I believe, some gentlemen call him—in the same sentence the Secretary of the Treasury claims approbation for the scheme, because it is actually practised by some of the monarchies of Europe. His words are. "In the manner which is now in very successful practice in some of the most enlightened and opulent Governments of Europe, and as was urgently recommended by this Department as early as 1790." How much have we not heard this session concerning the federalism of the present Opposition, and the monarchism of the old federalists! How much research and learning have been expended by the friends of the Administration on this controversy about names! And yet this Administration, which, by a vain dispute of words, would arrogate to itself the title of democratic, is thus found, in respect of that only thing which constitutes its peculiar political creed, clothing itself in the cast-away garment of Alexander Hamilton, and citing the example of the monarchs of Europe to show how well the garment befits the Government of the United States. To afford the proof of which, the Senate, that natural and proper ally of Executive power against the people, has, in the last Congress as well as this, drawn from the Treasury Department two very curious and significant documents on the fiscal regulations of foreign countries; and the Independent Treasury, with all its adjuncts, is gravely recommended to us by the example of the despotisms, parental or tyrannical, which control the chief part of continental Europe—to say nothing of Turkey in Asia, and of Cuba!

I concede that the history of other nations may well be studied by us; that sometimes an important fact, a valuable idea, may be derived from them; and that it would be weak and narrow to refuse a useful invention or practice merely because it originated in a foreign monarchy. In science, literature, and the useful arts, we may at all times learn much from the old states of Europe. But I am jealous of all European examples in matters of government. In this respect, I would sooner look to Europe for things to shun than for things to imitate. Our institutions, political and social, are totally different from theirs. Ours is a Government, not of new forms only, but of new principles also. In addition to this, our peculiar continental and territorial condition tends to separate our case still further from that of any European states. And I, having such prepossessions, am not inclined to think any better of any plan of governmental policy, because of its being practised in Europe. But, as the Treasury Department has been at great pains to obtain, through our consulates and legations abroad, a large body of information on this subject, to justify its particular policy, I will, in all fairness, examine the facts to see how far they countenance the scheme of the President.

Of the European states, some deposite in bank, and some do not. The examples, therefore, which this document affords, are both ways. On the first inspection of the document, there is one line of distinction apparent in it, which immediately strikes the eye; and it is, that while European Governments, like Great Britain and France, which have something of constitutional freedom in their institutions, which have elected legislative assemblies—Governments which are at the very top of the scale of modern civilization—while Governments such as these deposite in bank, and receive bank paper, others, which have no representative assemblies, nay, some which are at the very bottom of the scale of civilization, and but one degree removed from absolute barbarism, such as Turkey, do not. This general fact certainly does not tend to impress the mind very favorably towards the plan of repudiating bank depositories. Though it may be premature to decide the question upon this single fact, yet certainly it is a fact pregnant with inference and meaning.

On looking further, it will be found necessary to distinguish between the question—what shall be the Government depository, and what the medium of receipts and payments on the part of the Government? For instance, not a few Governments in Europe, especially the heavily indebted ones, make large issues of Government paper, which performs many of the offices of money, and in some cases is an express substitute for bank paper. Prussia and Saxony are examples of this. In the case of such Governments, it is a secondary question where they deposite the paper received for public dues, that paper being Government paper. And their example has no application to us, unless it is our intention also to be overwhelmed with public debt, to continue to anticipate our revenue, and to make large issues of Government paper money.

Nor is the place of deposite a matter of much consequence in this relation, if the receipts and payments of the Treasury be made in the same medium, and that medium be either Government paper or bank paper. The Government may, if it choose, lock up the notes of a bank in its vaults forever; that does no injury to the bank, but the contrary. Therefore the case of Governments which, though they make use of Government agents as depositories, yet receive and pay bank paper, such as Austria, Denmark, and Belgium, goes but little way towards sustaining the views of the Administration.

In this document we have, beside the great monarchies of Europe, information concerning little states like the cities of Hamburg and Bremen, which are of no application; because a particular system might answer well enough in the narrow limits of a single insignificant city, and yet be very unfit for a great country like ours.

Nor can we derive any instruction from the South American republics, whose practice is detailed in this document; for some of them receive bank paper, some of them specie, and others Government paper; their financial condition being, in general, like that of the United States in the days of the Confederation and of continental paper money, and no sort of use as a guide to the United States at the present conjuncture.

And the Administration, not content with sending us to Turkey to learn how a free people should be governed, lays before us the examples of the European colonies in America, such as Halifax, Jamaica, and Cuba. Truly a profitable study for the people of the United States! And yet the case of Cuba—not a Government, not an independent state, but the mere dependency of Spain, without institutions of any sort, with scarce the common benefit of decent roads or any thing else to indicate material prosperity—a solitary Spanish island under the delegated despotism of Spanish Captains-General and Spanish garrisons—this case, so monstrously unapposite to that of the United States, has been much dwelt upon by the advocates of the Administration, as countenancing their scheme of a Government currency and Government sub-treasurers.

If any citizen of the United States wishes to see this country reduced to the territorial dimensions or the social or political condition of Cuba, I shall not contend with him; he is quite welcome to enjoy his opinions on that head unmolested. Leaving that question, therefore, to others, it is sufficient for me to say that, so long as the United States consist of a confederation of States covering a continent—so long as the United States are an independent Republic—so long as the citizens of the several States are freemen, having rights of their own, and a country of their own to be governed for itself—so long the example of the political system of Cuba will be the very last deserving to be quoted for the imitation of the United States. I like that of Turkey or of the Barbary States better; for these at least are Governments, not dependent colonies; and if their ruler be a despot, and they grow weary of him, they have at worst the constitutional check of the dagger, by which they may rid themselves of one tyrant, and try the experiment of another. Not so with a little colony such as Cuba, garrisoned by a foreign army, and ruled by a foreign viceroy.

But they who quote upon us the hard-money currency of Cuba think nothing, it would seem, of political, social, or moral questions; they look to the single fact that Cuba produces a large quantity of sugar for exportation; and that is evidence, undoubtedly, of a certain degree of material prosperity. Whether that prosperity would not be greater under other circumstances—whether the consumation of dependent colony, forced labor, and specie currency, does in truth present the beau ideal of political, social, and financial perfectibility—is a question which it would be interesting to discuss.

But I shall content myself, at present, with denying the premises of the argument. Cuba does not, in fact, possess a stable currency of intrinsic specie value. Nor does the specie currency which the island has, such as it is, constitute the chief medium of purchase and sale for her exports and imports. According to the best information which I can obtain, the facts in this matter are as follows: Of coined currency in Cuba, the chief is the Spanish gold onza, or doubloon, and its parts. This coin is properly, and according to its original rated value, equal to sixteen Spanish dollars; and the doubloons of recent coinage in independent South America pass for no more in Cuba, though of about the same intrinsic value as the old one, which, by Government order, passes for seventeen Spanish dollars of artificial or forced value. Of course, the old Spanish doubloon is a mere piece of merchandise out of Cuba; and whenever that coin reaches the United States, in the course of our trade with the West Indies or with South America, it goes at once to the broker to be sold at a premium for the artificial demands of Cuba. So much for the gold currency of Cuba. Nor is the silver currency any better. This consists, not of Spanish dollars, nor of smaller silver coins at their intrinsic value; for such coins will not stay in the island along with doubloons rated at seventeen dollars, and there is no pillared money in circulation, but the silver currency is what is called in the United States headed pistareens, worth only twenty cents, but passed in Cuba for twenty-five cents. And many of these coins are, moreover, grossly adulterated. Thus, very recently, a large amount of Isabella headed pistareens, greatly adulterated, were sent from Spain to be circulated in Cuba. That is to say, though Cuba has no bank paper currency, but a specie currency instead, that currency has neither a stable nor a true intrinsic value. Add to which, that specie is the currency in small dealings only. Cargoes of sugar in Cuba, as everybody knows, are purchased, not with doubloons nor with pistareens, but with bills on England, drawn either upon previous credits or upon the consignment of the cargo. Do the people of the United States want to be blessed, then, with such a blessful currency of overrated gold and silver as that of Cuba? Impossible.

There is one European Government which, though not mentioned in this document, is relied upon very much in argument by the friends of the Administration—and that is Holland; and it is, I believe, the only independent state of whose example they do say much. That Government, we are told, collects its revenue in specie, and keeps it in the hands of its own individual agents. If it be so—if (which I do not believe) the public treasure is continually transported to and fro, from Amsterdam or Rotterdam to the Hague, or kept locked up in vaults, the example proves nothing to us: for a fiscal machinery which works well in a small kingdom like Holland, equal in territory only to the smaller among the States of this Union, and an old country, where money capital is in excess, and every thing else wanting, may be very inadequate, insufficient, and injurious for a republic, so extensive in territory and so various in wants and resources as the United States. It costs but a few hours of time, and but little money, to convey specie from Amsterdam or Rotterdam to the Hague. It would take as many weeks to make the same transfers from one extremity of the United States to the other. The example, therefore, seems to me to have no weight, even conceding the premises assumed.

But the commercial business of Holland is not done in specie. Amsterdam has its bank. Private bankers abound, and a paper currency, in the form of orders or checks, is used in the internal commercial dealings of the great cities.

And if it were otherwise, to what Holland is it that gentlemen refer us? Is it that Holland from which the ancestors of a part of the people of the United States came, and to which their descendants in New York may look back with just and honest pride? Is it Holland in the days of her commercial and political glory—that Holland which repelled the armies of Spain, which carried her conquests into the East and West Indies, which covered every sea with her ships, and which made the whole world tributary as it were to the little spot of earth extorted by its industrious, frugal, and hardy people from the Ocean itself? Is it that Holland which defied the power of Louis XIV, and contended on equal terms with Great Britain? Holland of the days of De Ruyter, and of Van Tromp, sweeping the English channel with the broom at his masthead? Holland of the days of the Republic, and of the old Bank of Amsterdam? No: it is not that Holland to which the friends of the Administration send us; but Holland, shorn of her splendor and her power; Holland in her decay; Holland at the feet of that Stadtholder family with which De Witt and Barnevelt struggled; Holland, become at last the mere appanage of the house of Nassau: this is the Holland to which the Administration points us, as one more of the European royal models for the United States to copy.

If the Administration must have royal models for imitation, why does it overlook the case of France, which not only receives bank paper, but makes deposites in the Bank of France? If we are to copy monarchies, let us copy great and liberal ones. France has none of this blind hostility against either a bank of France or joint-stock banks; and is not her example as good as that of Holland? I may be told that in France the bank notes issued by the bank and received by the Government are not of denominations so small as the banks of this country issue; and that accordingly France has more specie in circulation than the United States; but that is a question of degree, not of principle. What gentlemen propose in this bill is the proscription of banks, not the regulation or reform of them. If it were the latter, we should have little cause of difference.

Once more: if the Administration must needs have the benefit of some royal example to justify its policy—if it must go to the old monarchies of Europe to learn how to conduct the fiscal affairs of the Government—why does it overlook our fatherland, Britain? There is a Government which, differing as it does from us in its political and social organization and in territorial position—differing from us as all the monarchies of the Old World do—there is at least one royal Government which, in its chartered rights, its time-honored Parliament, its intellectual greatness, its trial by jury, its habeas corpus act, its advancement in commerce, arts, and power, its kindred blood, its municipal law almost identically our own—an American may regard with somewhat of partial interest, so far as he can entertain such a feeling for any thing European. Men are prone to impute to me a sentiment of hostility towards England. Not so. I respect her power; and the very reasons that cause me to respect her power, make me to dread her ambition, and to be jealous of her commercial and colonial aggrandizement. From a small insular state, England has gradually risen to a greatness of power beyond that either of the old Assyrian, Persian, Greek, or Roman empires. On the narrow surface of the British islands, at once a workshop and a fortress, England has collected and concentrated those extraordinary means of power, whatever they may be, which have enabled her to extend her dominion over the habitable earth, pushing her manufactures and her commerce into every corner of the earth, and making conquests in every clime, combining at once the territorial strength of Rome and the maritime strength of Carthage with the ambition of both, until she numbers a hundred and fifty millions of subjects, and is be ome the Queen, not of Europe only, but of Asia, and, but for us, of America too. She may now repeat the boast, which old Spain was once so proud to utter—that in her dominions the sun never sets; and of her, the saying of Mr. WEBSTER is as true as it is beautiful—that the beat of the morning drum in her garrisons follows the dawn of day circling around the globe. Seeing all this visible manifestation of the greatness of England, I cannot but watch and dread it; but I must of necessity respect it. And if I seek to know how opulence and greatness are to be achieved, I cannot shut my eyes to the peculiar commercial instruments and he peculiar fiscal agents which England has employed as the means (among other things) of aiding her in the prosecution of her extraordinary career as a nation. I should presume, at least, that the industrial and fiscal machinery, the instrumentality of which she had employed in the attainment of such wonderful wealth and power, must be better than that of Turkey, always barbarous, and now half ruined, or of Holland and Spain, which have been losing colonial empires faster than England gains them. And yet it is the fiscal machinery of the former "opulent and enlightened Governments of Europe," and not the latter, which the President calls on us to admire and to imitate!

Thus far, I have considered chiefly the fiscal question of an Independent Treasury; and I come now to the fiscal question of an Independent Government currency. Indeed, I have incidentally referred to this, in discussing the practice of other Governments. What, then, (as a fiscal, not a political question,) ought the Treasury to receive and pay out? Specie only: or Government paper; or bank and commercial paper, such as the community at large, and the several States, employ in their receipts and payments?

The Administration talks to us of the enormities of the United States Bank, and the mischief done by the banks of the several States; and then exhorts us not only to dispense with their agency as depositories, but to proscribe their paper. And here again it points us to the example of foreign countries. Let us look at this.

Suppose you had the will and the power to crush all the present banks. Would that put an end to banking? No; for though you should have no bank corporations, you would have bank princes instead, like the Rothschilds and the Barings. But would you rid yourself of paper money? No. Here again the Treasury document concerning the usages of foreign States gives us light; for it shows us how many of the foreign Governments which employ individual agents exclusively in the safe-keeping of their public treasure are paper-money Governments. Prussia, Saxony, Mexico, as we have seen, and others, have their Government paper. But what need of foreign example? We have no occasion to go to Europe to see how this project of the Administration works. We have the evidence at home. Simultaneously with the sub-Treasury scheme come up Treasury notes.

But it is said these Treasury notes are an old agent of the Treasury. They are so. Indeed, they differ in little but the name from the Continental bills of the Revolution. After that, we saw no more Government paper, until the period of the last war. Then, as a fruit of the necessities of that day, came these Treasury notes for the first time. And then, also, they came after the expiration of the charter of the first United States Bank. Mark that coincidence. But though the Treasury notes of 1815, like those of 1837, did not essentially differ from the Continental bills of credit, yet the Treasury notes of 1837, and those since issued, are a less disguised Government paper money than the Treasury notes of 1815. Not only were the latter issued as a measure of necessity to meet the war expenditures, but they were issued to be funded, and as a part of the funded debt of the United States. But the Treasury notes of 1837 stand upon their own bottom; they are not a mere evidence of funded debt; they are the original debt itself; and they have been issued—some millions of them, at least—at a nominal interest, for the very object of giving them the capacity to circulate as a currency. What is the inference? I know that it is not always easy to distinguish what is mere contiguity of place and contemporaneity of time from what is really cause and effect. I cannot help thinking, however, that, in this case, sub-Treasury is the cause, and Treasury notes are the effect. For, as I observed in discussing the Treasury note bill of this session, every Government must and will have some kind of intermediary between its debtor and itself, and itself and its creditor. No Government, in its senses, will voluntarily subject itself to the risk and trouble of transferring its funds all the time with a military escort from remote provinces to the capital and back again. Even Turkey, as the Treasury Department itself tells us, is willing enough to enjoy the aid of Greek and Armenian bankers in the performance of this operation.

Indeed, in the discussions on the Treasury note bill, it might be seen that the advocates of the sub-Treasury scheme disagree on this point—some of them adhering rigorously to the idea of using specie alone in the dealings of the Government, and excluding not only bank paper, but even Government paper. Such seems to be the idea of one of the distinguished advocates of this measure, (Mr. BENTON,) who has urged it on with so much zeal, industry, and perseverance. Others, with a keener perception of what the Treasury needs, have seen that Treasury notes, or some other forms of Government paper, if not necessary, were at least very convenient in the fiscal operations of the Government. When a Government is in debt, when it has occasion to anticipate its revenues, either bank paper or Government paper is indispensable, as all the European examples show; and sometimes both are found to be convenient, as in the case of England, which uses exchequer bills, as well as Bank of England notes. And, if we are to have no bank paper of any sort, I should hesitate to say that Government paper is not better than none at all, so far as regards the fiscal convenience of the Treasury.

But much has been said, by the Administration and its friends, of the losses which the Government has suffered by the receipt of bank paper. No part of this loss, be it observed, has been incurred by the paper of either of the two United States Banks. On the contrary, it occurred in the period of time between the two banks, and by the receipt of the paper of State banks. The amount so lost is estimated by the Treasury Department at five and a half millions. But was this truly a loss by bank paper? It is the depreciation on the paper of the suspended banks, received at the Treasury during the last war with Great Britain. If a loss, it was a war loss, and a war necessity. But was it a loss by banks? Not at all. The Government needed something with which to pay its sailors and troops, to build and arm its ships, and to buy its munitions of war and mouth; and it was glad to take whatever it could get—bank paper, or any thing else, with which it could meet the calls on the Treasury. The pretended loss by bank paper at that period is no more justly imputable to the banks, than the loss on its own paper is. Both were war losses, necessarily incident to the exigencies of the Government.

Finally, so far as regards the fiscal operations of the Treasury, the practical fact, I apprehend, will be this: A portion of the receipts at the Treasury will be in specie, which will go into the vaults and the custody of the Treasurer and his deputies, and will lie there a burden rather than a convenience to the Treasury, or must be transferred to and fro at much cost and risk. But very many of the payments will be made as they now are, by a check, or (which is the same thing) an order on a bank or a broker for the money. A piece of paper will more or less intervene. The course of things in those countries where the entrepot system prevails illustrates my idea. The importer places his goods in the public store, and when he sells he makes the transfer by an order on the storekeeper, or by assignment of the storekeeper's certificate of storage. Will not some such practice grow up at New York and elsewhere, in the payment of duties in specie? And what will the Treasury gain, in point of convenience, by the operation? Nothing. It is but the substitution of the agency of brokers for that of bankers, or of individual bankers in the place of bank corporations, as in Europe, without advantage of any sort to the Government.

But the fiscal question, which I have been discussing hitherto, is a question of mere expediency or Treasury convenience. Is a sub-treasurer or a bank the safer or better depository of the public funds? Is bank paper unsafe, or otherwise unfit as a medium of receipts and payments at the Treasury? And, though the answer to these questions may be adverse to the views of the Administration, yet there may be other considerations—great reasons of state—which dictate the adoption of a particular policy, notwithstanding its cost, hazard, or mere inconvenience to the Treasury. And this branch of the subject I proceed next to discuss.

What are those great reasons of state, then, which, notwithstanding that the new financial system, considered as a fiscal agent merely, devolves more expense, trouble, and hazard of loss on the Treasury than the old one, yet call for the adoption of the former by Congress? What are the elements of the political, as distinguished from the fiscal question, involved in the new scheme of policy?

As a political question, this matter regards the power and patronage of the Federal Government; its relation to banks; to bank paper and the currency generally; and to the commerce, agriculture, and productive industry of the nation, as affected by the fiscal action of the Government. It is this part of the subject which chiefly concerns the people of the United States at large, and which is the more frequently insisted, on, as a topic of popular discussion, alike by the friends and the opponents of the Administration; and it is entitled, therefore, to careful attention at this time.

It is obvious that, if the bill pass, it will immediately place additional patronage in the hands of the Executive, because it provides for the creation of new and most important and lucrative offices. It will augment the vast army of office-holders, which the Executive already commands.

It is equally obvious, upon the declarations of the Secretary of the Treasury himself, and the proofs exhibited by him, that it will enlarge immensely the field of peculation, out of which the individual agents of the Government have heretofore reaped so rich a harvest; or, in the language of the Globe, it will expose the public treasure to be plundered by a hundred hands, where one cannot reach it now.

Perhaps the scheme involves, on the face of it, less of that indirect Government influence which the Administration was able to exert in 1834 and 1835, by converting the system of the affiliated pet banks into an instrument of party, through appeals to the cupidity of directors, stockholders, and borrowers.

But, on the other hand, the Independent Treasury itself has many of the functions of a bank, and so far forth all the power and influence of one.

In the first place, it holds deposites, to the amount of some millions always, of the public treasure; and in that respect it performs the functions of a bank, precisely in the same way, and precisely to the same extent, as the United States Bank, or the depository State banks, when they were the agents of the Treasury. Whatever amount of public money they held under the old system, the same amount will the sub-treasurers hold under the new one. The power conferred by these deposites will be great at all times, in proportion to the amount so held in deposite. Even as at present, with a revenue unequal to the public expenditure, the President concedes it will be five millions. What will it be in case of a surplus revenue?

Not only does the scheme possess the deposite functions of a bank, but it has paper issues also. I have shown already that, simultaneously with the sub-Treasury scheme, Treasury notes made their appearance, having many of the qualities and uses of a currency, arising as well from their form as from their receivability at the Treasury in payment of debts and duties to the Government. I have also shown that, of necessity, paper of some sort must pass between the Government and its debtors or creditors, and, if not bank paper, then some form of Government paper. And this bill admits the fact on the face of it. In the 10th section, it is provided:

"And for the purpose of payments on the public account, it shall be lawful for the Treasurer of the United States to draw upon any of the said depositaries, as he may think most conducive to the public interests, or to the convenience of the public creditors, or both."

Here is a paper currency, to a certain amount, more or less. The 16th section enacts:

"That all marshals, district attorneys, and others, having public money to pay to the United States, and all patentees, wishing to make payment for patents to be issued, may pay all such moneys to the Treasurer of the United States, at the Treasury, to the Treasurer of either of the Mints in Philadelphia or New Orleans, to either of the Receivers-general of public money, or to such other depositary constituted by this act as shall be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury in other parts of the United States to receive such payments, and give receipts or certificates of deposite therefor."

May not these receipts or certificates of deposite be used in some way as a currency or medium of exchange? To be sure, the bill requires all "disbursing officers or other agents of the Government" (section 21st) to pay out what they receive, and forbids their exchanging Government drafts for any thing but gold or silver; but this restriction applies to Government officers only, not to citizens who are creditors of the Treasury, as contractors and others. If I contract to do work for the Government, or to supply provisions or any thing else to the army or navy, though the Government pay me in a Treasury draft, it cannot prevent my passing that draft to a bank or to an individual in payment of a debt I owe, or selling it at a premium, and paying my creditor in any thing he may be willing to receive. And the bill (section 23d) also requires the Secretary of the Treasury "to guard as far as may be" against his "drafts being used or thrown into circulation as a paper currency or medium of exchange." But everybody knows that this prohibition is words only. The drafts can and will be used in exchange; and the Treasury cannot, if it would, prevent this. So that the Independent Treasury has, to a certain extent, and according to the amount of its dealings, the currency functions as well as the deposite functions of the United States Bank.

This Government paper, IF all banks are to be done away with, will undoubtedly be so far forth a commercial convenience; but, if banks remain, it will be a mere engine of power in the hands of the Treasury. And it is by the issue of its own pape or of specie, and the refusal to receive bank paper, that the Treasury Department is to exercise influence over the banks and currency of the Union. If the Independent Treasury enables the Department to exercise any influence over the banks and currency, especially if great influence, then it adds in the same degree to the power of the Federal Government. If it has power "to unbank the banks," as it has been said—nay, if it has but power to restrict and limit their loans and issues, and to reduce their circulation, then is it a tremendous engine of Federal power, as against the States and their institutions. And if it be powerful for any assumed good, it is equally susceptible of power for evil; for that is inherent in the very nature of all power. Or that assumed good may itself be a great evil. Which brings me to a broad question of the general policy of the measure; to answer which, requires a deeper exploration of the subject, in the various details of its different parts.

What is the professed object of the bill? To establish an independent Treasury. Independent of what? Of whom? Of banks? Is that all? No, it is a Treasury independent of the people. The separation from banks is but one branch of the operation. So far as regards the place of deposite for the public funds, it is, apparently, a separation from banks only. But that is a very small part of the scheme, though it is the staple of all the argument on the subject, by which the Administration, appealing to the popular jealousy of banks, endeavors to throw dust in the eyes of the people, and to cheat them of their liberties. But the Treasury is to be independent in things receivable and payable, independent of the people as well as the banks; it is to have an independent currency of Government paper or specie, while the people are to have some other currency, unless the general currency of the whole country is to be Government paper or specie.

Will Government paper be the general currency of the country? Such a purpose is disavowed in the bill. And if it were otherwise, the paper issued by the Government, in its dealings, will obviously be insufficient in quantity for the commercial uses of the whole Union. So that cannot be the general currency of the people.

Will specie become the universal currency? No; the quantity in the United States is wholly insufficient to answer this purpose, even if it were practicable (which it is not) to employ specie for all the uses to which a paper currency is now applied. If drawn from abroad, by Government efforts, and against the current of trade, it disturbs the monetary operations, not of this country only, but of the rest of the world, as we saw in 1837, when the Bank of England, alarmed by the forced flow of specie to this country, adopted such violent measures to stop the stream, and thus contributed to produce the commercial commotions of that period. And the events of that day show that, in proportion as you force the importation of specie into this country by Government efforts, you disturb the balance of trade, and occasion the most disastrous results. Nay, in proportion as our currency is exclusively a specie currency, in the same proportion does it become identified with foreign causes of uncertainty and change. Everybody knows how much of sympathy between country and country, and especially between England and the United States, there now is in all the great operations of commerce; which has led to the saying that the barometer of our markets hangs up in the London Exchange. And, if we have but one and the same currency with them, whatever acts on them acts on us. Conscious of which, the last Administration, when it conceived this idea of a specie currency, and as a part of the scheme, had to adulterate our old coins, and to reduce the fineness of the coinage by greater alloy, so as to keep the coins at home: a fact which illustrates my idea, that, if you exclude from circulation all paper of our own, and render our currency wholly metallic, the effect will be to identify still more all our monetary transactions with those of Europe. At any rate, I take it for granted that the quantity of gold and silver now in the United States is altogether inadequate for the extended business relations and the diversified interests of such a country.

To be sure, if it were in the power of the Federal Government to crush all the banks of the States, and to exclude from circulation as well their bills and notes as those of individuals—if it were in the power of the Government to reduce the country and all its business and property to the condition which a limited amount of currency of specie alone would imply—that would be a very definite and intelligible object, namely: reversing the natural order of things, and restricting the business to the currency, instead of providing a currency for the business. Is that intended? Are we to have a pure specie currency only? Are we to repudiate all credit in trade? To reject the advantages of civilization? To return to the days of barbarism? For I hold it as certain that commercial credit, with the co-operation of paper, in the form of bills and notes, as the representative of money or other property, is one of the results of civilization; that by this, and this only, in the present state of the world, can the complicated and wide-spread affairs of commerce be prosperously conducted; and that a paper medium of exchange is one of the indices of legal stability and of well-ordered freedom in the relations of society and of business. On the other hand, in a state of barbarism, where every thing is insecure, where man distrusts man, and Government and its subjects alike distrust each other,—there is the proper state for a pure specie currency; for he who sells, will sell for nothing but what is immediate and tangible; and he who accumulates, will accumulate only that which is material, and so not subject to the chances of legal and social vicissitudes. Thus it is, that, in some parts of Asia, the rich man invests his wealth in diamonds and other gems, which he may conceal from the rapacity of his fellow-men and of his Government, because he can trust nobody. Is this what the Administration or its friends desire for the United States? I cannot believe it. I the rather imagine that those persons who reason in this sense, and who labor to this end, are actuated by a sort of monomania, and are bewildered by strong mental delusion.

It is conceded, however, by the President, and by the more rational of his friends, that an exclusive specie currency is impossible if it were desirable, and undesirable if it were possible. There is to continue to be, as now, a mixed currency of specie and of paper; and the people are to have, not specie only, nor Government paper only, but something else.

But if the Government are to have Government paper and specie only, and the people something else, then is the Government independent of the people, as I have said from the outset—not in its Treasury only, but in its currency also; and that as a permanent system of policy.

And what is the assumed relation between the two currencies? Why, that specie, the superior currency, is to be for the Government; and that the inferior currency of bank paper, drafts, and checks, is to be for the people. Such is the theory preached to us, and such is the precise point to which the theory brings us. And will the people of the United States submit to this?

I have been accustomed to think that the very essence of democracy consisted in the identification of the Government with the people. This idea of the separation of them—of the giving to the Government either an independent place of deposite for the public revenues, or an independent currency, or independence of the people in any thing else—is a new scheme of democracy altogether. To be sure, there is enough of this among those "opulent and enlightened Governments of Europe" to which Mr. Woodbury refers. There, the Government and the people are more or less separate in their interests. In some, the governed have extorted from the governors, the hereditary princes and nobles of the land, a portion of political right, as in the constitutional monarchies of Europe; in others, none at all, as in those Asiatic communities where all men (except the prince) are equal, because all men are inferior, and alike without rights. There the Government is independent of the people. But the United States compose a republic of associated republics. Our political organization is republican; our social organization is democratic; and all the influences which pervade the country, social and political, are democratic. And the dearest value of our institutions rests in the principle that the governors and governed are identified in their interests; that the least movement which stirs in the heart beats responsively through the whole frame, and the least touch on a single member sends a sympathetic throb to the heart. Government and people should sail in the same boat, to sink or swim together. And yet this Administration, professedly, and of set purpose, undertakes to divorce the Government from the people in the matter of currency; to give to the Government a separate and independent currency; and to do this, forsooth, in imitation of the separation policy of those very monarchies of the Old World, whose political institutions are (or should be) a name of abomination to every true-hearted American!

This Administration idea of the independency of the Government, of its separation from the people, dates from the message of the extra session of the last Congress. It proceeded on the assumption that the Federal Government had no power to do any thing for the people. For, if the President had admitted the existence of a power to act, he could not have resisted the force of the obligation of the Government to use that power for the relief of the people, in the midst of evils the existence and magnitude of which he has conceded. But, he said, the people were in the habit of expecting too much from the Government, which, in the present case, had no power to act.

The theory and the action of the last President had been the reverse of this. He not only assumed the power of the Federal Government to operate on the currency, but he was perpetually overacting; claiming the right, and admitting the duty, and arguing upon the policy of the Government, in this matter, throughout the controversy with the United States Bank.

Into the constitutional question of the power of the Federal Government in relation to the currency, I will not enter now; but I cannot forbear to point out the fallacy of an assumption which runs through all the discussions of the Administration and its friends. They talk perpetually of specie as the currency of the Constitution. I ask them to show me the word currency any where in the Constitution. It is not there, either in express language or by allusion. There was a bank paper currency in the country when the Constitution came into being, which the Constitution left untouched. It did not in express terms provide any currency. It left this for the people or for Congress to provide. All it did in regard to ~~specie was, in the first~~ place, to forbid the States to coin money, or to make any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts; and, in the second place, to authorize Congress to coin money, and to regulate the value thereof or of foreign coin. That is, it fixed a standard of value, by which all contracts were to be regulated and prices measured. But it did not provide that coined money—our own or that of foreign countries—should be the currency of the United States.

I repeat that I do not intend to enter into any exhibition of my own constitutional opinions in this relation. But the context leads me to investigate further the question of what opinions the Administration holds in the matter, and what its conduct is, compared with its professed opinions.

After the many disavowals on the part of the Administration of all power to regulate the currency, or otherwise to interpose in that behalf for the benefit of the people, does the Administration, in its advocacy of this measure of an Independent Treasury, act or speak as if it had no such power? On the contrary, the messages of the President are full of discussions on the currency question and the banks; Mr. Cambreleng's report is replete with considerations of general policy; and all the speeches and newspapers on that side of the question are stark mad with clamor against banks and bank paper. But if your power stops at the point of making some fiscal provision for the mere selfish wants of the Treasury, why do you not stop there in your discussions? If you have no power over the currency, then you have no business to meddle with it; if it is not your duty to act, then it is your duty to abstain. If Congress cannot legislate on any given subject, it has no right to agitate on that subject. The abolition question is an example. Be consistent, then. Why, if you have no power of legislation to relieve the people from a disordered currency, and to provide them a better, do you perpetually lecture and exhort us in regard to that which you profess to believe appertains exclusively to the several States? Admitting that you have no direct power, will you act by indirection? That would be hypocritical as well as unconstitutional and unjust.

The Globe, last Tuesday, cited authority the very highest—a private letter from General Jackson himself—to the effect that it was the object of this bill to accomplish a great "financial currency and commercial reform."

Let us have a distinct understanding on this point. Are you engaged in organizing a proper fiscal machinery for the Treasury simply? Or are you engaged in a great commercial and currency reform? If so, by what means, direct or indirect? Have you or have you not the constitutional power to direct, regulate, and control the banks, and to reform and establish the currency? If you have, say so. If you have not, say so. The messages of the President never cease to parade his denial of the power of Congress in this matter. Are we to understand that, though no direct power is given, the end is to be reached indirectly, by the use of some other power? If you have the power, direct or indirect, to reform the currency of the United States, that concedes the whole question; and if you have the power, I call on you to exercise it, and to bring in a bill at once, expressly, for this "great financial, commercial, and currency reform;" and let the interests of the people, not those of the Government, be its primary and principal end and aim. But if you have no such power, then I protest against your talking and arguing as if you had, and thus keeping the whole country in a perpetual fever of anxiety and agitation by the discussion of that of which (as you pretend) the Federal Government has no direct jurisdiction or control. Be one thing or the other; and whichever side you take in profession, take the same in action. Your present course has the evils of both, without the benefits of either.

If you persevere in the profession that you have no direct powers, then I demand of you to reflect whether, according to your own doctrines, you have any powers at all. I ask the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. ATHERTON) to reflect on this. In the last Congress, the House, on his motion, and by a vote of nearly two-thirds, adopted a resolution beginning in these words: "~~Resolved~~, That Congress has no right to do that indirectly which it cannot do directly." Does the Constitution give you power to "unbank the banks" by direct legislation? No. Then, "the agitation of the subject" here, "as a means, or with the view, of disturbing or overthrowing that institution (banks) in the States, is against the true spirit and meaning of the Constitution, an infringement of the rights of the States affected, and a breach of the public faith."

There is another question of power involved in this bill, addressing itself more especially to the ultra State rights school, if (without any disrespectful meaning) I may be allowed to use this expression.

The object of the bill, as described in the title, is "to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue." No express power appears in the Constitution to pass a bill of such a description; but it results from the express power given to Congress to raise and employ a revenue, and the power to pass all laws needful to the due execution of other specific powers. The precise thing, as we have seen, which the bill proceeds "to provide," is a system of individual agents for the "safekeeping" and the "transfer" of the revenue, and the exclusion of bank paper in its "collection" and its "disbursement." Such are the immediate objects and the provisions of the bill in terms. It is, in the letter, a mere revenue measure. But what is it in spirit and ultimate purpose? All the Executive messages and all the speeches and reports in Congress imply, and Gen. Jackson expressly says, it is to effect a great "commercial and currency reform." It is for this that banks and bank paper are to be repudiated in all the transactions of the Treasury. The Government is to receive and pay specie only, in order (indirectly) to reform the currency. Wherein consists this "reform of the currency?" In the regulation and restriction of the banks and bank paper, say some; in their total destruction and proscription, say others. To what object this warfare against banks? It will encourage the planting interest, say some; it will aid the manufacturers, say others. And thus we reach certain ulterior objects, which, from the stress laid upon them by the friends of the bill, would seem to be of more importance in their eyes than the narrow question of the fiscal convenience of the system as a Treasury agent.

Now this may be a legitimate mode of legislation. I do not say that it is, or that it is not. What I suggest, however, is, that when, a few years ago, the advocates of protection to manufactures pursued exactly the same mode of legislation—that is, such a use of the revenue power in the Constitution as should incidentally promote certain ulterior objects for which there appears no express grant of power—the act was on that very ground pronounced by the South to be unconstitutional, null, and void.

For, if it be clear that the Constitution contains no express grant of power to levy discriminating duties in order to encourage particular branches of labor or investments of capital, it is equally clear that it gives no express power to discourage any particular form of labor or investment of capital; no express power to regulate banks; to restrict their loans or issues; still less to destroy banks, or to proscribe their paper, and expel it from the community. Nor does it contain any express grant of power to encourage the planting interest, or to aid the manufacturer.

And will you do that indirectly which you have no right to do directly? Will you pass a bill which, though it purports to be a revenue act, is claimed and understood to be an act "to unbank the banks?" The South Carolina Ordinance of Nullification, the South Carolina Exposition, the speeches of eminent statesmen of South Carolina, agree that such legislation is an abusive exercise of the constitutional powers of Congress; that though the primary object of an act of Congress—the object on its face—be constitutional within the scope of some granted power; yet, if the ulterior object—the incidental motive of the act—be the pursuit of a thing not granted, then the act is, nevertheless, a violation of the spirit and true intent of the Constitution.

I assure gentlemen that I cite these documents in no disrespectful sense. On the contrary, I respect the ability which is displayed in them, and the gallantry of their authors. And the identity of the constitutional principle involved in the two cases makes the citation pertinent and proper.

Thus the preamble to the Ordinance speaks of 'acts purporting to be acts laying duties, &c., but, in reality, intended for the protection of domestic manufactures and the giving of bounties to classes and individuals engaged in particular employments," &c. So this bill may be characterized as purporting to be an act to provide for the safekeeping, &c. of the public revenue, but in reality intended for the indirect proscription of banks, and the imposing of restrictions on classes and individuals engaged in particular employments, and the giving of bounties to others.

The Exposition says: "The Constitution may be as grossly violated by acting against its meaning as against its letter." And again: "The Constitution grants to Congress the power of imposing a duty on imports for revenue; which power is abused by being converted into an instrument for rearing up the industry of one section of the country on the ruins of another. The violation consists in using a power granted for one object to advance another, and that by the sacrifice of the original object. It is, in a word, a violation or perversion," &c. These doctrines apply distinctly to this bill, so far as regards those ulterior objects of a currency reform, or of acting upon banks, or of promoting this or that interest, or discouraging any other; which objects appear to fill the minds and the productions of the friends of the Administration.

And there is a remarkable speech of Mr. Hayne's to the same point. (Senate, April, 1824.) "Will gentlemen suffer me to ask them," he says, "to point out to me, if they can, the power which this Government possesses to adopt a system for the avowed purpose of encouraging particular branches of interest?" And I may add: or of discouraging particular branches of industry, such as banking or any thing else. And again: "But, to tell us we have a right to resort to theoretical speculations, as to the most convenient or profitable employments of industry; and that you can, by law, encourage certain pursuits and prohibit others, is to make this not merely a consolidated, but an unlimited Government. If you can control and direct any, why not all the pursuits of your citizens? And if all, where is the limitation of your authority? Gentlemen surely forget that the supreme power is not in the Government of the United States." Do not these expressions seem as if they were designed for this very bill? How apt is the remark about "theoretical speculations as to the most convenient or profitable employments of industry," and the encouragement or discouragement of "certain pursuits!" And the whole passage, how emphatically does it not condemn the attempt of this Government to control, by indirection, the pursuits of those citizens of the States who have engaged their industry or invested their capital in the business of banking, under the guaranty of the authorization of the State Governments! Again he says: "But our opponents gravely inform us that this is a bill to levy imposts; and that it is, therefore, within the very letter of the Constitution." So here we are gravely told that this is a bill to provide for the safekeeping and disbursement of the public revenue. But Mr. Hayne replies: "True, sir, if imports (or revenue) were the end and aim of the bill. But surely gentlemen will not attempt to justify a departure from the spirit, by an adherence to the letter of the Constitution. * * If it be sufficient to adhere to the letter, without regard to the spirit and intent of the Constitution—if we may use a power granted for one purpose, for the accomplishment of another and a very different purpose, it is easy to show that a constitution on parchment is worth nothing."

These ideas seem to me to be, all of them, exactly apposite to this measure, and the objects intended to be effected by it; since, though the primary and professed object of the present bill (as in the case of the tariff bill) be a fiscal one, yet the incidental, indirect, or ulterior object, is another and a very different one. I do not mean to say that I adopt the ideas quoted, for my own; but I say that if those gentlemen at the South, who have heretofore concurred in the above opinions, abandon them upon this bill,—if, in their action upon this occasion, they admit that "Congress may do indirectly what it has no right to do directly,"—if they concede here, that the "using a power granted for one object, to advance another" is no "violation or perversion" of the Constitution—if they consent to "abuse" the revenue power now, by converting it "into an instrument for rearing up the industry of one section of the country on the ruins of another,"—if to-day they can see "the power which this Government possesses, to adopt a system for the avowed purpose of encouraging (or discouraging) particular branches of industry,"—if, on this occasion, they "attempt to justify a departure from the spirit, by an adherence to the letter, of the Constitution,"—if, in fine, they proceed, by enacting this bill, to "use a power granted for one purpose, for the accomplishment of another and a very different purpose,"—then I shall confidently anticipate, that if, hereafter, it should fall to my lot, in the defence of the interests of my constituents, to maintain the constitutionality and expediency of discrimination in the duties on imports for the protection of domestic industry, they will, for consistency's sake, abstain from alleging again that such legislation is either a violation or a perversion of the constitutional powers of the Federal Government.

Notwithstanding the President and his friends deny to the Federal Government any direct power in these matters, yet they propose to exert power, and to effect a reform—a radical change in the currency—by indirection. The points next to be considered, therefore, are, in the first place, are the objects proposed good ones? And, in the second place, whatever their character, will they be attained by the passage of this bill?

The primary object, the object of objects, would seem to be, to act upon banks, or, according to the current phrase, to unbank the banks.

I do not scruple to say that much of the general clamor against banks, which pervades the writings and speeches of the friends of the Administration, is mere extravagance, if nothing worse. Take, for instance, Mr. Gouge's pamphlet as a specimen of all that class of matter. He heaps together, in a one-sided view, all the evils and losses incident to banks, without any exhibition of their compensating benefits; and thence infers that banks are injurious to the public welfare. Suppose that precisely the same mode of reasoning were applied to steamboats. By collecting together all the explosions that have ever taken place since the application of steam to navigation, with the consequent loss of life and of property, what an appalling picture would you not present to the view! What then? Would you reject the use of steamboats? Have there not been advantages in the use of them far more than enough to counterbalance the disadvantages? Just so it is with banks.

Again. Admit, for the argument's sake, all that Mr. Gouge says against banks. Is banking to cease? No: all that is to be done is to transfer the business of banking from incorporated bankers to unincorporated bankers; for every nation has bankers and banks of some sort, corporate or unincorporated. What is the difference between the two? So far as regards the bankers themselves, the only difference is in a legal form of association, and the limit of their copartnership responsibility. So far as regards the community at large, incorporated banks enable many individuals to have an interest in the stock, which would otherwise be confined to a few great capitalists. And the Government, what does that gain by proscribing such banks as we now have in the United States, and rearing up a generation of Rothschilds, Barings, Hopes, Laffittes, Aguados, and Torlonias in their place? Who does not know that such men as the Rothschilds have more absolute power in Europe, more influence with Government, more to say on the question of peace and war, and the stability or the change of dynasties, than either or than all of the banks in the United States? Even Turkey has her bankers. Even Spain has her Bank of San Fernando. She has, to be sure, little enough of bank paper, or any other of the great instruments of commercial intercourse; and my heart bleeds when I think of that rich and beautiful land and its gallant people, and that long prostration of their industry and commerce, which is hardly a less evil to her than civil war, foreign invasion, or the loss of her colonies.

What, then, I ask again, is the point of all this never-ceasing clamor against banks? Is it to do away with bankers associated by a charter, and substitute bankers associated by letters of copartnership? A small object, truly, for the convulsions and agitations of these ten years. For if banks, in some form, are to continue, and bank paper also, it is a very shallow and superficial course of argument to be all the time indulging in loose generalities about speculation, and inflated credit, and alternate expansions and contractions, and the like. Bring the thing to a practical issue. What is it you wish to do? You say there is an evil: give us the remedy. Is it to destroy the banks? The arguments of many gentlemen aim at that, if they aim at any thing. Is it only to amend them where amendment is desirable, and reform them where they go wrong? If so, I go with you—my constituents go with you. The State of Massachusetts is no friend of bank suspensions. I say with Burke, that "a disposition to preserve, and an ability to improve, taken together, would be my standard of a statesman." But if your object be reform only, and you have the constitutional power to reform, why do you not bring in a bill for that express purpose? If amendment of the bank system be your purpose in this bill, why do you not say so in it? This bill proposes no reform of banks, but their proscription, and that alone. Like the grave, it levels all distinctions; for by it all banks, good and bad, specie-paying and non-specie-paying, are condemned together, and handed over to the same undistinguishing legal massacre.

Yet, as if absolutely to confound our judgments of what the Administration would in truth be at, and to cause us to doubt whether, in the midst of all these denunciations of banks, the Administration really intends any thing but to make a parade for popular effect, at the last session of Congress the President, after disavowing any hostility, official or personal, to banks, and after referring to his past course on the subject, said:

"I have yet ever wished to see them protected in the exercise of rights conferred by law, and have never doubted their utility, when properly managed, in promoting the interests of trade, and, through that channel, the other interests of the community. * * Like other State establishments, they may be used, or not, in conducting the affairs of the Government, as public policy and the general interests of the Union may seem to require. The only safe or proper principle upon which their intercourse with the Government can be regulated, is that which regulates their intercourse with the private citizen—the conferring of mutual benefits. When the Government can accomplish a financial operation better with the aid of the banks than without it, it should be at liberty to seek that aid, as it would the services of a private banker, or other capitalist or agent, giving the preference to those who will serve it on the best terms."

If the banks are of such undoubtable utility; if the intercourse of the Government with them is to be regulated on the same principle as that of the private citizen—the conferring of mutual benefits; and if the Government is to seek their aid whenever it can accomplish a financial operation better with their aid than without it: if this be so, what becomes of all the general declamation against banks which pervades and distinguishes the orators attached to the Administration?

Another great object of the friends of this bill is, to act upon the currency, independently of, or in addition to, the action upon banks, as such.

All candid men admit that the operation of this measure upon the currency is a mere experiment. No one is, or can be, sure that this experiment will succeed any better than that which preceded it. General Jackson overthrew the United States Bank, which did give us a good and equal currency of stable and uniform value all over the country. In transferring the public deposites to the banks of the States, he alleged that these would give us a still "better currency," and would, in other respects, meet the wants of commerce. The better to enable them to do this, his friends proceeded to multiply the number of State banks, to supply the place of the United States Bank; and, for the same express purpose, the Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. TANEY) officially prompted the new deposite banks to enlarge their discounts, and, of course, to increase their circulation. Meanwhile, the Administration was drawing specie from Europe, in order to force a specie currency in the United States. What followed! An excess of credit and of bank paper; a wild mania of speculation in all parts of the United States; a panic among the directors of the Bank of England; a cessation of their discounts to the American trade; a general suspension of cash payments by the banks of the United States; and the utmost disorder in the currency, exchanges, and commerce: this explosion of General Jackson's experiment happening almost at the very instant of his leaving the Presidency. And now comes Mr. Van Buren's experiment. And what is that? By the explosion of General Jackson's, the currency was blown up, and the patient lies prostrate on the ground, his limbs broken, and covered with wounds and bruises. And what does the new State physician propose? Why, to let the patient lie there, writhing and groaning in his agony, to bleed to death, or to get up and get well without help, as he may. Doctor Van Buren will not set a bone, or even so much as apply a plaster to a wound; and the only remedy for the case seems to be to discharge him, and introduce Doctor Harrison in his place. For, in the message of 1840, as in that of 1837, the President cavalierly turns over this great currency question to the separate jurisdiction of the several States and Territories—twenty-nine independent communities, in all—and invites them to remedy the evil. The Federal Government is to do nothing. It folds its arms, whilst the United States needs for its currency, above all other things, that security of some sort against the adverse action of foreign interests, and against the irregular and contradictory action of the several States, which the Federal Government alone has the power to afford.

Well, did the several States take care of our currency in the time of the Confederation? Did they in 1813, when all the banks out of New England suspended specie payments? Did they in 1837, when nearly all the banks in the United States suspended? Have they taken care of the currency now, when most of the banks south and west of New York are in a state of suspension, and seem likely so to continue we know not how long? When the present suspension began, which of the States threw themselves into the breach to stop the incursion of a paper-money currency? Was it the great State of Pennsylvania, with its Van Buren State Administration? Was it the State of South Carolina, which presents itself here as the Simon Pure of a hard-money currency? No, it was neither of these, but the Opposition States of New York and Massachusetts which were the first to breast the storm. Yes, it was the much denounced capitalists of New York and Boston who stopped the tide of paper money, and prevented it from overflowing the whole land in the same common deluge. The gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. ATHERTON) says, What of New Hampshire? I reply; New Hampshire, to be sure, acted with us in Massachusetts; and it could not well have done otherwise, had it been otherwise minded; for it was the mass of capital in Boston and New York which saved the banks of the Eastern States. We, in Massachusetts, do not profess to be specie currency men, but we generally strive all we can to pay our debts, understanding that to be good policy as well as honesty. And we should find it much easier than we do to worry along under the difficulties of the present crisis, if the States in the south and west, which, by their Representatives here, profess so much fondness for a specie currency, would pay us what they owe, either in specie, or, what we should be very glad to take if we could get it, in good convertible bank paper. And if those States which, by their hard-money votes here, aid the Administration to oppress the whole Union, would carry the same hard-money theories into the practical action of their State Legislatures, they would then give some countenance to the President's doctrine, that each State by itself, and not the Federal Government, is to adjust the currency question.

If the Representatives from those States will take it in good part, it will be edifying to consider what their Legislatures have done of late towards the restoration of a sound currency. Alabama—she has a majority of members here supposed to be friendly to this bill; and has she taken measures for a resumption of specie payments? No; but the contrary, as I understand, in granting an extension of time on the debts due to her banks. Tennessee—she has a Van Buren State Administration, which refused to require her banks to resume. Georgia, the same. South Carolina, the same. Virginia—I trust she is a Whig State; but she has a majority of Representatives here friendly to the Administration; and do her banks (ay, and State banks too) pay specie? Not at all. In short, the sum total is this: too many of the States, while, as States, they practise paper money in all its forms, and thus contribute their utmost to disorder the currency, come here as hard-money States, and thus enable the Administration to tighten its gripe around the necks of the rest of us, who, if they would practise what they profess, could shift for ourselves; or, if they would profess what they practise, could, with their aid, compel the Federal Government to hear to reason.

If, therefore, we are to judge of the currency policy of the Administration by existing facts, that policy is bad enough at best,—whether, as the President seems to think, the amendment of the currency is to be left to the States themselves; or whether, as many of the friends of this bill declare and argue, one of its objects be to effect a "currency reform," by the proscription of banks and bank paper from the business of the Treasury.

One class of persons profess devotion to an exclusive specie currency; others profess that all they wish is to enlarge the specie basis of bank paper; while most persons, among the orators and writers of the Administration, content themselves with general declamation against bank paper, without proposing any thing important of a practical nature. Amid all the clashing opinions of the day, there is probably less difference on this subject, in the minds of discreet persons, than is generally imagined. That the specie hobby is all naught, is very clear; that suspended banks and irredeemable bank paper are quite wrong, is equally clear. And it is full time the currency question was withdrawn from politics, and settled upon the true principle, that the essence of a good currency is uniformity with stability and sufficiency; it being less material what it is, if it be such. And this brings me to another division of the objects and assumed benefits of this measure—which is, its effect on commerce; for Gen. Jackson, as quoted by the Globe, tells us it is to effect a commercial as well as currency reform.

Commerce being the exchange of commodities, in order to prosper, it needs, first, a medium of direct payment, sufficient in quantity, fixed in value, and, as near as may be, equal in all parts of the country; secondly, for remote operations, where payment is to be made, not from hand to hand, but by bills of exchange, then a rate of exchange, reasonable in amount, and the lower the better; and, thirdly, commercial credit and mutual confidence. Whenever, for any cause, the currency and exchanges are insufficient or bad, and confidence or credit is disturbed, in such circumstances commerce of necessity labors.

Now, if the object of the Administration be to establish an exclusive specie currency, the result must be, as I have heretofore argued, either that the currency will be insufficient to carry on the commerce of the country in its present state, and thus will fail to perform its proper office, or the commerce must be cut down to that currency, and so be crippled and paralyzed. If the object of the Administration be, that we should depend upon the bank bills of the States, in that case we have a currency, as the present state of things shows, neither stable nor uniform. The Administration excludes (professedly at least) the idea of Government paper as well as United States Bank paper; so that, in fact, nothing remains except the paper either of the banks or the States, unequal and irregular as it is, or the paper which individuals might issue under a system of free banking. How the latter would operate, is a mere speculation; for, though it has been proposed, yet it is an untried experiment, in regard to which there is an almost total absence of ascertained or conclusive facts. At any rate, I do not understand that the Administration takes up this plan; and our commerce remains, therefore, so far as regards the currency, surrounded with the present difficulties in which the empirical schemes of the Administration have involved us, with the certainty that it still persists in those schemes, but without any certainty as to what are in truth its precise aims and ends.

And so as to the exchanges. Their equality in the time of the United States Bank is an historical fact, which stands forth in striking contrast with their present inequality under the tinkering of the Government and the disorganized condition of the State banks. The Administration does not, that I can perceive, propose any thing whatever to meet this difficulty, except in so far as the Government paper provided for in this bill may serve to that end. But the amount of aid to the exchanges to be derived from this source is confined within very narrow limits. This consists, in the first place, of the revenues of the Post Office—amounting to say five million dollars, but which now, as heretofore, goes chiefly to pay the mail contractors, and is therefore of no use in commerce. It consists, in the second place, of the payments at or from the Treasury—equal in amount, at most, to the sum annually expended by the Government, say thirty million dollars; a part of which may enter, in one way or another, into commerce, though in doing so it will run counter to the professed object of the bill, which enjoins upon the Secretary of the Treasury to keep his drafts out of circulation as far as may be; because, if they enter largely into circulation, then, as I have before argued, the Independent Treasury is a Government Bank. And this remark applies to any other miscellaneous form of Government drafts or receipts which may grow up out of the operations of the Treasury.

Whilst in all these particulars the commerce of the country derives little aid from the financial schemes of the Administration, and is on the contrary greatly obstructed and injured by them, in another respect, also, it suffers infinitely under the policy of the Government. Confidence and credit, which are the basis of all prosperous commerce, are struck at directly by the Administration, in the holding of so much public treasure, which, under this bill, is to be locked up in the vaults of the Treasury, and so withdrawn from business, either for direct use, or for use as a basis of bank issues; contrary to the opinion expressed by General Jackson himself, in one of his messages, to the effect that locking up the public treasure in this way is a positive wrong done to the people. Confidence and credit are struck at indirectly by the Administration in the destructive and radical doctrines which many of its partisans utter, alarming capitalists, and checking their operations; as also in those many of the acts or declarations of the Administration denunciatory of the banks, which are thus held in perpetual terror of runs for specie, of the withdrawal of their charters, and of bankrupt laws for their particular destruction. Commercial credit is also struck at by the Administration directly, and at the tenderest point; in the wild declamation of its partisans against the use of borrowed capital: the strangest of all things to come from professors of democracy, since credit is the only means by which the industrious and enterprising poor man is able to trade at all, and without which all the gains of commerce would be monopolized by rich capitalists alone, instead of being diffused through the community wherever industry and integrity exist, as they have been and will be under the influence of any just and proper system of confidence and credit, unembarrassed by the crudities of a mischief-making Government.

But eminent advocates of the Administration are found, who claim for this bill the merit of being a boon to the productive industry of the country, who urge this as among the objects to be promoted by it, and the motives for its enactment. Though the currency is disordered by the policy of the Administration, and exchanges too; and though the internal commerce of the country is in a most languishing state; and agriculture and manufacture, which are so dependent on commerce, suffer in its train; yet this bill is to advance the productive industry of the United States. And how? By reducing, or tending to reduce, the cost of production, which is one day said to be advantageous to the planter, and the next to the manufacturer.

Now, supposing any such advantage to accrue from the operation of this bill on currency and bank paper, (which is the argument;) to whose particular profit is it to inure? Plainly to that of the manufacturer-capitalist, and the planter-capitalist, at the expense of the laborers hired or employed by each; that is, of the great mass of the community. The capitalist-undertaker, whether in planting or manufacture, is to get his work done cheaper, and thus to have the cost price of the article raised or manufactured less. Thus, the merchant is to have a ship built cheaper, not by obtaining at any less price the foreign hemp, iron, sail-cloth, and copper, which constitute so large a part in cost of all her materials, but by paying less to the carpenters. This, and this alone, is the result of reducing the cost of production to a specie standard. So of an invoice of goods manufactured, or any thing else; the production is to cost less to the capitalist, by the mechanics receiving less, under a specie currency, or an approximation to that. I put it to gentlemen to speak out, and say whether this be not the true mode in which a reduction of the cost of production will work; and, if so, whether this be just and equal, and for the good of the many.

But I may be asked, if this be the operation of the bill, why do not the capitalists, north and south, unite in the support of it? I reply for my constituents, that they would disdain to receive from the Government a supposed benefit, which is to the general prejudice of the community as a body, in the general injury of which they would lose more in the end than they would gain by the supposed advantage to themselves in the beginning. Nor do they believe that, in the long run, any advantage is to accrue to them separately. Their best interest is in the prosperity of the whole community. Though, by the payment of all duties in specie, the relative amount of the protecting duty on manufactures were to be in a small degree augmented, and the cost of production some little diminished by the reduction of the price of labor to a specie standard, yet the manufacturer, or other producer, is no better off than before, without there be regular and equal exchanges and currency with which to carry on his operations, and without there be such general prosperity of all branches of business as may ensure to him a steady demand for consumption, and a consequent steady market for the sale of his merchandise.

It remains only that I advert to the question, whether, whatever may be the ulterior and incidental objects of the Administration, be these good or bad, they will be attained by the passage of this bill.

Does the Administration really desire to accomplish those objects—any of them; and, if so, which of them? I profess that I cannot tell. Its own precise ends are so covered up in the obscurity of mere generalities, and of intangible abstractions, now swinging over towards the specie currency school, and now again back to the bank interest, that I doubt whether it knows itself at what mark it would have the pendulum to rest. For instance: would the Administration destroy bank corporations? When I see how prone its friends are to grow rabid and almost foam at the mouth at the very name of a bank—when I reflect that declamation against banks constitutes the staple of all they say—and when I call to mind the wild visions of a general specie currency, which some of the more zealous, or it may be the more sincere of its friends have entertained and avowed—at such times I might suppose that it intended to make root and branch work with all banks whatever; for, otherwise, the effusion of so much wordy fury against them is idle, absurd, undignified, and unjust. But then, on the other hand, the President tells us that he has never doubted the utility of banks. Again: while some of the friends of the Administration are thus frantic in their denunciation of banks, others are found who take pains to assure us that they have no sentiments of hostility whatever towards those institutions. Nay, as I mentioned before, it happens that not a few of those States which give utterance, through their State Governments or their Representatives here, to the greatest quantity of bank denunciation, are themselves, as States, inseparably identified with banks of their own. What conclusion is a plain man to come to, under such circumstances, as to that which the Administration really intends?

But if the Administration really intends to proscribe banks and bank paper, as this bill professes, and as the words (but not the acts) of its friends declare, and if its object be to effect a "currency reform," has it the power to do this? Can it stand the shock of individual interests? Will it dare to enter into conflict with the power of the States, so many of which are directly and largely interested in banks? Will those States consent to a bankrupt law, for instance, to embrace their banks? I doubt it. Some affect to believe this; but I do not. In a word, too many of the objects behind this bill, which are professed by the friends of the Administration, are morally, politically, and physically impracticable, and too evidently so, for me to repose much trust in the good faith of the measure.

And if this Administration is bent upon the accomplishment of those ulterior objects, the discussion of which is by so many of its friends associated with this bill, will it continue in power long enough to effect them? This is a question which time only can determine.

Certain it is, that some of the most intelligent friends of the Administration begin themselves to betray a distrust of the efficacy of this bill for an ulterior good, by the language in which they deny its efficiency for evil. Thus, the Boston Morning Post, a principal Administration journal in the East, says, recently:

"The Government has now no deposites, and has made none for a long time; and it matters little where the few scattering dollars unexpended are kept. They have had, and can have, no effect upon the country, one way or the other."

And the Democratic Review, in the last number, says:

"Though the immediate influence of this reform upon the currency of the country will be but slight, notwithstanding the most exaggerated views taken of it by both friends and foes, yet, upon the future action of the Government, it will impress itself with an effect as potent as salutary."

Here is the distinct avowal that the immediate influence of this measure on the currency will be but slight; and that the views of his friends, as well as foes, are most exaggerated. I sometimes incline to this opinion myself. It corresponds with a view of the subject which has been very ably and forcibly presented by Mr. Charles F. Adams, son of my colleague, in several publications of his, which charge upon the Administration, as its great fault in the matter, its culpable abnegation of the just powers of the Federal Government in this behalf, and its consequent total abandonment of its duty to the people. For, after so many years' discussion of this measure by the Administration, it seems now to be chiefly used by it as a mere stalking-horse of party, and as an instrument of party ascendency. In this respect, the Democratic Review is right in saying that upon the future action of the Government, if successful, it will impress itself with potent effect; whether a salutary one, is another question, and depends upon causes and influences wholly beyond the control of this or of any other Administration.

For, even upon the premises assumed by the Administration, and conceding all it asks, the utility of the measure, or rather, the more or less quantity of mischief in it depends, in the first place, on the singleness and integrity of purpose of its administrators and the abjuration of all party influences by them; and when was there a time that this Administration was disposed, or, if disposed, was able, to act independently of party considerations and with a single eye to the good of the country? And the more or less of mischief that it may do depends, also, upon the state of the Treasury. Consider what would be the condition of the country, if we had a large surplus revenue locked up in the Treasury vaults. It would withdraw all specie from circulation. Nor is this an imaginary evil. Whatever disposition Congress or the Executive may have to keep the revenues down to the expenditures, and to keep the latter as low as possible, that is a problem the equation of which was never yet found for a length of time by any Government. Nothing is of more difficulty than to predict the precise quantity of revenue derivable from a given state of taxation. Sometimes a high rate of impost diminishes importation so as to dry up the revenue from a given article; and sometimes a low rate of duty augments the importation so as to make the aggregate of tax received on it large beyond all anticipation. Mr. Woodbury himself, on one occasion, (report of December, 1834,) with all the lights which the Treasury Department possesses on this subject, erred in his calculations to the amount of the difference between twenty millions and thirty-five millions, in the revenue of a single year. And though, in the remarks which I have been making on this bill, I have assumed, for argument's sake, the correctness of the President's idea that the amount of specie which this bill is to lock up in ordinary years will be only five millions, yet I greatly distrust that calculation. For the amount of public deposites in the United States Bank, and afterwards in the State banks, greatly exceeded this, for a long series of years. (Senate Doc. 1st sess. 23d Cong. No. 16, p. 5; House Doc. 2d sess. 24th Cong. No. 77.)

Suppose, then, a large amount of revenue on hand, and this in bad hands, in the custody of persons disposed to use the Treasury for purposes of influence and power. In such hands, and in such circumstances, the power conferred by the bill would be stupendous. It would give to the Administration, which might choose so to employ it, control over all the business of the country, and, by the combination of political power and money power, fix and establish that administration in the possession of the Federal Government. One cause of the failure of the State bank deposite system, and perhaps the chief cause, was its being not only mal-administered, but mixed up with the interests of party and of power. What is to prevent the same personal interests and party passions from fastening themselves on this system, to accomplish the same felfish ends? Nothing, so long as the same men and the same motives direct the councils of the Federal Government.

The Administration, it may be, has a majority of members here disposed to pass this bill; though whether that majority is not obtained by the chance result of a question of returns, and whether it represents a majority of the people of the United States, remains to be seen. For this measure is now under discussion before the people, who are becoming fully awake to the importance of the questions involved in it, and will themselves pass judgment thereon at the coming elections. Mr. Van Buren has staked his political fortunes upon this measure. Would not his friends best consult his and their interests, and the welfare of the country, by leaving the fate of this bill to be decided by the people themselves, instead of endeavoring to forestall their judgment?

The may hope to gain something, in a party view, by the passage of the bill now, in the expectation that it will immediately produce a settled state in the relations of business. I think, in this, they are mistaken, if such be their expectation. I myself have been half inclined at times to say to the Administration. Pass your bill; fix your Independent Treasury and Independent Currency upon the country; take the money empire to which you aspire, if that will content you, so that the business interests of men may be relieved from the anxiety and suspense of this never-ceasing political agitation, and give us a certainty at last, though it be the certainty even of death itself to the industry and enterprise of the country. But, on further reflection, I saw clearly that, if the bill passes, it does not give to business men even this poor benefit, of at length knowing their fate; for its passage brings no certainty with it. It will not aid the suspended banks to resume, for instance. Pennsylvania, Alabama, and Mississippi —these, or any other States, will not be restored by it to a sound and steady currency. Nay, General Jackson tells the whole nation, in his recent letter to the Ohio committee, that "an end to the evils of a depreciated paper currency" is to be reached, not by the establishment of the Independent Treasury only, but when, "in addition to this reform in our financial system," Congress shall, "at the same time, pass a general bankrupt law," embracing both "the banks which are now in existence, or may be hereafter chartered by the States."

So that we are not to see land until that event happens. Will this Congress pass such a bankrupt law? Ask those of the States which are identified with their banks, whether they stand ready to pass under a commission of bankruptcy. If they can bear the operation, we in the specie paying States can well do it. And if a commission of bankruptcy is to issue, to wind up and distribute the effects of those banks, which, in the words of the letter just quoted, "refuse to redeem their notes in specie," I ask gentlemen in the Middle and Southern States, from Pennsylvania to Georgia, in how short a time that operation can be completed? In three months? No, nor in three years. And meantime, whilst all the suspended banks are in the custody of commissioners of bankruptcy winding up their affairs, what becomes of the business of the country? Will that enjoy the repose and certainty which some gentlemen promise to themselves is to follow the enactment of this law? We know that, on the contrary, there will be such a crash and confusion of all business interests in the performance of that operation as this country has never yet witnessed.

Apart from all which, there is the question, whether in the course of a few months, a new Administration may not come in, either to admininister this law with feelings and purposes different from those of its author, or, it may be, to repeal it, before a new set of interests shall have had time to gather themselves around it. Under these circumstances, it is clear that the mere passage of this bill cannot produce any such settled condition of business as to aid the present Administration at the polls, or to justify the Opposition in voluntarily yielding to its enactment.

I have conceived it to be my duty, therefore, with my convictions of it impolicy, to resist this measure to the last. In so doing, I act in conformity with the opinion of the State of Massachusetts, as expressed by her Legislature, and as entertained, I fully believe, by the great majority of her people. I ask the Clerk to read the following resolutions of the General Court of Massachusetts, approved by Gov. Everett, on the 30th March, 1838, viz:

"Resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, relating to the Sub Treasury.

"Resolved, That the Sub-Treasury bill, by making no provision for furnishing a currency in and between the several States, fails of performing a duty authorized by the Constitution, and demanded by the interest of the whole country.

"Resolved, That the Sub-Treasury bill would, by withdrawing from circulation large amounts of specie, diminish the basis on which State institutions are founded, place them in too great a degree in the power of the General Government, deprive them of the means of extending usual and necessary facilities to those engaged in commerce and manufactures, and, by causing distrust, have a direct tendency to postpone the resumption of specie payments.

"Resolved, That the Sub-Treasury bill, by giving to the Government and its officers a different currrency from that provided for the people, and by increasing the power and patronage of the Executive, is hostile to the genius, and may be destructive to the permanence of our Republican institutions.

"Resolved, That his Excellency the Governor be requested to forward copies of the above resolutions to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, and that they may be desired to use all proper and honorable means to prevent the bill in question from becoming a law."

The resolution of the State of Massachusetts have been my guide in the course of argument I have endeavored to present to the House. They indicate the precise line of distinction between the views of the Administration and those of the Opposition, the Opposition maintaining the policy of identy of interest between the Government and the people, and the duty of the former to act for the welfare of the latter; and the Administration pushing to the utmost the doctrine of a separation of interest between the Government and the people, the giving to the former not only a Treasury independent of the banks, but a currency independent of and contrary to that of the people and of the States. And in conclusion, I have this only to say: that I repose the most confident reliance on the integrity and intelligence of the people; that with them is the right, as well as the responsibility to decide this question; and rehatever their decision may be, I shall bow with wspectful submission to their will, as that of the true ultimate sovereign power in these United States.

SPEECH OF MR. WHITE,

OF KENTUCKY,

In the House of Representatives, June 5, 1840—On the Sub-Treasury bill.

MR. CHAIRMAN: I do not flatter myself that any observations I may be able to submit to the committee, upon the present occasion, will be any just compensation for the kindness extended me last evening by the vote of adjournment. After the ample discussion which this measure and its associate measures—which, when united, make up the Financial System—has undergone in both branches of Congress, I rise, sir, not in the vain hope that I am prepared to add any thing to the information the committee has already received from gentlemen, by their age, their experience, their talents, and their acquirements, better qualified than myself to shed light upon the subject in all its principles and details; but simply for the purpose of stating the reasons of my own vote in opposition to this important measure.

I know the magnitude of the subject, considered in all its bearings. I fully appreciate the difficulty of my task. I feel my incompetency to the adequate discharge of so great an undertaking. I would that I could, in just fulfilment of my duty as a representative on this floor, have remained silent. But, penetrated as I am with a deep and abiding conviction that the permanent entailment of the system, of which this bill is the chief ingredient, will not only destroy the best interests of the country, but strike a fatal blow at the cause of civil liberty itself, I consider I have not the alternative left me of exercising my own inclination, to simply give a silent vote, on so vital a question. I do not propose, after the example of others, to enter into a discussion upon the relative merits or demerits of the opposing candidates for the office of Presidency. Not that I have any disguise or reservation of opinion upon that momentous and all-absorbing topic. I am free to acknowledge that, at no period of the existence of this nation, has there been a crisis that so imperiously demanded that the Administration of this Government should be in the ablest and fittest hands; and, sir, I am free to admit, I do think the hands in which it is now placed, in any degree, answer that description; I do not pretend to conceal, upon all proper occasions in what quarter I conceive that fitness most eminently resides, at this peculiar juncture.

In declining to go into the discussion of this topic, I am not to be considered as subscribing to the doctrine, that has been repeatedly advanced in debate during the present session, that the relative fitness of individuals for the Chief Magistracy is no part of the consideration to which a member of Congress may fairly turn his attention—that all such discussion is mere "political slang." I know not a more solemn or important duty, that a Representative of the people can perform, than by giving, at proper seasons, a free and unreserved opinion upon the political character and qualities of public men. And especially in times of universal distress and danger, like the present—in times, when well tried systems are rejected and trodden under foot—times, that leave nothing untouched that is venerable from long experience—nothing that is sacred from intrinsic difficulty—when precedent and long established usage are disregarded—when pillar after pillar, column after column, of the Constitution, has fallen by the ruthless assaults of a despotic Executive—the broken fragments of which now lie in heaps at his feet. Nothing but the consideration that the proposition before the committee is sufficiently copious, of itself, for one debate, prevents me from the discharge of this high Representative duty upon the present occasion. Having said thus much, by way of excluding a conclusion of my acquiescence in opinions advanced restricting the legitimate latitude of debate upon this floor, I proceed to the consideration of the measure before the committee. And that I may not weary the patience of the House, nor transcend the just limits of debate, I shall endeavor to confine my remaks to the bill under consideration, and such associated topics as are indissolubly connected with it. In the discussion of this measure, it shall be no part of my purpose, wantonly to assail the feelings of any individual, either in this House or out of it. I shall not touch upon the private character of any man; yet, I expect to speak of public men and their public measures as becomes a freemen, representing a free constituency. Nothing but an imperative sense of duty could induce me to analyze, with that minuteness of criticism which I do not feel myself at liberty to omit on so important a measure, the public conduct of individuals, filling high places. I feel that, if I attempt to do justice to the subject, I have no alternative left me but to speak with freedom—uttering "naught in malice"—suppressing nothing that is true—suggesting nothing that is false. Were I allowed to exercise my individual choice, I would prefer, in a spirit of mercy, to shield even guilty public delinquents under the broad mantle of charity, than thurst them with the sword of merited justice. But mercy to public delinquents is treason to the people.

At this time, there is an additional reason why I would gladly forbear—under no circumstances do I delight in personal assault; but, least of all, upon a fallen foe. The magnanimous commander will always protect from wanton insult his prisoners of war. The generous huntsman, even, will not permit his pack to mangle the captive game. In a debate, during the present session, upon a different topic, in which I took an humble part, the subject now under discussion was, incidentally, mentioned by me. And the Hon. Chairman of the Ways and Means (Mr. Jones, of Virginia,) having misconceived the character of my remarks, in reply, made me challenge, when this bill should come up for discussion, that I would tear the platform from under this Administration. A challenge altogether gratuitious. A guantlet I never throwed. Manufactured, and tauntingly accepted, by the Hon. Chairman in this language: "Come on. Aim your blows with all your strength—dip your arrows in poison. They will fall harmless at the feet of this Administration, shielded by the affections of the people." Now, sir, in reply to all this, I have not the presumption to suppose that any thing I may say upon the present occasion will effect the downfall of the existing Administration. This could not be, were I armed with the power needful, which I disclaim. Already is the "platform" torn from under it. Already is it fallen—prostrate it lies, crushed by the indignant condemnation of an abused and deceived people, waiting the forms of the Constitution for the official seal of its destiny. It is protected from any "arrow" of mine, had I my armor filled; not by the "affections of the people;" no, sir, no; but by a shield, equally safe, the inappeasable execration of an inflamed people, who have taken this work into their own hands, and who are fully competent to its execution, unaided by my feeble arm. Never, in the tide of time, was the adage more truly verified, that "Whom the Lord intends to destroy, he first makes mad." Yes, sir, "Quem Deus vult perdidit, prius dementat," is inscribed upon every page of the history of this Administration. Nothing but the forms of the Constitution preserved its existence for the short space of nine months. I aver it with an unwavering confidence, could the people in November, 1837, revise their decision made in November, '36, the same Administration that came into power in such a blaze of popular glory, would have terminated its career in a short space of one year, writhing under the burning decree of popular execration. Shadows of destruction were distinctly seen by the sagacious prior to its inauguration. With these introductory remarks, Mr. Chairman, I proceed to the consideration of the bill upon your table. I do not imagine any thing will intervene to prevent the passage of this bill. The edict has gone forth. It has come up from the Hermitage, after concoction here, with an endorsement to give it consecration—it is reissued from the White House—demanded by the Great Southern ally* at any and every sacrifice. It is doomed to become a law of the land. "Nero fiddles while Rome burns." The President, secured in the enjoyment of a fixed salary of twenty-five thousand dollars, to be paid in gold and silver under the provisions of this bill, feeling and fearing no distress himself, he seems insensible to the wants and sufferings of the people. Now, sir, that my opinion, as to the immediate effect of the passage of this bill into a law, may not be misunderstood, I take occasion to say, I do not look for, or predict, a volley of fresh evils will immediately ensue. God forbid. The cup of human suffering is now full to the brim; any signal addition would drive countless thousands into open rebellion, or into hopeless dispair. The measure, with its woes and miseries, is practically upon the country, and has been for three years past, and is destined to be, until the fourth of March next, whether this bill pass or not; unless the iron will of the party in power should yield to the melting appeals of suffering millions; of which, I must confess, I entertain no hope. This measure, I repeat, and will prove beyond a doubt or cavil, is now, and has been, in full practical operation since the day the banks suspended in May '37. Its ravages are to be seen in our exhausted finances—in the condition of our bankrupt Treasury—in our prostrate commerce—in our ruined manufactures—in the reduced price of labor—in the unexampled fall of the price of all domestic products—in the universal distress that pervades all classes of society—the laborer, the farmer, the mechanic, the manufacturer, the merchant—every interest, with two exceptions only, out of the sixteen millions of people that occupy this fertile and extended country—the office-holders, usurers and brokers. It is not a little curious to witness the agonies of certain gentlemen, writhing under the operation of this undisputable and, until very recently, undisputed proposition. Perceiving the dilemma they occupied, seeing no hope of escape from the merited responsibility of the existing embarrassments, and the fatal stab it inflicts upon this measure, every device, as well as the most unqualified mendacity, is now resorted to, to evade the conclusion, that the admission of this unquestionable fact, as I shall presently demonstate it to be, imposes. The ingenious stratagem of the honorable gentlemen (Mr. Vanderpoel) from New York, first deserves notice. He, discovering the dilemma which the admission of such a fact would place him in, endeavors to escape by a hypothetical denial of the practical operation of this measure. This honorable gentlemen, in tracing the causes of the present distress, with a flourish of self-satisfaction at his deep ingenuity, uses this language: Suppose the Independent Treasury bill had, last year, become a law; is there a doubt that the party which defeated its passage would now have ascribed the present depression of prices and stagnation of business, exclusively to that measure." Now, sir, you perceive, this is an important proposition in this debate. Upon the existence or non-existence of the practical operation of the Sub-Treasury, the maintenance of other important propositions in this discussion depends. I do not intend that disguised and evasive denials, such as I have quoted from the gentlemen's speech, nor the bold and mandacius denial, such as was published in the official organ of yesterday morning—from its relation to the President, carrying with it the authority of executive endorsement, in these words: "The Sub-Treasury measure neither now, nor ever has been, in force in this country,"—shall screen this measure from its just objections. Sir, the practical operation of the Sub-Treasury, for good, has been full, untrammelled, unrestrained, unrestricted, by the checks of law—administered under the more favorable auspices—in the possession of its authors—clothed with plenary, "voluntary," and "discretionary" powers, to use banks, whenever they could be used with "convenience and profit," as suggested in the annual message of '37. The fact stands admitted, repeatedly admitted, boasted of in the different messages of the President—in the annual reports of the Secretary of the Treasury—by the former Chairman of the Ways and Means in his speech in '37—"the premonitory symptom" of the President—the true exponent of his intentions and opinions; then and now high in his confidence, as evinced by a recent distinguished appointment to a foreign court, (Russia) that honorable gentlemen, during the debate upon this measure in '37, perceiving, through a defection of a small file of his party, that the bill would be defeated, in a demoniac defiance, announced to this House and a suffering people, in a true and genuine modern Democratic spirit, "This measure is in full practical operation now and will be for the next four years, in despite of lamentations here or elsewhere." But I will furnish the committee with higher authority than even this—upon this point I appeal to the record proof. I intend upon this proposition, as upon all others that I undertake to maintain in this debate, to deal in facts, indisputable facts, not idle declamation. The country has become disgusted and surfeited with theories, speculations, daring declarations, and broken promises. The people want facts, stubborn facts, that cannot lie. Figures, not figures of rhetoric, but figures of arithmetic. These are the weapons I intend to employ throughout my remarks, let them cut whom they may.

Now to the testimony. I read from the message of the President in '37, "And it may be asserted with confidence, that the necessarty transfers, as well as the safekeeping and disbursement of the public money, can be, with safety and convenience, accomplished through the agency of treasury officers." This opinion has been confirmed, by actual experience, since the discontinuance of the banks as fiscal agents in May last." Again, in the annual message of '37, speaking of the three modes of keeping the public money, to wit: a National Bank, the State banks, and the Sub-Treasury, he says: "in respect to the last, you have had opportunity, since your adjournment, to test the expediency of the measure, by the continued practical operation of such parts of it as are now in force." Now, sir, this extract requires a brief analysis. Mark the last words: "such parts of it as are now in force" These works are pregnant with meaning. What parts of this measure, defined by its friends, as openly avowed, not secretly conceived, I demand of the President, were not then in full force? Were not all the Government dues collectiable and collected in gold and silver? Were not all the revenues kept in the hands of Government officers? The President will not answer these questions in the negative. What part, I repeat then, of this scheme, was not in full force in '37? None, except the hidden, concealed "part," too monstrous to be avowed, too horrible to be broken to the vision of the people all at once, (the Treasury Bank "part,") until the country is reduced to a more ready state of compliance, by deep and intolerable suffering. But to return to the evidence upon the point I was discussing. I read from the annual message of '38: "With the exception of limited sums, deposited with the few banks still employed under the act of '36, the amounts received from duties, and, with very inconsiderable sums, those accruing from lands since the general suspension, have been kept and disbursed by the Treasurer, under his general legal powers, subject to the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury." Now, sir, with a short extract from the annual message of '38, clothed in exulting language at the beneficial effects of the practical operation of the Sub-treasury, I will close the testimony upon this point:—"nor it is less gratifying to find, that the general business of the country deeply affected as it has been, is renewing with additional vigor, chastened by the lessons of the past, and animated by the hopes of the future." Hear him! "The agency of the General Government, in producing these results, has been as efficient as its powers and means permitted." And in the enumeration of the means, all the potency, with immaterial exceptions is attributed, as follows: "And by steadily declining to employ, as general depositories" (mark you,) "of public money, or receive the notes of, banks which refuse to redeem them in specie." Thus, you perceive, when prosperity seemed to be dawning on the community, in spite of the mal-administration of the Government, our President, Dr. Sangrado like, is eager to seize the occasion and laud it as one of the happy fruits of the practical operation of the financial scheme, the ever glorious Sub Treasury. Now, when the deceptive bubble of prosperity is all at once bursted, exploded again, and mournful adversity covers the land, the President—no, not the President, that would be too unblushing—but his confidentail friends in this House and out of it, flatly or delusively deny the existence of the Sub-Treasury, either practically or legally, now or at any time, either for weal or wo, good or evil; and, with an arrogance of imposture, demand the passage of this bill, as a "measure of safety and deliverance" to an oppressed and ruined people. But, sir, I will not fatigue the committee by introducing piles of evidence on my table, to prove the truth of a proposition that is felt, known, seen, and acknowledged, by every individual in the community, whose candor is not blunted by blind and reckless party devotion.

Having, I trust, established, beyond the power of cavil, this proposition, I proceed to the consideration of another necessary preliminary question, before I go into the discussion of the specific measure upon your table. And sir, permit me to say, not among the least curious things of the present time, is the effrontery of the party in power, to boldly contradicting every responsibility that imputes existing calamities to official ignorance, inefficiency, or misconduct. Admitted axioms now-are flatly denied; denied with more self-complacency than speculative theories were wont to be. Such is the recklessness and desperation of the ruling party, operated upon by the maddening influences, no doubt, of the handwriting upon the wall, that long received maxims in politics, political statistics, figures themselves, are disputed, and as gravely debated as original principles. Sir, with an acknowledgement on almost every page of every message communicated to Congress since the 4th of March, 1837, of "wide-spread calamitous embarrassments," "of ruinous distress," and "disastrous derangement," have we not read, since the opening of the present Congress, in the official organ of the Executive—subject to his will and control, fed by the patronage of the President, and published under his immediate eye and inspection—this heartless declaration, "there is no distress that an honest man should regret?" Have you not, in echo to this more than savage, more than brutal declaration heard in debate in this House, and in the other branch, sentiments, approaching, if not absolutely equivalent—one distinguished Senator,* broadly denying the existence of any distress, denouncing every such suggestion as party slang—bank panic; another distinguished Senator,† not quite so reckless, qualifies his denial—"the extent of the existing distress is greatly exaggerated;" a third distinguished Senator,‡ with his characteristic candor, admits in his speech the present session the mistake he made in 1837, when he supposed the distress would be limited to "the manufacturing and commercial interests," and "that the South was comparatively in an easy condition"—that now the distress was pervading—universal"—and that the excepted South, as his most unwisely thought, is now most heavily harrassed. But upon this point, audacity in this House has improved upon the boldest in the other branch: we have heard here the cry of distress denounced as § "a monomania,"—"bank panic,"—"a demagogical cry,"—the country asserted not only to be in a prosperous, but in the emphatic language of a Western Democrat,‖ "in a vigorous condition;" we have heard the announcement of distress, met by the cry of panic, panic, panic, bank, bank, bank, ¶wolf, wolf, wolf, from various quarters of this hall, a House of Representatives, intended by the Constitution to reflect the exact image of the popular will and wishes, in its letter and its spirit; a House of Representatives, instead of holding a vigilant eye upon the Executive—a watchful care over the Treasury—an accessibility to the complaints of the people. The majority of this body, full of public confidence, boasting of general and "vigorous" prosperity, treating with the scornful cry of "wolf." "panic," monomania," a petitioning people loaded with almost intolerable grievance, ready to plunge into despondency. I say it with shame and mortification, we have witnessed in this House, during this session, under this reign of passive obedience and absolute submission to Executive will, members upon this floor denying the evidence of their own senses, closing their eyes to every thing around them, shutting their ears to the voice of truth, blocking their understandings to the inroad of reason, yielding a blind and indiscriminate sanction to all Executive acts, mere recorders of Presidential edicts, "sometimes in the very teeth of their previously expressed opinions; acting in concert with Executive officers, "many of whom the people regard with doubtful confidence, if not absolute abhorrence;" a majority denying inquiry into official abuse, closing the door of investigation upon fraud and peculation, ‡voting reward where justice demanded marked rebuke, §ready to grant with a profuse hand where public economy called aloud for retrenchment, instead of exercising a watchful care over the public money as the true constitutional guardians of the Treasury, and, unexampled in the history of this Government until within the last ten years, setting at defiance the elective franchise itself. Unnatural and monstrous as this picture may seem, abounding testimony pronounces it true, true to the letter.

Leaving this disgression, I come to the evidences of distress. Now, and for three years past, proof teems in every message that has emanated from the hand of the President, save his inaugural. We find it strongly hinted at in his proclamation; "grave and weighty matters" are feelingly announced. Fully disclosed in his special message, at the called session, the offspring of distress, public as well as private, in language such as this—"embarrassments in the pecuniary affairs of the country," "difficulties experienced by the mercantile interest," "I was anxious to enable you to exercise your constitutional powers for the relief of the country." Then comes the admission of "wide spread and calamitous embarrassments," quickly followed by the acknowledgment "of an overwhelming catastrophe," mixed up "with unexpected exigencies," "revulsions," "destructive consequences," closing with "universal distress," and "under the pressure of difficulties," invoking the "Supreme Ruler to guide and aid" a sinking man, and save a ruined country. Here then, sir, in 1837, we have the highest official information of the embarrassments of the Treasury and the distress of the people. Similar admissions are abundant in every annual message of the President, and every annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, from that period to the present time. The reluctant acknowledgement of the bankruptcy of the Treasury, most unwillingly made in the special message, this session, calling for a special loan or a new issue of Treasury notes; the rapid falling off of the prices of labor, the reduction of at least one half in the prices of all domestic products, proclaim it in language not to be misunderstood, and a voice not to be hushed by the heartless, ruthless, soulless retort of "demagogue," "bank," "panic," "monomania."

No, sir, no. The heartrending petitions of five hundred thousand individuals, now groaning under the weight of inextricable bankruptcy, would be conclusive of itself, in the absence of all other testimony. But, whilst our Chief Magistrate and his Secretary admit the distress, they in the same breath exclaim with uplifted hands they have had no agency, either direct or indirect, in producing it. Our President, in character with all detected transgressors, in the language of Macbeth, says—

"Thou canst not say I did it;
Shake not thy gory locks at me."

Well, sir, this is an important inquiry—an inquiry intimately, inseparably, connected with a correct understanding and disposition of the bill under discussion. There is an awful responsibility somewhere. The indisputable condition of our finances and our country being as I have described it—must it not be conceded by all candid men, that the existing state of things is most extraordinary? No domestic or foreign war for twenty-eight years—no public debt, when this Administration came into power, requiring an oppressive scheme of taxation—but, upon the contrary, a large surplus. No pestilence—no famine—no sudden withdrawal of the ordinary blessings of Heaven; but, in the admitted language of the President—"as if Providence intended to display the munificence of its goodness, at the moment of our greatest need, and in direct contrast to the evils accasioned by the waywardness of man, we have been blessed thoughout our extended territory, with seasons of general health and uncommon fruitfulness," with "domestic tranquillity and all the elements of prosperity" abounding Why is it, then, we are a distressed people? Why is it that embarrassment public and private pervades, that land from one extremity to the other—East—West—North and South—leaving no green spot, no oasis of prosperity, upon which for one moment to rest the wearied eye, or relieve the bleeding heart, in the mournful contemplation of universal wo and misery? Why is it that the present Administration, assuming the reigns of Government—with admission of uninterrupted prosperity—with an undisputed surplus of twenty-four millions of dollars in our National Treasury—now the surplus exhausted, a national debt of five millions already created at an interest of five per cent, besides incidental expenses, with a certainty, amounting to demonstration, that from five to ten millions more debt will have to be authorized before adjournment—the Government that a heavy borrower—the Treasury practically bankrupt? Why is it one half of our banks are suspended—the country disordered—exchanges ruinously unequal and oppressive, the worst of all blights to a nation's prosperity, public or private? Sir, it is impossible to impose, any longer, upon the credulity of the least informed, and induce the belief, that this is all the result of either accident or chance—the unavoidable revulsions of commerce—or that it is a "contrived panic gotten up for political effect." There must be a cause, a radical cause, somewhere, commensurate with the desolating effect. But I have heard it said, upon this floor in debate, and elsewhere, that it was not the true part of a patriot statesman to stop to inquire into the causes of distress when the Government was in want of means, and the people petitioning for relief; that the generous philanthropist never insults the mendicant, by interrogating him as to the causes of his wants. This is the language of the ingenious sophist, of the advocate, conscious of the weakness of his defence. I hold a very different opinion; I consider it the very first duty of a sage statesman, when he shall be convinced there is disease in the body politic, to suspend the proposal or application of a remedy until he has ascertained the generating cause, the root of the malady. This is the practice of all scientific, skilful physicians in medicine. The quack alone in politics, as in the healing art, administers to the surface, and their success in practice is about equally fortunate. It consists in curing one complaint by creating another still more pernicious. Mr. Chairman—I am aware that it is a task of some degree of delicacy, and much intrinsic difficulty, to investigate the causes of public and private embarrassment. If the individual who undertakes, fails in such an inquiry, he will not only be thought presumptuous, but arrogant: if he touches the true causes of distress, he may be compelled to arraign persons high in power, and fix upon them the charge of ignorance, mismanagement, infidelity, or wilful misrule, and, in doing so, as we have had repeated instances during this session, he will be censured by the tools of the Executive as the instrument of faction and false clamor, or, that which is still more unpleasant, he may be complained of by some political friend, so fastidious of national honor, or so full of the milk of human kindness, that he cannot find it in his heart to permit an expose of the public delinquency of the rulers of this nation—though guility of deeds of the most wasteful prodigality, of perfidy, of treachery; of inexcusable infidelity of public trust—without calling, for his labored vindication of the Executive—and castigation of the accuser. Sir, in every discharge of public duty, something is to be hazarded. Fortunately in this Republic of ours, the Constitution guaranties in every man, from the Chief Magistrate to the humblest private citizen, the privilege in [times of universal distress and embarrassment—other rights, than mere complaint over the calamities of the country, than mere petition for relief—the privilege of inquiring into the true cause of the disease, and of suggesting a remedy. When this right shall be denied, the people, or the Representatives of the people, stifled in its exercise on this floor by the despotic abuse of the previous question, this boasted Republic will cease to be worth its expenses. Instead of a Government of protection, it will prove a Government of oppression—of tyrannical oppression—though the forms of freedom may remain unimpaired. Holding this to be my constitutional privilege, and taking the example of the Chief Magistrate as my precedent, I proceed to the discharge of the task at all hazards: and, that I may not be amenable to the imputation of a lack of courtesy to the President, I propose to notice, in the first place, his speculations upon the causes of the present and past derangements in the affairs of this nation, public and private, during the period of the past and present Administrations. The President, in his special message of '37, attributed the embarrassments of the country, primarily, "to an over action in all the departments of business—an over-action, deriving its first impulses from antecedent causes, (deep mystery, profound non-committal, blank specification,) stimulated to its destructive consequences by excessive issues of bank paper." These were the leading causes—secondary causes—reckless speculation—misapplication of labor—the rapid growth of luxurious habits among all classes, "rich and poor" live too well, and work too little. And, finally, "a general proneness upon the part of the people of looking to the Government for too much." The throne has become impatient with the groans of a suffering people. O, the beneficence of modern Democracy! How tender a regard for popular wants and griefs! What an example of submission to popular will, "the life blood of a Republic." Now, sir, if this be all true, and it shall turn out, upon a fair examination, that neither the past or the present Administration, (which is merely a supplement to the past, the present rulers being responsible for the misconduct of both, as I shall demonstrate before I have done,) has had any agency in bringing about the existing state of things, I shall be, I acknowledge, most reluctantly forced to the conclusion that the people, with malice prepense, without excuse or apology, have been the cause of their own ruin. But I shall require proof more clear, and reasoning more forcible, than I have read in the elaborate messages of the President, or the still more elaborate reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, or in the speeches of the supporters of the Administration in this or the other branch of Congress, before I will be compelled to this unwilling conclusion. Why, sir, what does this explanation amount to? It resolves itself into this. That we have a very wise and good Administration, but that we are a very foolish and wicked people—self-destroyers—wayward beings—unkind and ungrateful constituents opposing the measures and vilifying public officers, whose whole study and aim is our prosperity and happiness, unalloyed by any selfish motives. Why, sir, if these things all be true, I look upon our Chief Magistrate and his associates in power as the most unfortunate of men. But it seems to me, this must be a painful admission, a grievous acknowledgment, for a set of doting Democrats, like our Chief Magistrate and his friends. What, concede that the people, the dear people, the intelligent, the virtuous people, are not capable of self-government; charge them with knowingly and willingly running headlong into the whirlpool of embarrassment, in despite of the admonitions and intercessions of wise and benevolence rulers. This doctrine strikes a death blow at the vitals of Democracy. It establishes the supreme folly of the sages and patriots of the Revolution, who expended their treasure, and poured out their blood, in erecting this Government, based upon the fundamental principle that man was capable of self-government. It shall be my purpose, for a few moments, to look into this matter. Federalist and aristocrat as I am denominated, as well as all others, who question the infallibility of the powers that be, (by the self-styled Democrats,) I interpose, as the advocate of self-government to vindicate the people from this false and foul imputation. It shall be my purpose, in a very concise manner, to prove that our difficulties both public and private are mainly, if not entirely, justly ascribable to the policy of the past and present Administration; to the violent and lawless assaults upon useful, necessary, and well tried institutions. The unceasing tinkering with the currency, and commerce, its inseparable handmaid; violating and destroying all the approved and established principles and laws of both, abusing the highest prerogative of the Government, the currency power of the Constitution, using it as a privileged weapon, of political capital, prostituting it to the selfish and sordid purpose of party profit, and party aggrandizement, reckless of the destruction of thousands and tens of thousands who fell victims of credulity, to the miserable humbugs that were kept unceasingly dancing before their eyes, recommended and endorsed by the Executive and his leading supporters, with the most extravagant assurances of sound policy and permanent success.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to explode this fine theory of the President's to the satisfaction of you and all other believers in his infallibility, it is only necessary to call your attention to certain parts of the annual message, communicated to Congress the present session. After three years' intense and profound study of finance, and commerce, the President has discovered that his confident speculations of '37 on the embarrassments of the country were all a mistake, altogether a superficial view of the subject. The President having turned his attention to the investigation of the profound mysteries of trade, exchange, credit and finance, with a confidence unwavering, and a satisfaction associated with self-congratulations, unfolds to Congress and the country, the unsuspected and undiscovered cause of the universal suspension of our banks, in 1837; the embarrassment of the finances, and the universal derangement of commerce and business of all kinds. He traces it with a clearness, as he says, that puts to rest all dispute; that the radical, fundamental cause is to be found in the dependence of the trade, exchange, banking system, and credit system of this country, upon the "money power" in Great Britain,—the Bank of England. The President in his message undertakes, in his way, to anatomize the principles and laws of trade, exchange and credit; and so satisfactory are the results of his examination, to his own mind, that he concludes it must be an admitted axiom, now and hereafter in the science of political economy—that such is the indissoluble connection between the commerce and banking system of this country and the commerce and banking system of Great Britain, that the prosperity of trade, the solidity of the currency and credit of the United States, is fostered, cherished and supported by the forbearance and smiles, and can be blighted and destroyed by the frowns or nod of the "money power of Great Britain, the Bank of England." That such is the natural link of connection, between the banks, currency, trade and credit of this country, with with the money power of England, that her influence over all these essential and vital interests—vital to our prosperity as a people—vital to our liberty as a free nation—is absolute, supreme, omnipotent. If this be true, we are in a most deplorable condition; it is positively humiliating to the mind of every patriot; and as this theory swallows up the previous speculations of the President and has received the solemn endorsement—the fulsome laudation of several distinguished followers of the President in both branches of Congress. "This sober second thought" deserves examination. It not being my lot to be one of the believers in the infallibility of the President, upon questions of currency and finance, I am disposed to doubt the correctness of his conclusions. I go further; I say their fallacy is exposed, broadly contradicted by experience, the mother of true wisdom in finance and trade by plain and indisputable historic facts. Let history speak upon the subject. In 1791, we had in this country several State banks, and a United States Bank; a commerce with England and the world. The Bank of England had existed a century, just, in 1794, when it suspended specie payments, by order of the Privy Council, and continued suspended for twenty-eight successive years, by acts of restriction enacted by Parliament. In the mean time our commerce continued prosperous, with slight revulsions, with England and the world. Our National Bank felt no shock from the suspension of the Bank of England—the money power of Great Britain, it continued without interruption, to redeem its notes in gold and silver, feeding commerce and receiving support in return—aiding our finances for twenty years, the life of its charter. The State banks vastly increased in the mean time; with now an then an exception, preserving their currency sound, redeeming their paper in specie. This brings us down in the history of this country to the year 1811, when the Bank of the United States expires by the limitations of its charter—Congress refuses a re-charter; State banks are multiplied; preserve their credit, as a system; redeem their notes in gold and silver, until by the disasters and calamities of war, a portion are forced to suspend; the suspension only partial. In 1816, a new United States Bank is established, for twenty years, goes into operation in 1817; by the aid of the United States Bank, the generous aid of the General Government, the State Banks, in a body, rise and pay specie. The United States Bank and State banks preseve their credit: furnish a safe and sound circulating medium; redeem their notes in gold and silver, without an hour's suspension until the month of May 1837—twenty long years. The Bank of England continuing suspended until 1828. This great central money power, around which all other money powers resolve, according to the recent discovery of our learned Chief Magistrate. Now, sir, in the face of these plain historic facts known or should be known, to every tyro in political economy, the President, this modern Turgot, gravely tells Congress, the country, and the civilized world, that this nation has not now, nor is it in the power of Government to create, a sound paper currency; such is the degraded dependence of trade, currency, exchange, and credit of this country, upon the money power of Great Britain—the Bank of England. That a suspension, yea an unfavorable breath, from this moneyed monster, strikes our commerce with a paralysis, and explodes our currency. Sir, the naked historic facts I have briefly enumerated, not only refutes the flimsy sophism of the message, but they establish, as far as long tried experience can establish the truth of any proposition, that there exists a power in this Government, a safe power, a beneficial power, to create a currency, that defies the money power of Great Britian and the world to impair its uniformity or affect its solidity.

Mr. Chairman, having laid bare the policy of the boasted "second thought" of the President, not by flat denial, not by counter theory or speculation, or argument of my own, but by the use of better weapons, plain, indisputable, unvarnished historical truths. I now return to the theory of 1837. This deserves critical analysis, not for its profundity, but because of the high authority reflected by official station. That the overtrading, overbanking, and overspeculating, enumerated by the President in his message of 1837, as the causes of the embarrassment and distress that then afflicted the country were the immediate operating causes no one doubts, no one disputes, every candid man concedes the position. But this admission does not at all meet the inquiry, it is altogether superficial, it does not prove the question to the bottom, it is a surface view. The question still recurs, what produced this overtrading, overbanking, overspeculating? What where the "antecedent causes that stimulated" all this, so modestly hinted at, so softly touched, so delicately broached, by the President in the same paragraph. In the language of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. Reynolds) "here hangs the law and the prophets." The causes, enumerated by the President, were nothing, but the irresistible effects of primary causes. It is due then to truth, and a fair understanding of this question, to look deeper into this subject, trace through these secondary causes, to the "antecedent" causes; the fountain—the root of the evil. I now propose to prosecute this inquiry. I have already said that the embarrassment and distress was attributable to the measures and policy of the past and present Administrations. This is my humble opinion was the cause; cause abundantly sufficient; cause fully adequate to the effect; sound philosophy requires no further assignment of causes. I now propose to establish my position. A true, succinct, and intelligible summary of the causes may be stated in the following manner:—

First. The embarrassment and distress have grown out of overtrading and over-speculating. Second. The overtrading and overspeculating have mainly proceeded from overbanking. Third. The overbanking was engendered by the destruction of the United States Bank and the removal of the public deposites, coupled with the existence of a large surplus in the National Treasury, which enabled the State deposite banks to increase their discounts fifty millions. Fourth. This excessive surplus was derived altogether from the sales of the public lands. Fifth. The extraordinary sales of the public lands, by the unwise policy of rushing the most choice lands into market treble as fast as the demand for cultivation required, stimulated by the facilities furnished speculators from the deposite banks. Sixth These facilities are derived from the instructions of the President and the Secretary to grant loans freely to supply the vacuum produced by the withdrawal of the branches of the United States Bank. This is my humble judgment is a fair summary of the causes of the embarrassment and distress in 1837. But for auxiliary causes, causes for which the Administration were equally responsible, the catastrophe might have been postponed. The suspension possibly would have been only partial, but for the adoption of other Government measures. I doubt not but the manner of executing the deposite act, coupled with the pernicious effect of the specie circular, upon the currency, banks and trade of the country, hastened the suspension; a catastrophe unavoidable and independent of these collateral causes.

Now, Mr. Cahirman, to the proof in support of the foregoing propositions. The first and second propositions being admitted truths, conceded on all hands, they stand as axioms in the controversy. The third proposition is controverted, flatly contradicted in this debate, and the responsibility attempted to be thrown upon the shoulders of the Opposition. It is an important proposition, it demands calm and cool inquiry and consideration; in fact it is the gist of the whole matter. When we have settled who caused the immense increase of bank capital, and the excessive issues, we have fixed the sin of responsibility for the afflictions of this country upon the proper shoulders. I proceed to establish my view of the subject by history and figures. The charter of the Bank of the United States did not expire by its limitation until March, 1836, yet the past Administration opened hostilities upon it early as 1829. I do not intend here to stop and go into the reasons of this premature assault, though that it was purely political, is susceptible of proof satisfactory to any unprejudiced mind. The war upon the bank progressed with unabatable fury until 1832; Congress passes a bill of recharter, the President vetoed the bill. In 1833 Congress passed a resolution declaring the Bank sound, and, the public deposites secure in its vaults; the President, by Executive order, the same year, commanded the removal of the deposites. March, 1836, the charter expired; the Bank went out of existence. This is the history of the United States Bank from 1829 to 1836. Now, sir, let us look into the history of the State banks for the same period. First, their number in 1829; second, their increase up to 1837; third, the increase of their capital; fourth, the increase of circulation; fifth, deposites, liabilities on bills and deposites; and see what light cold statistics will shed upon this much disputed subject. On the first of January in the following years, the condition of the State banks was as follows:—

Millions of Dollars.

Years.	No. B'ks.	Capital.	Loans.	Bills.	Deposites.	Liabilities on bills & deposites.
1830	320	145	200	61	56	117
1834	506	200	324	95	76	171
1835	558	231	365	104	83	187
1836	667	252	448	140	115	255
1837	677	324	501	186	155	341

By this table, Mr. Chairman, which is accurately taken from the various reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, it appears that, in the short space of seven years, commencing with the first year of the past Administration and the declaration of war upon the United States Bank, and ending with the destruction of that institution, the number of State banks doubled—their capital more than doubled—their loans trebled—their circulation trebled—their liabilities on bills and deposites trebled.

I now offer the statistics to the committee, to establish the fourth proposition, which, together with the fifth and sixth, are only corollaries of the third:—

Years.	Receipts from sale of lands.	Receipts from Customs.	Expenditures.
1833	3,976,682	29,032,508	24,257,298
1834	4,857,600	16,214,957	24,601,982
1835	14,757,600	19,391,310	17,573,141
1836	24,877,179	23,409,940	30,868,164

The table I have just read establishes conclusively, the 4th proposition. It is accurately compiled from the different reports of the Secretary of the Treasury. I have read this table for a double purpose. 1st. To sustain the proposition as connected with this subject. 2d. To explode an error that has insinuated itself into the head of many Southern politicians. That the surplus revenue in the Treasury, such a frightful source of evil, has arisen from the tariff of '28. A perfect delusion, nothing more fallacious, no truth in it, figures contradict it. Nothing but an omission to examine the statistics, ever could have impressed upon the mind of any one, so erroneous a conclusion. My 5th proposition is fully maintained by the tables I have read. I now ask the attention of the committee to the evidence in support of the 6th proposition. This is an important proposition, in the prosecution of this inquiry. I intend to make it clear beyond quibble; boldly and unblushingly as it has been denied on this floor, in the progress of this debate. I hope the committee will indulge me somewhat in detail upon this point. This question of who caused the excessive issues, I intend to place beyond any cavil. I read in the first place from the manifesto of the President in 1833; speaking upon the subject of the removal of the deposites, he says: "The funds of the Government will not be annihilated by being transferred, they will immediately be issued for the benefit of trade; and if the Bank of the United States curtails its loans, the State banks, strengthened by the deposites, will extend theirs."

Again, upon this point, I now read from the instructions of Mr. Taney, whilst Secretary of the Treasury, immediately after the order removing the deposites in '33. On the 9th of October, Mr. Taney wrote as follows to the deposite banks throughout the country, commanding them to open their vaults to the people. This is his emphatic language: "The deposites of the public money will enable you to afford increased facilities to the commercial and other classes of the community; and the Department anticipates from you the adoption of such a course respecting your accommodations, as will prove acceptable to the people and safe to the Government." But, sir, I hold in my hand testimony of much more recent date—testimony that comes directly home to the present Chief Magistrate and his Secretary. It is a short letter, I will read the whole of it. It speaks volumes upon this point; and not only upon this point; it sheds a flood of light upon other points, vitally material in this discussion. I will read the letter:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 29th, 1837.

"In selecting your institution as one of the fiscal agents of the Government, I need only rely on its solidity as affording a sufficient guarantee for the safety of the public money entrusted to its keeping, but I confide also in its disposition to adopt the most liberal course which circumstances will admit, towards other institutions. The deposite of the public money will enable you to afford increased facilities to the commercial and other classes of the community; and the Department anticipates from you the adoption of such a course, respecting your accommodation, as will prove acceptable to the people and safe to the Government.

I am, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Now, sir, I must analyze this letter. There are some remarkable features in it; though it is written with much brevity. In the first place, I call the attention of the committee to the date—dates are sometimes all important—Jan. 29, 1837, three short months before the suspension. The universal explosion, subsequent, (as I will show, in the course of my remarks, before I have done,) to a conversation of the President and a distinguished Senator, in which they agree, there must very shortly be an explosion, at a time when there was fifty millions of public moneys in these deposite banks. Another remarkable feature in this epistle, it is to be found in the concluding sentence. Compare it with the last sentence in the Secretary Taney's—verb and letter, the same. It would seem from this exact phaseology, in the material part of these letters, that from Oct. '33, one short month after the order for the removal of the deposites, the department kept a form of instructions to these banks, commanding free discounts. Such an order seems to have become a part of the official duty of the Secretary. With all these evidences, evidence indisputed and indisputable, evidences from the hands of the highest officers of the party in power, the same party now not only vehemently oppose an expansion of bank discounts, but utterly repudiate the use of the public deposites, as a basis for discounts. And this is not all. In the face of these notorious facts, facts well known to every reading man, we had it boldly asserted, in this debate, by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Williams,) likewise other gentlemen, that the Administration were not responsible for the excessive issues of bank paper. The gentleman from New York, Mr. Vanderpoel, makes the assertion, that the Administration had no agency in causing the over issue of the State banks, but broadly alleges that the United State Bank—the monster—was responsible. What lamentable ignorance; or what unpardonable turpitude!

In connection with this topic, I must ask the indulgence of the committee, whilst I put to rest another disputed point. It was asserted in debate, on yesterday, by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, that the Administration was in no way responsible for the vast increase of banks and bank capital. Not only so, sir; but that the Opposition had been the cause of all this. Unfounded in fact as the charge is, it has to be refuted, or it goes to the country, endorsed by an honorable member of Congress, with the confirmation, drawn from silence, that the assertion was true beyond a dispute. Should it remain unnoticed and unanswered, reckless as every one knows it to be, who is acquainted with the facts, yet it will mislead many. Now for the facts and figures upon this point. I will take the years 1835—6, which are selected, because during those years, a greater amount of the bank capital was created, than any two years within the period constituting the bank mania.

I hold in my hand a table, from which I read, containing a condensed statement of the number of banks chartered, and the amount of their capital, during '35—6.

States.	No.	Capital.
Maine, (V. B.)	23	$1,600,000
Massachusetts, (Op.)	33	6,820,000
Rhode Island, (V. B.)	3	350,000
Vermont, (Op.)	1	30,000
New York, (V. B.)	12	5,250,000
New Jersey, (V. B.	1	200,000
Pennsylvania, (V. B.)	6	36,700,000
Maryland, (Op.)	11	16,000,000
Alabama, (V. B.)	1	5,000,000
Arkansas, (V. B.)	2	3,500,000
Michigan, V. B.)	9	3,250,000

Now, I read a condensed statement of the banks existing, which have been authorized to enlarge their capital, and the amounts.

Massachusetts (Op.)	23	$3,600,000
New York, (V. B.)	2	570 000
Pennsylvania, (V. B.)	4	4,150,000
New Jersey, (Op.)	4	975,000
Alabama, (V. B.)	1	2,900,000

As evidence that the State legislatures only acted in accordance with the wishes and advice of the leaders of the party in power, our present Chief Magistrate at the head, I will read an extract from the official organ, of December 1833; exultingly it says: "The new coalition have labored in vain; every Western State is about to establish a State bank institution. Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri and Kentucky, are resolved to take care of themselves, and no longer depend on the kind guardianship of Biddle, Clay & Co." Immediately after this manifesto, Ohio and every other Western Administration State, established State banks with heavy capitals. And yet, Opposition members are to sit here and be told, that the unblushing statement is to go forth to the country, endorsed by a speech of an honorable member of Congress—that the party with Mr. Van Buren at its head, and the official organ at its tail, now and ever has been opposed to the creation of State banks, and the enlargement of bank capital, and the increase of bank issues. What unqualified impudence! what daring mendacity! To return to the causes of the distress. It is not a little curious to see how great minds differ on the same point. Whilst our President held the theory I have been analyzing, the Secretary of the Treasury—this modern Necker—looked deeper into the subject, and in his philosophical researches, he perceives distinctly, the leading cause to be the over production of cotton.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina,* in '37, dives many fathoms deeper into this obstruse question, and traces it to a demonstration, to the "connection of the Government revenues with the banks." He, like the President, however, after intense study upon the mysterous subject, having looked in the meantime, minutely into statistics, finds that he was altogether mistaken in '37, and now sees with a vision as clear as a sunbeam, that to the Tariff, the abominable Tariff of '28 is to be ascribed all the ills that have afflicted this country, since that period. The honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. Vanderpoel,) with a sagacity inimitable, explodes all these, theories, and fixed beyond the hope of escape, and beyond the reach of mistake, at least in his own estimation, all the existing and past distress, upon the "dead monster." Thus we have exhibited—a strange paradox—no two doctors agreeing upon the cause of the disease; yet, all uniting and recommending with unwavering confidence, the same remedy. Upon the learned theory of Dr. Sangrado, I suppose, who recommended "blood-letting" and "warm water" for all complaints, the political doctors in power swear that the Sub-Treasury is the great panacea for all diseases in finance—the infallible measure of safety and deliverance for the distresses of the people.

Mr. Chairman, having completed my remarks upon the causes of the "distress," I proceed to the consideration of another topic, intimately connected with the measure before the committee—a question preliminary to the discussion of the main question on your table. I refer to the circumstances under which this bill is pressed upon the country. It is contended by the President and his friends, that the passage of this bill is demanded by the popular will. I consider this an important point in this debate. It deserves cool and dispassionate inquiry. In a Government like ours, based upon popular will, it matters not whether this scheme be, as its supporters contend, a measure of "safety and deliverance;" or a measure pregnant with ruin and we, as its opponents contend; yet, if the decided voice of the people demand its adoption, the argument is at an end, without doing violence to true Republican principles.† "Absolute acquiescence in the decisions of the majority, the vital principle of Republics, from which there is no appeal but to force, the vital principle and immediate parent of despotism." Let us then scrutinize this matter, and see how the facts stand. And that there may be no quibble about the correct standard by which to test the decision of the people upon this subject, I propose to the committee, we try this grave point by the standard of popular will, as laid down by the Chief Magistrate—"the great apostle of Democracy,"—in his State papers. In his celebrated letter to my colleague, [the Hon. S. Williams] we find these sound Democratic doctrines. He speaks of "the great moral influence, to which the often expressed opinion of a majority of the people in a Republican Government is entitled." In the same epistle, he discourses of his "abiding reliance on the virtue and intelligence of the people," and deprecates with horror any disregard of the "will of the people, under any plausible pretences whatever, as a fatal blow to the cause of self government." Again, this chief of Democracy urges the necessity of "rigidly and manfully maintaining the supremacy of the popular will upon all occasions," and mournfully denounces "its prostration as the death blow of Republican principles." These sentiments are substantially repeated in the special message. I will not consume the time of the committee by reading them. I cannot, however, omit to call the attention of the committee to the principles contained in that message, in regard to two other measures—measures involving the same subject matter of this—measures antagonistical. The President assumes in this message, that "again to create a National Bank would be to disregard the popular will, twice solemnly and unequivocally expressed." Again, he asserts, "the establishment of such a bank would impair the rightful supremacy of the popular will."

Never, sir, did a sober minded man labor under a greater delusion than our worthy Chief Magistrate, in supposing that any canvass he has ever made before the American people, turned upon the recharter of the United States Bank. In the first instance alluded to, he was the mere appendage to the ticket of General Jackson for the office of the Vice Presidency, without inquiry or care, on the part of the people, as to his political opinions. Besides, there is a cruel death blow to this reference. In this very canvass he received a minority of the popular vote of the United States. In the second canvass alluded to, the recharter of the Bank was not agitated, and could not be considered at all as a test question, inasmuch as two of the three competing candidates, were opposed to the recharter; no issue direct was made upon the measure. But this is immortal. My object is simply to apply the same standard of popular sentiment to the Sub-Treasury bill upon the table, that the President applied to the Bank, granting him his premises, and then let us see how the question stands. In the annual message of 1837, this language will be found, speaking of the action of Congress at the special session: "Your attention was invited to the necessity of additional legislative provisions in respect to the collecting, keeping, and disbursing of the public money. On that occasion, three modes of performing this branch of the public service were presented for consideration—the creation of a National Bank, the State bank deposite system, and the Sub Treasury system. Considering the opinions of both houses of Congress on the first two propositions as expressed in the negative, in which I entirely concur, it is unnecessary for me again to recur to them. In respect to the last measure, you have had an opportunity, since your adjournment, not only to test still further the expediency of the measure by the continual practical operation of such parts of it as are now in force, but also to discover, what should ever be sought for and regarded with the utmost deference, the opinions and wishes of the people. The national will is the supreme law of the Republic, and should be faithfully obeyed by the public servants." The conclusion to which the President arrived from the premises, is, to say nothing harsher of it, a little remarkable. The opinion of the popular branch of Congress, at the called session, was unfavorable to each of the three measures; and the conclusion of the President, deducible from this decision, is, that the first two are definitely settled, and that the third remains open for consideration and adoption. The President assumes and protests, in that message, that the principle of res judicata, does not apply to this measure, by the decision of Congress at the special session against it; he appeals from Congress to the people; the issue is distinctly made up in the elections of 1837; the Sub-Treasury becomes the great cardinal measure of the Administration—the touchstone of modern Democracy; the measure goes before the people under the most auspicious circumstances for popular acceptation and approbation, an overwhelming majority of the people having so recently expressed their confidence in its authors, with the endorsement from the Hermitage. The labored expose of the President and his Secretary of the Treasury, contained in the message and the report communicated to Congress at the called session, had been circulated and read throughout the nation; one of the antagonistical measures defunct, dead; the other suspended, stricken down with a universal paralysis. With all these advantages, what was the decision of the tribunal chosen, selected, by the President to pass and determine upon this grand chosen? I will state the decision to the committee; it is a decision consisting entirely of figures. At the November election, 1836, Mr. Van Buren was supported by fifteen States, his popular majority over all his competitors 27,618 votes, his entire vote 761,962; the fiscal agent of the Government at this time was the State bank deposite system, the choice system at that time of the President; the called session intervenes; the banks are abandoned and denounced; the election of 1837 takes place; six of the fifteen States that voted for the President in 1836, wheel about and unite with the Opposition, leaving the relative proportion precisely reversed, fifteen against him, eleven for him; popular vote against him and his favorite measure the Sub-Treasury, majority one hundred and eight thousand; to which add the 27,618 majority by which he was elected, gives a change in the short space of nine months against the Administration of 135,618 votes, produced and stimulated by popular hostility to the adoption of the Sub-Treasury, the favorite measure of the rulers of the party. Never since this was a Government did the elections turn so exclusively, upon a single isolated question. Congress meets on the first Monday of December, after the various elections had taken place, giving the results I have read to the committee. The President had all the evidence of the recent expression of popular will before him in figures, undisputed and indisputable. How did he regard it? How did he treat it? How did he carry out in practice the high wrought theory of Democracy, I have just read from his famous electioneering letter? Did he acquiesce in the decision of the majority of the people? No, sir; in his own emphatic language, he says, in his annual message of 1837, speaking of the Sub-Treasury, recommending its passage again to the favorable consideration of Congress: "I have found no reason to change my own opinion." Not only so, not content with a scornful disregard of the will of the people, in order to impair this unqualified veto of the people upon his favorite scheme, and to court some of his dissenting members of Congress into compliance to Executive will, and force this measure upon the country "nolens volens," willing or unwilling, he unblushingly charges the people with bribery, bought up by bank influence; and this libel upon the virtue of the American people, endorsed by the highest officer of the nation, has gone forth to the four quarters of the world as evidence of the corruption of a free Government. What a fulfilment of the declaration "that the will of the people, under no plausible pretences whatever, is to be disregarded;" what "a faithful obedience upon the part of the public servant" to the decision of the majority of the people. But this is not all. The President, in his annual message of 1837, renews his recommendation of the Sub-Treasury, but with very great modifications. Perceiving that he had overestimated the gullibility of the people in his financial plan of 1837, he qualifies it materially in his annual message; he omits the specie clause, the most fundamental half of the measure; he omits the bankrupt measure, another most essential feature of the system; and in order to make it still more palatable to his friends in this House, he recommends that the plan might very well embrace the use of State banks as depositaries, to be used at the "voluntary" and "discretionary" will of the Executive, whenever he might deem it "advisable" or "profitable;" a legal connection of the Government and banks, an idea not any longer to be entertained in the judgment of the President; a loose, "voluntary, discretionary," unlawful, undefined, unrestrained, adulterous connection, might be "desirable" and "profitable." In conclusion, upon this topic in that message, he says: "I recommend the whole matter to your dispassionate reflection." The measure is taken up in the Senate, passes—omitting the specie clause—comes to this House, the popular body of Congress, members all fresh from their constituents: here it was indignantly laid on the table; a movement esteemed in parliamentary courtesy contemptuous—a contempt justly due an Executive measure from the immediate representatives of the people, under all the circumstances. One would have supposed that "a public servant," acknowledging "the rightful supremacy of the opinions and wishes of the people," would have submitted to these repeated decisions, and suffered the project to have here slept the sleep of death. But did he do so? No, sir. The President considers this no test. He appeals from the second decision of the popular branch of Congress again to the people. The issue is fairly made up—all the candidates for office, State and National, take it up and discuss it—every press argues and discusses it—it is made emphatically the question of party orthodoxy—every friend of the Administration who refused to give in his support at the sacrifice of judgment and of conscience, was read out of the church, and branded by every ruthless press of the party, from the official organ to the village thumb paper, as a "deserter and an apostate." With the canvass thus conducted, the election of 1838 comes off, and a popular majority against the Administration and the Sub-Treasury of 110,530 votes; an increase of two thousand over the majority of '37. Here the President had two decisions of the popular branch of Congress against his scheme, once in 1837, in its original shape—again in 1838, in its modified form. He had, in addition, "the popular will, twice solemnly and unequivocally expressed" against it. To disregard which, he pronounces the death blow to Republican principles, in his famous letter. And yet, Mr. Chairman, with all these unequivocal evidences before him of popular displeasure and popular indignation against the Sub-Treasury, the President says, at the opening of the next session of Congress, in his annual message, "my opinion as to the safekeeping and disbursement of the public money, has been already submitted to you—(the Sub-Treasury plan.) These have been strengthened by recent events." Gracious God! what a pure Democrat! Congress again acts upon the measure—this House, the people's branch, rejects it twice this session—once in the shape of a bill from the Senate, and again upon a bill from the Committee of Ways and Means. With four unbroken decisions of the popular branch of Congress against this scheme, the popular will twice solemnly expressed against it, now, in the year of our Lord 1840, with no evidence of any abatement of popular hostility to the measure, our President, this high priest of Democracy, in his annual message, recommends and presses upon Congress the consideration and adoption of this scheme, in its most odious shape, with all its appurtenant measures—Treasury notes, Treasury drafts, discretionary powers to issue Government paper to meet fluctuations and unexpected deficiencies, not omitting the bankrupt measure; and in despite of the popular will, in despite of lamentation here or elsewhere, is doomed to become the law of the land, under circumstances that will stamp the law and its authors with a mark of infamy as lasting as the rock of ages, carried by the votes of members occupying seats upon this floor, at the sacrifice of the elective franchise, in open desecration of the Constitution of the State they misrepresent, as well as the Constitution of the United States, and by the aid of other members, courted into compliance by the allurements of office, or driven into support by the terrors of ruthless proscription.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot omit to notice, in connection with this branch of the subject, a remarkable passage in the special message of 1837. It is in these words: 'If a Chief Magistrate may be allowed to speak for himself on such a point, I can truly say that to me nothing would be more truly acceptable than the withdrawal from the Executive, to the greatest practical extent, of all concern in the custody and disbursement of the public revenue." What a beautiful illustration of the sincerity of this sentiment, is contained in the facts I have just laid before the committee! What Executive responsibility or Executive duty requires this high grant of power? this union of the purse and sword in the hands of the President? Despotism, in its most odious form. How happens it that no other Chief Magistrate, from the formation of the Government, has considered a Sub-Treasury even proper, much less as indispensably necessary, to enable the Executive to discharge its duties to the Constitution and the country, in the custody and disbursement of the public revenues? But, sir, it would seem nothing would be more painful to the Chief Magistrate, than the necessity of exercising any unnecessary Executive power—that nothing would be more agreeable "than the withdrawal of all concern in the custody and disbursement of the public revenues." History, Mr. Chairman, is full of examples like this—examples of this same reluctant assumption of power have displayed themselves in all ages, and all countries—in monarchies, in despotisms, in republics, in ancient as well as modern times. Cæsar crossed the for-bidden Rubicon, marched into Rome, entered the sacred temple, and seized with a lawless hand the public treasure; yet we read that he did it under a painful necessity—he would most cheerfully have avoided the demand of imperative duty—no selfish aggrandizement, no unhallowed ambition, stimulated the deed—in the name of the people, and for the good of the people, Cæsar assumed these high powers. In the days of a more modern Commonwealth, we have another distinguished example, Cromwell, who with heartfelt reluctance, and under painful necessity, headed a band of soldiers, and drove out, at the point of the bayonet, the members of Parliament, the people's representatives. Yet Cromwell was actuated by no venal motives. "In the name of the Lords and the people," he exclaims, "I drive you hence."

It was no less painful to Richard the Third to accept the bloody crown of his murdered relations, when pressed upon him by the importunities of his minions, and by his own procurement; but, like our faithful President, Richard could not resist the call of the people, saying, in the language of nature's poet:

"I am not made of stone,
But penetrable to your kind entreaties,
Albeit against my conscience and my soul."

But, Mr. Chairman, there is an example of more recent occurrence, and more analogous in all its features. When the illustrious predecessor of the present Chief Magistrate, without authority of law, seized the public treasure of the nation, he was not prompted by any mercenary or ambitious motives. He had neither avarice nor ambition to gratify, in giving this high Executive order, overriding all law. He felt no interest in transmitting his office to a favorite successor. He did it for the pure and patriotic purpose of saving the liberties of the country, and that, too, with "unfeigned pain and reluctance." There is a remarkable coincidence in the similitude of expression, as well as sentiment, in the paragraph read from the message of the present President, and a paragraph which I will now read from the manifesto of the President of that day to his Cabinet.

"He says: "It would ill become the Executive branch of the Government to shrink from any duty which the law imposes upon it." What an exact likeness! What a unity of thought! What a faithful following in the footsteps! Who can read these sentences and doubt about the authorship? Who so dull as not to trace the same glosses and disguises, to conceal a high usurpation of Executive power? The same mind dictated both. The same hand penned both. The same ambition prompted both. What was then in a state of embryo—"half concealed—half disclosed"—is by the passage of this bill about to be consummated. He who inserted in that manifesto the short and pithy sentence, "that money was power," spoke from experience, having long and successively practised upon the principles in his own State—"that to the victors belong the spoils." He has thirsted for the last ten years to insinuate the same principle in the administration of the General Government. No man believes more implicitly in the truth of the maxim, that "money is the sinew of politics as well as war," than the Chief Magistrate of this nation—none has greater acknowledgments to make to its kind influence. It is not surprising, that he holds an unyielding grasp upon the treasure of the nation. Sir, open and bold usurpations never alarm me. I fear no danger of the perpetuity of this Government, from the assaults of the manly tyrant or despot. I can look with some forfearance upon the unjust pretensions to power, asserted and defended upon principle; yet, whilst I protest, I am no alarmist. Whilst I claim to be one who has "never despaired of the Republic," in the gloomiest hour of the successive storms and whirlpools of Executive usurpation, which it has passed through in the last ten years; yet, I must confess, when I see power assumed and petitioned to be legalized, as this bill proposes and will accomplish, when I see the indifference with which many, and the zeal with which others, sustain this measure—a measure striking down at one fell blow the balance of the Constitution—unhinging its checks, its great conservative principle—wresting from Congress and the people the guardianship of the public money—uniting in the hands of the President the sword and the money power, I am forced to acknowledge it inspires me with some concern for the permanency of our free institutions. These are not the gloomy forebodings of a distempered imagination. It is not mere matter of criticism. It is no panic picture. Despotism never shows itself all at once; it feels its way cautiously. In the beginning, it is always diffident, modest. It uniformly dresses in false garments. It invariably assumes a false name. It progresses under the disguise of virtue, patriotism, and Democracy.
